She had died of Breast-pang, within a minute of her husband's entrance: the last words of two faithful spouses were words of anger.

All these things, and many more less tragic, but very deplorable, came to Alfred Hardie's knowledge, and galled and afflicted him deeply. And several of these revelations heaped discredit upon Richard Hardie, till the young man born with a keen sense of justice, and bred among honorable minds, began to shudder at his own Father.

Herein he was alone: Jane, with the affectionate blindness of love, could impute her arms round her father's neck, and pity him for his losses—by his own dishonesty—and pity him most when most ashamed of his unprincipled conduct died, or despaired. "Poor Papa will feel this so deeply," was her only comment on such occasions.

Alfred was not sorry she could take this view: and left her unmolested to confound black with white, and indulge her filial affection's dictates: but his own trained understanding was not to be duped in matters of plain morality. And so, unable to cure the wrongs he deplored, was able to put his conscience into his pocket, like Richard Hardie, and be happy. Instead, he wandered alone, or sat brooding and dejected: and the attentive reader, if I am so fortunate as to possess him, will be surprised to learn that he was troubled too with dark mysterious surmises he half dreaded, yet felt it his duty, to fathom. Where was Dodds's loss by the Bank combined to keep him out of Albion Villa. He often called to ask after Captain Dodd, but was ashamed to enter the house.

Now Richard Hardie's anxiety to know whether David was to die or live had not declined, after he had ceased to hate the latter, he was now resolved to fly to the United States with his booty, and cheat his alienated son along with the rest: he had gone to all degrees down to this. It was on Alfred he had counted to keep him informed of David's state: but, on the putting, a smooth answer to the young man's face hid it with shame, or anger, or something, and he gave a very short, sharp, and obscure reply. In a word, he did not tell, nor did Sara!, his informant: for of late the servants had never been allowed to enter Alfred's room.

Mr. Hardie, after this rebuff, never asked Alfred again; but hearing heard Sampson's name mentioned as Dodd's medical attendant, wrote and asked him to come and dine, next time he should visit Barkington: "You will find me a fallen man," said he; "tomorrow we resign our house and premises and furniture to the assignees, and go to live at a little furnished cottage: not very far from your friends the Dodds. It is called 'Shamrock Cottage.' There, where we have so little to offer besides a welcome, none but true friends will come near us; indeed there are very few I should venture to ask for such a proof of fidelity to your broken friend.

"R. H."

The good-hearted Sampson sent a cordial reply, and came to dinner at Shamrock Cottage.

Now all Hardie wanted of him in reality was to know about David; so when Jane had retired, and the decanter circulated, he began to jump him by his vanity. "I understand," said he, "you have wrought one of your surprising cures in this neighborhood. Albion Villa!"

Sampson shook his head sorrowfully: Mr. Hardie's eyes sparkled: Alfred watched him keenly and bitterly.

"How can I work a great cure after those ass-and-ass Short and Dumcod? Why, sir, the man had been wounded in the hid, and lost blood; thin stabbed in the shoulder, and lost more blood." . . . Both the Hardies uttered an ejaculation of undisguised surprise.—"So, instid of recruiting the bodily thus exhausted of the great fluid material of all vitality, the professional ass-ass-in came and exhausted him worse; stabbed him while he slept; stabbed him unconscious, stabbed him in a vein; and stole more blood from him. Wasn't that enough? No! the routine of professional ass-ass-ination had but begun. It blist them, stabbed him with cupping needles, and so stole more of his life-blood. And they were goen from tender stabs to their bites, goen to leech, from temporal arterial, and so hand him to the sixton."

But you came in and saved him," cried Alfred.

"I saved his life," said Sampson, sorrowfully: "I saved his body: but the mind of a man may be robbed of by those who stend his lifeblood, and so impoverish, and water, the contints of the cistern of the heart."

"Doctor Sampson," said Alfred, "what do you mean by these mysterious words? you alarm me."

"What, don't you know? Haven't they told you?"

"No, I have not had the courage to enter the house since the Bank—" He stopped in confusion.

"Ay, I understand," said Sampson: "however, it can't be hidden now—

"He is a maniac."

Sampson made this awful announcement soberly and sorrowfully.

Alfred started aloud, and even his father experienced a momentary remorse; but so steady had been the progress of corruption, that he felt almost unmoved by the moment: and his keen-witted son surprised the later sentiment in his face, and shuddered with disgust.

Sampson went on to say that he believed the poor man had gone flourishing a razor; and Mrs. Hall had said, "Yes, kill me, David: kill the mother of your children," and never moved: which feminine, or, in other words, irrational, behavior, Sampson could understand. But it would not happen again: his sister had come; a sensible, resolute woman. She had signed the order, and Sampson, and he understood, that he was gone to a private asylum. "Talking of that," said Sampson, rising suddenly, "I must go and give them a word of comfort; for they are just breaking their hearts at parting with him, poor things: I'll be back in an hour."

On his departure Jane returned and made the tea in the dining-room: they lived like that now.

Mr. Hardie took it from his favorite's little white hand, and observed that he should not have to go to a foreign land after all: who would believe a madman if he should rave about his thousands? Jane was delighted to hear it, and presently delivered herself thus, with bland self-satisfaction:

"I dare say Alfred, some time ago you wished to marry a young lady without fortune; you thought that I had a large one: and you expected to be disowned." Alfred smiled. He did not overrate my parental feeling; but you did my means. I would have done this for you, and this pleasure, but for my own unhappy misfortunes. As it was, I said 'No.' And when you demanded, somewhat peremptorily, my reasons, I said 'trust me.' Well, you was right: such a marriage would have been your utter ruin. Richard, I confess, I confess, that Sampson has told us, you have resigned it on other grounds. Jane, my dear, Captain Dodd, I am sorry to say, is afflicted." . . . "Insane?"

"Gone mad? oh how shocking! What will become of his poor children?" She thought of Edward first.

"We have just heard it from Sampson. And I presume, Alfred, you are not so far gone as to insist on propagating insanity, by a marriage with his daughter."

At this conclusion which struck her objective, though not Alfred, with great force, Richard's and her dream of earthly happiness seemed to melt away.

But Alfred ground his teeth, and replied with great bitterness and emotion: "I think, Sir, you are the last man who ought to congratulate me on the affliction that has fallen on that unhappy family I aspire to enter, all the more that you have some calamities for me to share—"

"More fool you," put in Mr. Hardie, calmly.

"For I much fear you are one of the causes of that calamity."

Mr. Hardie assumed a puzzled air: "I don't see how that can be: do you, Jenny? Sampson told us the causes: a wound on the head, a wound in the arm, bleeding, cupping, etc."

"There may be other causes Dr. Sampson has not been told of—yet."

"Possibly. I really don't know what you allude to."

The son fixed his eyes on the father, and leaned across the table to him, till their faces nearly met.

"The fourteen thousand pounds, Sir."

* I find, however, that Squire Langton resolutely refused to commit Miss Phillips. The real reason I suspect was that he had a respect for the Gospel, and not much for the law, except those invaluable clauses which authorize poaching. The reason he gave was "Turnips be hanged! If she hadn't eaten them, the fly would." However, he found means to mulct Giles, and sent the old doctor two couple of rabbits.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG—LONGSTREET'S ATTACK UPON OUR LEFT CENTRE—

–BLUE RIDGE IN THE DISTANCE.—From a Drawing by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 510.]

A LOCK OF HAIR.

Only a lock of hair, tied with a silken string,
Carefully kept for years, like a miser's pile of gold:
Little to prize in the keeping of such a simple thing,
But for a darling head long lost in the days of old.

Only a lock of hair. Ah, well, it were better to have Even one little tress safe from the Spoiler's hand,
Than, with the light of her love down in the darkling grave,
Lonely to wander around a desolate, weary land.

Only a lock of hair. Yet something to look at, and kiss:
Something to keep in mind what never can be again:
Something to tell of days unshadowed by anguish like this:
Something to bring soft thoughts to a saddened and dreary brain.

THAT MYSTERIOUS JOE.

A warm summer day in the cars. The air, cooled in the morning by a shower, sufficiently clear and free from dust to permit me to sit with open window and enjoy the panorama of broad fields of waving grain, slowly swayed by the passing breeze into golden green billows; of the rippling river sparkling over its shallow bed; of cool shady woods, dark and seductive; of stately elm-trees and rolling hills—all the tranquil beauty of the Valley of the Mohawk in August. I sat, with half dreamy eyes, watching the ever-varying landscape, until after a time the cars rumbled into a small town and stopped at the station. My seat was on the opposite side from the platform, and I gazed vacantly at a space of blank wall, until, after a minute, another train shot between me and it, and a new picture, more lovely than any thing I had yet seen, was substituted in its place. In the car window that stood beside mine, not six feet from me, sat a young girl with the fairest face and form I ever looked upon. A round straw-hat rested on a mass of wavy hair, that rolled away from a pure forehead in shining masses of pale gold, a complexion pure as an infant's, a sweet mouth, all amiability and gentleness, and, above all, large blue eyes, beautiful in tone of color and length of shading lash, but, above all, beautiful from the innocence and truth that looked out from their clear depths.

I could not turn my gaze from so much loveliness, but sat watching most intensely my sudden neighbor. Once she looked toward me, but abstractedly, as if she scarcely saw me; then, with an expression of deep thought, she raised a book she had in her hand, and I saw that upon it rested a sheet of note-paper, on which she began to write busily. This gave me an excellent opportunity of continuing to study her beautiful face without annoying her by my rudeness; and I sat learning literally by heart every faultless feature, until the ringing of the bell announced that the train was about to start. At this moment she looked up again; her eyes then for the first time met mine. Whether she read the admiration that my looks must have expressed, or from what cause I hardly know, but a faint blush crossed her face, and she half raised the paper on which she had been writing, with a vague, restless motion. At this instant it slipped from her fingers, a passing current of air caught it, whirled it away from her, tossed it up between the cars, and then, by strange perversity, blew it directly into my window. She watched it at first with a gasp and start of dismay and then with intense anxiety. I seized it as it passed by me, and just then the cars began to move apart. I made one furtive reach out of window, at the same moment that she on her part leaned out toward me. For one second we gazed earnestly at each other, and then, becoming at once conscious of the uselessness of our efforts and the absurdity of the situation, we both burst into smiles, at each instant of time receding farther apart, until, before half a minute had passed, she had sunk away out of sight, and I was whirled off on my swift course.

Then for the first time I drew a long breath, and awoke, as it were, from a trance. The whole thing had been so strange and passed so swiftly, that if it had not been for the paper I still held in my hand I might have thought it but a summer's day dream. But no, that exquisite face and form were tangible realities, for a few happy minutes they had been beside me; now they were gone, and what hope was there that I should ever gaze on so much beauty again? This reflection brought me back to the paper in my hand. That might give me some clew to the fair unknown that the cars had so ruthlessly torn from my gaze. There could surely be no harm in reading it; indeed it would have been difficult to avoid it, as it was an open sheet with a few lines of clear writing on the smooth white page. I might find her signature there, and thus at least know her name, possibly her address. Then I looked at the note, and only too clearly read its few hurried lines:

"My darling Joe,—Do come and see me as soon as I reach home. No one need know of it, and I am so very anxious to speak to you of this last affair. Oh, Joe, if you only knew how much I have thought of you since we parted; if you only knew how much I love you, and how much—"

"A love-letter!"

With a long sigh I uttered this ejaculation as the inevitable verdict after reading these words, and with the acknowledgment I felt a sharp pang of disappointment, at which I was ready to smile in another moment. What was it to me if this pretty girl, who I had only seen for five minutes, did write love-letters to the fortunate Joe? He was an uncommonly lucky fellow, that was all—and I? Why, foolish I must forget the fair face and lovely eyes as soon as possible. But at this last thought a certain contradiction suggested itself to me: she did not look like a woman to write clandestine love-letters, and yet there was a mystery at the first few words of this note.

"Do come and see me," she writes, "no one need know of it," as if the meeting between her and that disagreeably successful Joe were to be concealed from all but their two happy selves. Then further on she uses language almost appealing—"If you only knew how much I love you!" Was it possible to suppose that any one who had been so fortunate as to win the love of that woman would ever do any thing that could render that tender reproach necessary? It was very odd; there was certainly something hidden behind this incomprehensible letter; and so I fell off into all sorts of useless speculations, constantly coming back to the strange contrast between that innocent, truthful look that carried a conviction of purity in its earnestness, and the language of this half note, hinting at concealment and a desperate passion utterly irreconcilable with that youthful innocence. The scenery the rest of that day was all lost upon me; again and again I went over every incident of that odd encounter, and I read the scrap of a letter so many times that at last I knew every word of it by heart. The paper was delicate and a vague perfume exhaled from its folds; the writing was graceful, lady-like, refined; one only hint was contained in it of her possible residence, and that was that she spoke of going home, and the cars she was on board went to New York. I folded the paper at last, and put it in my card-case with a sigh.

I completed the trip on which I had started that memorable August day, and at last came to New York to settle there for the winter. I was at this time twenty-five years old; since leaving college I had been abroad or wandering about my own country; it was time now for me to begin the business of life, and I succeeded in forming an eligible partnership with a lawyer who had been a long time settled in New York, and so went to work earnestly at my profession. Still, even amidst my hardest labor, every now and then the remembrance of that fair vision, seen so hurriedly on that midsummer day, would cross my mind; and when at any place of public amusement I saw a face that seemed unusually lovely, I would mentally compare it with that exquisite one set in my memory, and condemn it as far below that ideal beauty. I had a constant impression that I should some day see it again, and more than once my heart beat as I caught sight of some vague resemblance in a passing figure that vanished into total dissimilarity on a closer inspection; yet fate at last realized my presentiments.

I was walking up Fifth Avenue one bright Sunday afternoon; the crowd of gay promenaders was very great; it was difficult to make any progress through the waves of crinoline, and at every step bright eyes and rosy cheeks challenged admiration. I was moving slowly, enjoying the fine air and the brilliancy of the scene, when, on a sudden coming upon a crowd of people more dense than usual, I stepped aside to allow two fine-looking old ladies to pass, and immediately behind them, behold, was the lady of my dreams! I had a vague impression that she was exquisitely dressed, and that a tall, fine-looking man was with her. All I saw was that sweet face, those beautiful eyes. I believe I stopped short in my walk, and so, just as she was close beside me, our eyes met; she knew me at once; she started, blushed, and almost seemed about to speak; then the throng swept her on, and we were parted again. I looked back once, but saw only the head of her handsome companion.

"Joe, of course!"

I grumbled to myself, and in vexation I started off at a rate that knocked half a dozen people out of their places before the end of the first square, discovering which I plunged desperately down a side street, and then being struck with the sudden inspiration of meeting her again, I dashed off down Madison Avenue at a furious pace, coming into Fifth Avenue again half a dozen blocks below and walking slowly up, feeling sure by this manœuvre I must certainly encounter her. But no, she was utterly gone, and after I had promenaded till dark I went home vexed and tired.

For four Sundays after that I perambulated Fifth Avenue to a degree that was utterly absurd. From twelve o'clock until five I was either marching restlessly up and down, or sitting in my club window watching the passers with such intensity that several of my friends guessed my secret, and accosted me with little remarks, like—

"I say, Hastings, who are you so spooney about?" or,

"Let us know when you see her, and give us the benefit of a look!"

But all my vigilance was in vain; and besides, I had a clear consciousness that I was behaving like a fool, since what use was there in my seeing her again when she cared only for that mysterious Joe?

One day I was coming up Broadway with my friend Chester, when out from the crowd of passers came once again the beautiful blonde. This time she was with a lady; and, to my intense surprise, as we passed Chester bowed low; of course I touched my hat, met again those pure eyes, a half smile and blush, and felt as if I had suddenly sailed up to heaven in a balloon, and then been dropped again into Broadway. As soon as I could recover I demanded,

"Who were those ladies?"

"Miss Murray and Miss Lennox."

"Which was Miss Lennox?"

"The inside one—the blonde?"

"Do you know her?"

"Of course I do. Why you have heard me speak of her surely; once I offered to introduce you to her, but you declined."

I remembered it, idiot that I was! I had said I did not care to know any more people—I knew enough young ladies already—or some profanity of that sort. So think how I had avoided what I most wished!

"I accept now," I said; "if you will take me then I shall be forever your debtor, Chester."

"You are very enthusiastic," replied Chester, and something in his tone started up a disagreeable train of thought. I recollected, like a revelation, that his name was Joe.

"Oh, you object!" I cried. "I know the reason; you are engaged to her."

Chester stopped short in his walk and gazed at me. "You must be crazy, Hastings! What under heaven put that in your head?"

"I know it," I answered. "Never mind how; only I'm sure you are."

"I tell you I am not," replied Chester, almost angrily. "She is a distant cousin of mine; I am rather intimate at the house on that account—that's all."

The mystery was no nearer solution than ever, then; he was not engaged; but the language of that note was not the language of a happy engagement—it was rather that of a clandestine love affair; yet, somehow, that idea was so hard to associate with Miss Lennox, that when, three or four evenings after, I stood with Chester on the steps of her father's handsome house on Fifth Avenue, I felt as excited over the prospect of the introduction as if no shadow of suspicion had ever crossed my mind.

This interview had been arranged beforehand. We were expected, and found in the parlor not only Miss Lennox, but also Miss Murray, whom Chester had told me was a cousin of Miss Lennox's, and would probably be there. Both young ladies received me graciously; and I now for the first time noticed that Miss Murray was a handsome, sparkling brunette, with crisp, waving dark hair, saucy eyes, and a manner all coquetry and mischief. Chester seated himself near her, and I was permitted to draw my chair beside Miss Lennox. If I had thought her lovely in the passing glimpses I had previously had of that fair face, how much more beautiful was she now when, seeing her without her hat, I could note the graceful poise of her head, the flow of her splendid hair, the rare proportions of her faultless figure. The moment we were seated, and Chester and Miss Murray had plunged into a jovial chat that left us quite alone, a mutual embarrassment seemed to seize us. I could think of no form of words in which to begin a conversation, and she appeared equally confused. At last I plunged desperately in medias res.

"Miss Lennox, have you forgotten that warm day last August when I first saw you?"

"By no means," she replied, frankly. "I knew you at once."

"And you remember that I have something of yours."

"That letter!" she cried, with a start. "Did you keep it?"

"Yes, I have carried it with me ever since," I replied, drawing out my pocket-book. "I hoped from it to find some clew to the writer."

I took the paper from the envelope in which I had deposited it, and held it toward her.

"It is of no value," she said, as she took it.

"But I think it right to tell you that I have read it. I could hardly help it in my first glance; and, besides, I hoped so much it might contain your name."

She did not blush, though I fancied she looked a little annoyed, as she said, "It was to my cousin; perhaps some day I can explain to you why it was written."

It was to Chester, then; and she felt it required explanation. Yet there could be but one solution of such a note; and with a sigh I tried to believe I did not care if Chester was the happy Joe.

In the moment of silence occupied by these thoughts Miss Lennox tore up the fatal paper and tossed the portions into the fire. Then she said, musingly,

"How strange it was that my note should have flown directly to your hand!"

"Yes," I answered. "I had been watching you for several minutes without your knowledge, and I hope you will pardon any indiscretion in reading it. I could not resist the temptation."

"Oh! it was no matter," she replied, carelessly. "You must have thought it rather odd, though," she added.

"I did, rather."

"Well, some day, perhaps, I can explain it all."

"I hope so, although I am aware I have no right to be curious."

"You shall be gratified," she said—"that is, if I can get Joe's consent."

At this moment a loud burst of laughter from the other two young people startled us, and Miss Lennox, looking up, cried out,

"Joe! Josey! do be careful!"

They both looked around. Chester kissed his hand toward Miss Lennox, crying, gayly,

"Thank you, coz;" and they went on with their talk in a lower tone.

"Do you know, I feel as if we had known each other ever since last August," I said.

"So do I," she replied. "I have often thought curiously of that meeting since, and wondered if I should ever see you again."

"Fate has willed it," I replied. "And now I am going to ask you to tell me your first name; I never have heard it."

"Ethel."

"How pretty! and it suits you exactly."

"I'm glad you like it; what is yours?"

"Ned."

And so we went on with that sort of talk with which young people while away so many hours. Very interesting to themselves, but utterly stupid to every one else. Chester never left Miss Murray's side, so that I had opportunity for a long conversation with Miss Lennox, and when we parted I fear that I was already well acquainted with her; still I could not but envy Chester's better position as he shook hands warmly with the cousins.

"Good-night, Ethel; good-night, Josey."

After this I met these two young ladies constantly at the opera, at the houses of mutual friends, in the street; they were very much together, and Chester and I, either by previous arrangement or by accident, were frequently with them. Generally Chester gave up to me the place at Miss Lennox's side, but very often I, feeling as if I had no right constantly to usurp his position, would leave her to his charge and devote myself to Miss Murray. In this way I learned to know this young lady very well. She was an exceedingly attractive person, full of life and fun, but careless, almost reckless, in manner and habit, so that there is no telling what scrapes she would not have plunged into, had not her cousin Ethel kept such watch over her. And this was really beautiful to see; on that young face there was almost a mother's anxiety whenever the dashing brunette was on the point of committing some harmless but imprudent act. Miss Murray was perpetually laughing too loud, or dressing in some outrée style, or offering to smoke cigars, or using slang expressions, or doing something that kept her mentor nervous; then as to gloves, and parasols, and such small articles, Miss Lennox was perpetually lending her cousin her own, and having them lost or broken—all which minor trials she bore with the utmost amiability. Indeed her conduct in this regard greatly endeared her to me, and, I may as well confess it first as last, I was before long hopelessly in love.

I don't think I struggled very much against this growing passion; certainly I never tried to keep away from its cause, but went on daily being more and more with her, and should have been perfectly happy had it not been for that mysterious letter, every word of which was clear in my memory as if the paper still rested on my heart. I watched Chester when with Miss Lennox intensely, and could not see that he acted much like a lover. He was a good deal with her, and his manner was very friendly, almost affectionate, but he was if any thing more devoted to Miss Murray. I even sometimes thought he was in love with her, and concluded if it could have been that that note was written in a fit of jealousy by Ethel. Yet no; one look at her pure eyes seemed to make that impossible, and I might even have hoped that she cared somewhat for me if it had not been for the thoughts suggested by that letter. She was always very glad to see me, and listened to the half lover-like language I often addressed to her with blushes that would have made me supremely happy but for those vague suspicions. Once or twice I saw little indications that, just when I had almost forgotten my doubts, revived them in all their force. I caught glimpses occasionally of Chester walking, toward dusk, with some one I was sure was Miss Lennox, which made me half wild with jealousy, until I discovered that here, perhaps, I was mistaken.

One evening toward spring, when the days grew long, I was riding at twilight in the Central Park with a friend. Just as we passed the Ramble I had a brief view of two figures: one I was sure was Chester, the other I was almost equally certain was Miss Lennox; although she was closely veiled, I felt that I could scarcely be mistaken in the outlines of the figures, and even the very pattern of the cloak. I set my teeth and fell into gloomy silence, from which my friend Craig, who had taken me out to try his new horses, endeavored in vain to rouse me, until, as we were coming round a turn to go home, we met a buggy dashing out of town at a furious pace. One glance showed me that one of its occupants was Chester: the lady with him was still veiled and draped as I had just seen her, but as they rapidly whirled by a passing breeze caught the thick veil and blew it half off her face. It was but for a second, but in that brief space I saw that it was not Miss Lennox but Miss Murray.

Craig must have been astonished at my sudden volubility. I plunged into all sorts of joyous talk and was entirely happy, for I believed now that Miss Murray had always been Chester's companion. There was very much similarity of height and figure between the two young lady cousins, and I might easily have been deceived. For a week I was almost perfectly happy. I was very much with Ethel, and at our every meeting I had more reason to believe that she was not indifferent to me. She seemed so glad to be with me, her manner was so pleasantly confidential on many points, her blushes came so readily at my earnest words, that I was ready at the first good opportunity to propose to her myself, and thus solve all tormenting doubts. Several times the remembrance of that letter troubled me, it is true, but I was not yet by any means sure who that mysterious Joe was. It might not be Chester. It might be an episode of the past already forgotten. At any rate my proposition would assure me as to whether she now loved me or not, and set all my anxieties at rest.

In this delightful state, only waiting for a suitable tête-à-tête to urge my suit with Miss Lennox, I went one evening to what Chester called his studio. He was a fellow of independent fortune, aspired to be a bit of an artist, affected great knowledge of pictures, and had a room in Broadway fitted up with handsome furniture, an odd collection of books, pictures, and curiosities, and a goodly array of bottles and pipes. His family lived on Staten Island, and he found it very convenient to have this place, where he could sleep whenever he cared to stay in town. An alcove at one end contained a small bed that could be shut off by heavy curtains, so that he was very comfortable there when he chose to remain. As I have said, one day after my dinner I lounged down to Chester's studio, thinking I would go in and smoke with him a while, until it was time to dress for a party at which I hoped to meet Miss Lennox.

I came up the stairs whistling gayly, and knocked at his door. There was no response. I knocked again. Still no answer. Thinking he might be in, and asleep, or out, and I would wait for him, I tried the door. It yielded slowly, and I stepped forward. A screen before the entrance partially concealed the room; but I heard with perfect distinctness the rustle of a woman's dress, and caught sight, as I passed the barrier, of the flow of a dark robe, that instantly disappeared behind the curtains of the alcove. I paused, horrified at my own awkwardness.

"I beg your pardon, Chester," I cried, stopping short.

My friend was dreadfully confused.

"Ah, Hastings," he stammered, "I did not expect you."

"It seems not," I laughed, "and I will take myself off at once."

I was just turning to go, when my eyes caught an object that riveted my gaze. The room was not very large, and on the floor by the sofa, not far from me, lay a handkerchief. A little square of white, embroidered with scarlet, a pattern running around the edge, and, just where I could not help seeing it, a name worked in letters that seemed to start out like flames.

"Ethel!"

I must have turned very pale, but Chester was too anxious to see me.

"Of course I can't ask you to stay now, Hastings," he said, "but come back in the course of an hour."

I muttered something incoherent, and got away. I scarcely know how, out of the room and out of the building, into the cold air outside, that still seemed to stifle me. "Ethel is false, then; Ethel is false!" This one thought took possession of me to the exclusion of every other. The street was thronged, but I scarcely knew it, as I rushed on with long strides, finding a half relief in the violent exercise, yet all the while choked and suffocated with my sorrow and indignation. That bright being I had thought so pure was capable of this monstrous deception! She was carrying on a secret, indeed, a disgraceful love affair with Chester, while all the time to me she appeared all innocence and truth. The reflections were maddening, and I held on my impetuous way till I had passed the city, and was alone with my sorrow in the silent park. There I wandered for hours, unconscious of every thing but my acute misery. I had never known how desperately I loved until now. I was twenty-five years old, and up to this winter had never felt for any woman more than a passing fancy. Now I loved intensely, wildly, desperately, and she whom I so loved was false. She had given her heart and even risked her fair fame for this man, whom I yet could not believe loved her; passing me by—I who would have devoted my whole life to her, I who loved with such pure and true affection.

It was a fearful night that first one after this terrible discovery; but the days that followed were not much better. I had found out, it is true, that Ethel had deceived me; I had identified that mysterious Joe beyond all possible doubt. I believed her to be untrue in every regard, yet I could not forget the beautiful girl whom I still with shame acknowledged I so loved. Of course I would not see her. I not only did not go to the house, but I avoided all places where I thought there was a chance of meeting her, and I kept out of Chester's way. I could not bear to see him—to look upon the smiling face of that happy man, and know that he had won where I had so miserably failed. Two weeks passed thus. I heard once or twice in that time that Chester had asked for me at the office, but I had happened accidentally to be away, to my own considerable satisfaction. I worked early and late, endeavoring to drown all thought in study; but I was still very wretched. Coming up town one afternoon I finally met Chester; there was no avoiding him now, for he seized upon me at once.

"Helloa, Hastings! I'm so glad to see you! Where have you kept yourself this age?"

"I've been busy," I replied, feeling my heart contract as I looked at that handsome smiling face.

"Busy! but is that any reason why you should forget your friends? I'll tell you what it is, old fellow, I've been downright hurt at your negligence!"

"Forgive me, Chester, but I—"

As I paused abruptly, a sudden thought seemed to strike him as to our last meeting in his house.

"How could I said away because of that unlucky discovery of yours, Ned?" he asked, with a faint blush.

"Not exactly; it was no business of mine," I began.

"But if you knew"—he burst out impetuously—"if you knew how perfectly innocent that was—"

"My dear Chester, make no apologies; I do not set myself up for a censor."

"No, but really now;" and Chester blushed prodigiously as he proceeded. "That young lady had never been in my room before alone—she came in then only for fun, and you frightened her so that I promise you she will never come again."

I believe all that," I replied readily enough. "I know I ought to have been to hunt you up before this, but I have been very busy."

"And you have never been at the Lennox's either," he went on. "Ethel has asked me several times why you were."

"She is very kind," I faltered.

"Go there to-night won't you? with me."

"No, no, I can't!" I replied, quickly.

"Why not?"

"I have some writing I must do."

"Well, you please; but don't make a mope of yourself, and come in to see me soon or there'll be a quarrel between us."

And at Chester turned away whistling merrily, and I went home tired, sad, and forlorn. It was very hard that he should be so happy, and I so utterly disappointed.

For two or three weeks more I did not see Miss Lennox; then one night I went to the theatre with a friend from the country, and behold, just after we had taken our seats, I discovered Ethel with a party in a private box close beside us. There was no avoiding her, she sat in front with her mother, while behind them were Chester and Miss Murray. The two latter were in high spirits, laughing and chatting, but Ethel looked pale and sad. No wonder, I thought; there was the man she loved, for whom she had risked so much, devoting himself as usual to her cousin, while she was neglected. My blood boiled with indignation; for as I looked at those sweet eyes, that innocent face, I could not cherish any resentment, I only felt a wild longing to draw her to my heart and assure her that there was rest. The play was almost lost upon me, I sat watching so intently for her first glance of recognition. It came at last—her eyes met mine, and with a startled look her lips parted as if to utter a cry, then with a sudden deadly pallor she acknowledged my bow. After that I saw that every now and then she turned her eyes on me, but there was a reproachful sorrow mingled in her look that cut me to the heart, unjust as I felt it to be. She sat alone all the evening. Chester and Miss Murray scarcely spoke to her at all, they seemed wholly absorbed in each other, and secluded, beyond a doubt, like two evident and foolish lovers. What must she have endured, I thought; and I pitied her with all my heart.

The long evening was over at last, and I hurried away with my friend to avoid encountering again that sad sweet face, going home and tossing all night on a restless bed, only falling asleep at last to be still haunted by those reproachful eyes. I was roused from these uneasy slumbers by a loud pounding at my door. Stumbling up, I opened it, and in flew Chester, wild with excitement.

"Congratulate me, old boy, congratulate me. I am the happiest man in the world!"

"Congratulate you for what?" I asked, staring at him drowsily from the bed, in which I had again taken refuge.

"We are engaged at last."

"Oh, are you?" I said, gloomily.

"Yes. Why, you don't look a bit pleased, man. What's the matter?"

"I—I—I'm sure I'm very glad for your sake," I stammered.

"Well, then, why do you sit there and stare at me like a death's-head? You look more like a man who has just lost his best friend than one who has had news of a wedding."

"But it's so sudden."

"Sudden! I don't know you! why, no, it isn't. I've been trying to get her almost ever since I can remember, and had no end of trouble about it. At one time I was afraid I should fail, but my parents would not listen to it for ever so long, because we were own cousins."

"What?" I shrieked, in sudden amaze, half starting out of bed.

"Why, how stupid you are!" cried Chester. "Here you've been with me all winter, and never seem to have seen that I was desperately in love with her, nor to have known that she was my first cousin."

"Who?" I gasped.

"Why, Josephine Murray, to be sure."

"Then you are engaged to her?" I cried.

"Of course, who else should I be engaged to?" asked Chester, and—"I thought you'd see it last night, but I rushed over to tell you first, because ever since that night in the studio—"

My eyes were starting, my mouth was open; I felt myself growing pale with intense excitement.

"Who?" I demanded fiercely.

"Who? Why, man alive, I believe you've gone mad. Who should it be but Josephine Murray?"

I made one bound out of bed, and seized Chester by the shoulder.

"It was Josephine Murray who was there. It was Josephine Murray whom you have always loved, and who has loved you. Oh, say it again, Chester, I'm afraid I hardly understand you."

"Gracious powers," cried Chester, staring at me, "I believe you're distracted. Why, who in the name of all that's sensible did you suppose I had there?"

Ethel Lennox's handkerchief lay on the floor," I said, slowly.

"Joe! is it, by Jove! I remember," replied Chester. "Joe's no careless, she brought one of her cousin's with her, and I remember picking it up after you were gone. Ah, Hastings, I've guessed your secret now!"

"You're welcome to it, old fellow!" I cried, all radiant with this blessed discovery. I never hope that was brightening my heart. "Oh you lucky dog! so you've carried off one cousin; may I have your second with the other?"

And under the influence of strong excitement I began to execute a wild dance around the room, and arrested by Chester's roars of laughter at the reflection that my costume was not exactly adapted to such Terpsichorean performances.

"You have lost your head," he said in my right mind, standing with beating heart at Miss Lennox's door. Ethel was at home, and in a few moments was led into the parlor where I waited, pale with agitation, and, might I hope, with pleasure at seeing me? I had all sorts of fine speeches prepared to utter, but the first time those blue eyes met mine out of my head, and I plunged at once into an incoherent declaration, that, incomprehensible as it was, seemed to satisfy her; for after a few wild words she was in my arms resting her sweet head on my shoulder, sobbing out there all her love and all her sorrow at my long neglect.

After the first rapturous moments were over, once again there crossed my brain a remembrance of that mysterious Joe.

"Have you really never loved any one but me, my darling?"

"No, Ned, surely not. Why do you ask?"

"Why, that letter of yours last summur."

"Well?"

"That was a love-letter, surely."

"A love-letter?" laughed Ethel, merrily. "Joe, my dear, what ever made you think that? It was to my cousin."

"I know it, but it was a love-letter."

"Why, Ned, how could I write a love-letter to a woman?"

"To a woman!" I repeated, amazed; "why, you said it was to your cousin."

"So it was, but is not she a woman?"

"Who?"

"Josephine Murray?"

"It was to her?"

"Why yes," repeated Ethel, in amaze. "I told you so the first evening you were here."

"No, you only said it was to your cousin."

"Well, whom did you suppose I meant?"

"Joe Chester."

"Oh, what a funny idea!" and Ethel laughed, till I grew so ashamed of my stupidity that I indignantly closed her rosy lips with a saucy kiss.

"If you knew how much pain that idea has cost me," I began, when I had thus sobered her, and I went on to tell her all my fears and doubts. She sympathized fully, though she could not help being amused at the idea of my supposing she had ever cared for Chester except as a friend; and in the end explained to me how the letter had been written at a time when Miss Murray had been peculiarly reckless in regard to Chester; when her parents had forbidden him the house; and she had been very anxious to see her wayward cousin and remonstrate with her. This had led her to begin the note, which was to close in a homily, with unusual expressions of affection.

So the last shade on my happiness vanished; my suit was certainly prosperous; and from that happy morning I was tormented no more with speculations concerning that mysterious Joe.

DRAFTED!

FACING the common, in a small inland village in Massachusetts, is the residence of the young minister, Rev. James Blanchard. Though neither pretentious nor costly, its surroundings and appointments are refined and tasteful, and taste. Flowers in rich variety lined the walk that led up to the front door, or climbed the trellis which served as a rustic porch.

The pleasantest room in the house was the young minister's study. Here, again, there were signs of a refined and cultivated taste. Shelves crowded with well-chosen books in many departments of literature only left sufficient room along the walls for a few choice engravings and photographs. Here was the face of Goethe, pronounced in his twentieth year the handsomest youth in Europe; and Schiller, who divides with him the literary honors of the great Teutonic tongue. Next is a photograph of the Coliseum by Moonlight, showing the vast proportions in which Roman photographs excel. Beside it hangs a Venetian photograph—a palace rising out of the sea, a gondola in front like a floating party on the sleeping. These and other pictures which adorned the minister's study were brought by him from Europe, where he had spent the two years subsequent to his graduation from the theological school.

It may be asked how, with all these attractions, James Blanchard has been content to settle down in the little village of Gresham on a salary of five hundred dollars. Undoubtedly he might have obtained other settlements more alluring in a worldly point of view. Indeed he had received overtures from a wealthy society in a neighboring city since his settlement here, but he was little influenced by ambition, and the evident solicitude of his own people to secure his services at the end of a year's probation, and the unanimity and indeed the small stipend which he received from his parish was nearly all expended for the benefit of others.

He sat at his writing-table on the afternoon of which I am speaking, busily engaged in preparing a discourse for the following Sunday, when a lady somewhat past middle age entered the room. In spite the difference in age she was sufficiently like him to indicate the relationship.

"Well, mother," said the young man pleasantly, looking up from his writing, "you look as if you had news for me."

"Yes, James," was the reply, "and I am sorry to say unpleasant news."

"Indeed, I hope not. Is any one sick?"

"Not that I have heard. It is something more nearly affecting yourself."

"Have my people got tired of me," asked the young man, smiling, and hinted at my resignation?"

"You are quite off the track. I fancy they have too much wisdom for that. But, not to keep you longer in suspense, you were drafted this morning, I hear."

"Indeed; how did you learn this?"

"Quite directly. Our baker, you know, comes from Cox—the town where the drafting is going on. He happened to be in the hall when the names for Gresham were called, and heard yours. He has been drafted once before quite distinctly, so that there can be no doubt about it."

"Do you call that bad news, mother?" said the young man, gayly.

"Certainly. It is equivalent to a tax of three hundred dollars."

"Even if it were, I ought not to be unwilling to contribute so much toward my country's necessities. But there is another alternative."

"Procuring a substitute. That will be as expensive."

"I don't mean that."

"You don't mean to go?" demanded Mrs. Blanchard, hastily.

"Why should I not, mother? My impression is that the Government stands in greater need of men than money."

"But not of such men as you are, James."

"I hope you don't think I would make a poor soldier, mother?"

"You could never bear the hardships of a military life."

"I don't know that. Have you forgotten my gymnastic training in College? I belonged to a boat-club that stood as high as any in its time, and I don't think I have lost all my strength yet."

Mrs. Blanchard was a woman, and, defeated at one point, shifted her ground to another.

"Besides, James (admire the ingenious use of this word, which quietly ignored her son's refutation of her former argument)—" besides, how unfit you are in other ways for a common soldier. If you could be an officer it would be different. As a private you will be mixed up with all sorts of people, and have to mingle with them equally. You, with your education and refinement, would be thrown away in such a position."

"If my education and refined tastes, as you call them, unfit me to serve my country, they will do me little credit."

"But can't you serve it in some other way? Can't you send a substitute who would make your place good?"

"Doubtless I could, and I can conceive of circumstances which would make such a step the better course. But, unless absolutely necessary, my duty to my country is the last which I should be willing to shift upon other shoulders."

"But you have your duty to your church."

"There are others to whom I can intrust it—others who are not physically able to undertake military service. I think my parishioners will respect their minister none the less because he feels that at this time his duty to his country transcends his duty to them. I clearly understand that I shall meet with much that is repugnant to my tastes, and that I could indulge them better at home. This is a sacrifice which I am ready to make for my country."

"But, James, think of the peril. You may be shot; you may lose your life by disease. Think how lonely my life would be without you."

His sha said in a faltering voice.

James rose and took his mother's hand.

"We are all called upon to sacrifice ourselves in some way to our country. That may be your sacrifice. There is many a mother in our land who weeps to-day in sore bereavement. I trust I shall be spared the bitterness of such grief, but I must be first me to be disturbed by apprehensions when I am in the way of duty."

"If you have fully decided that it is your duty, I will make no further opposition," said the mother, in a subdued voice.

No man's duty is without its influence—certainly not that of a man occupying the important position of James Blanchard.

I pass from the minister's study to a scene and a person quite different.

There was a small house, near the limits of the village, of two stories, and unpainted. It evidently belonged to a family of limited means. In front of this house the peripatetic baker's wagon stopped.

A woman poor in dress and care to see.

"Well, Mrs. Thurston," said the baker, "I've got some news for you."

"What is it, Carter?" she asked, with some curiosity.

"I happened to be in the hall up at C—— this morning when they were calling the list of drafted men in Gresham, and among them I heard your son Robert's name."

"Oh, dear me!" sighed Mrs. Thurston; "that's just the luck. Then that are most needed at home have to go."

"Well, I don't know. Who else do you suppose is drafted?"

"I don't know, I'm sure."

"Your minister is among the lucky ones."

"What, Mr. Blanchard?"

"Yes; I heard his name called."

"It won't make much difference to him," said the woman, bitterly. "He's got money, and he'll just pay his three hundred dollars and get off. As for poor Robert, he'll have to go. He couldn't pay three hundred dollars if it was to save his life, nor fifty dollars either."

"Well," said the baker, "I reckon the minister will pay the money. He don't look much as if he'd relish eating hard tack and sleeping on boards or on the ground. But I must be going, or I sha'n't be home t'-night."

Mrs. Thurston went back to her work nourishing hard thoughts of the minister. Her lot in life had not been the easiest, yet she had never been without the necessaries of life. Her son Robert was a stout young man of two-and-twenty, who had remained at home, while his older brothers and sisters had removed to a distance. He worked by the day for neighboring farmers, and his support which he paid at home for board contributed to pay the household expenses. His mother was not one of those who are disposed to look on the bright side of things. She was somewhat given to cherishing envious feelings toward those whom she considered more prosperous than she, or higher social position than herself. Hence, though she had no personal reason for complaining of the minister, who had treated her with the most considerate kindness, as one in the parish, her inward bitterness would occasionally find vent, as in the present instance.

When Robert came home she communicated the information she had obtained from the baker.

"Well, mother, I'm in good company," he said, cheerfully.

"You mean the minister?"

"Yes, he has been drafted too."

"That's what will come to. He'll never go."

"Why won't he?"

"You won't catch him going. He'll pay the money first."

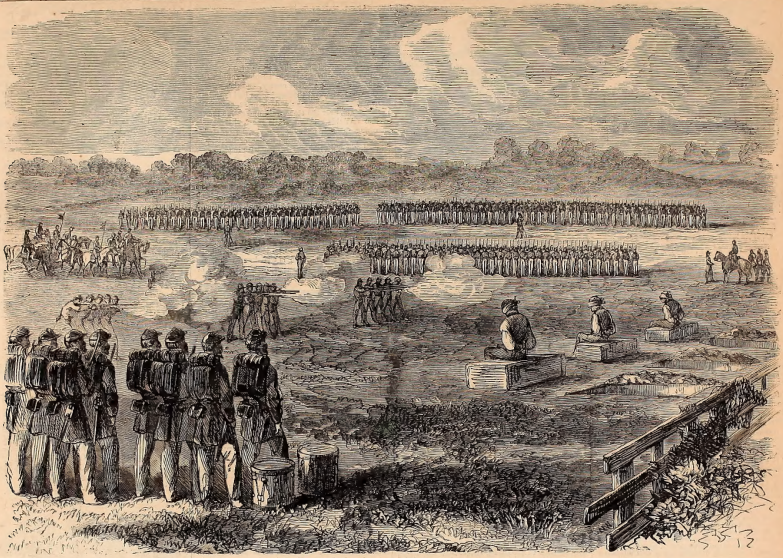
"You are mistaken about that, mother. He has made up his mind to go."

"You don't mean so, Robert?" said Mrs. Thurston, in genuine amazement. "Who told you?"

"Somebody likely to be relied on. He told me so himself, not half an hour since, in the store."

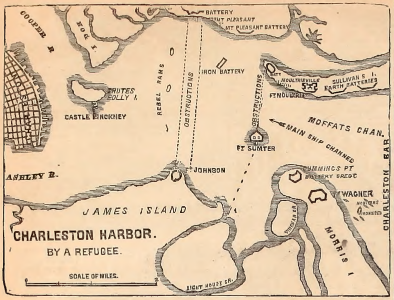
"Well, I'd never have thought it!" ejaculated Mrs. Thurston.

"Besides that, he had heard of my being drafted, and offered, if it would make my mind any easier about going, to give me fifty dollars to leave with you."



Mrs. Thurston did not utter a word, but her bitterness was very sensibly diminished. Neither did she interpose any further objections to her son's going. The Union has gained two good soldiers; for I am quite confident that one acting from such ideas of duty as the young minister of Gresham can not fail to be a valuable accession to the ranks of our brave soldiers.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG—GENERAL CRAWFORD'S CHARGE ON THE REBEL LINES.—[SEE PAGE 510.]



THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG—ATTACK OF THE LOUISIANA TIGERS ON A BATTERY OF THE ELEVENTH CORPS.—DRAWN BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—EXECUTION OF THREE DESERTERS.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THE ATTACK ON FORT WAGNER—THE STORMERS ADVANCING UNDER FIRE.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, SHOWING THE SCENE OF GENERAL GILMORE'S OPERATIONS ON MORRIS ISLAND.

THE ATTACK ON FORT WAGNER.

We publish on page 509 an illustration of the unsuccessful attempt of General Gilmore's army to storm Fort Wagner, on Morris Island, on 18th ult. The bombardment of the fort by the iron-clads and our land-batteries on Morris Island commenced at noon that day, and lasted till the evening. The Tribune correspondent thus relates what then occurred:

"Something must be done, and that, too, quickly, or in a few days we shall have the whole army in Virginia upon us," said an officer high in command. "We must storm the fort to-night, and carry it at the point of the bayonet."

In a few moments signals are made from the top of the look-out, and soon generals and colonels commanding divisions and brigades were seen galloping to the head-quarters of the commanding general. A few words in consultation, and Generals Seymour, Strong, Stevenson, and Colonels Putnam and Montgomery are seen hastening back to their respective commands. Officers shout, bugles sound, the word of command is given, and soon the soldiers around, upon, and under the sand-hills of Morris Island spring from their hiding-places, fall into line, march to the beach, are organized into new brigades, and in solid column stand ready to move to the deadly assault.

Not in widely-extended battle line, with cavalry and artillery at supporting distances, but in solid regimental column, on the hard ocean beach, for half a mile before reaching the fort, in plain sight of the enemy, did these three brigades move to their appointed work.

General Strong, who has so frequently since his arrival in this Department braved death in its many forms of attack, was assigned to the command of the 1st Brigade. Colonel Putnam, of the 7th New Hampshire, who, although of the regular army, and considered one of the best officers in the Department, had never led his men into battle nor been under fire, took command of the 2d, and General Stevenson the 3d, constituting the reserve. The 54th Massachusetts (colored regiment), Colonel Shaw, was the advanced regiment in the 1st Brigade, and the 2d South Carolina (negro), Colonel Montgomery, was the last regiment of the reserve.

These brigades, as I have remarked before, were formed for this express duty. Many of the regiments had never seen their brigade commanders before; some of them had never been under fire; and, with exception of three regiments in the 1st Brigade, none of them had ever been engaged in this form of attack. All had fresh in their memories the severe repulse we had met on the morning of the 11th inst. For two years the Department of the South had been in existence, and until the storming of the batteries on the south end of Morris Island, the army had won no victory fairly acknowledged by the enemy.

Just as darkness began to close in upon the scene of the afternoon and the evening, General Strong rode to the front and ordered his brigade, consisting of the 54th Massachusetts, Colonel Shaw (colored regiment); the 6th Connecticut, Colonel Chatfield; the 48th New York, Colonel Barton; the 3d New Hampshire, Colonel Jackson; the 76th Pennsylvania, and the 9th Maine, Colonel Emery, to advance to the assault. At the instant the line was seen slowly advancing in the dusk toward the fort, and before a double-quick had been ordered, a tremendous fire from the barbette guns on Fort Sumter, from the batteries on Cummings' Point, and from all the guns on Fort Wagner, opened upon it. The guns from Wagner swept the beach, and those from Sumter and Cummings' Point enfiladed it on the left. In the midst of this terrible shower of shot and shell they pushed their way, reached the fort, portions of the 54th Massachusetts, the 6th Connecticut, and the 48th New York, dashed through the ditches, gained the parapet, and engaged in a hand-to-hand fight with the enemy, and for nearly half an hour held their ground, and did not fall back until nearly every commissioned officer was shot down. As on the morning of the assault of the 11th inst., these brave men were exposed to a most galling fire of grape and canister, from howitzers, raking the ditches from the bastions of the fort, from hand-grenades, and from almost every other modern implement of warfare. The rebels fought with the utmost desperation, and so did the larger portion of General Strong's brigade, as long as there was an officer to command it.

When the brigade made the assault General Strong gallantly rode at its head. When it fell back, broken, torn, and bleeding, Major Plimpton of the 3d New Hampshire was the highest commissioned officer to command it. General Strong, Colonel Shaw, Colonel Chatfield, Colonel Barton, Colonel Green, Colonel Jackson, all had fallen. The 54th Massachusetts (negro), whom Copperhead officers would have called cowardly if they had stormed and carried the gates of hell, went boldly into battle, for the second time, commanded by their brave Colonel, but came out of it led by no higher officer than the boy, Lieutenant Higginson.

The 1st Brigade, under the lead of General Strong, failed to take the fort. It was now the turn of Colonel Putnam, commanding the 2d Brigade, composed of the 7th New Hampshire, the 62d Ohio, Colonel Steele, the 67th Ohio, Colonel Vorhees, and the 100th New York, Colonel Danely, to make the attempt. But, alas! the task was too much for him. Through the same terrible fire he led his men to, over, and into the fort, and for an hour held one-half of it, fighting every moment of that time with the utmost desperation, and, as with the 1st Brigade, it was not until he himself fell killed, and nearly all his officers wounded, and no reinforcements arriving, that his men fell back, and the rebel shout and cheer of victory was heard above the roar of Sumter and the guns from Cummings' Point.

In this second assault by Colonel Putnam's brigade, Colonel Turner, of General Gilmore's staff, stood at the side of Colonel Putnam when he fell, and with his voice and sword urged on the thinned ranks to the final charge. But it was too late. The 3d brigade, General Stevenson's, was not on hand. It was madness for the 2d to remain longer under so deadly a fire, and the thought of surrendering in a body to the enemy could not for a moment be entertained. To fight their way back to the intrenchments was all that could be done, and in this retreat many a poor fellow fell, never to rise again.

Without a doubt, many of our men fell from our own fire. The darkness was so intense, the roar of artillery so loud, the flight of grape and canister shot so rapid and destructive, that it was absolutely impossible to preserve order in the ranks of individual companies, to say nothing of the regiments.

More than half the time we were in the fort the fight was simply a hand-to-hand one, as the wounds received by many clearly indicate. Some have sword-thrusts, some are hacked on the head, some are stabbed with bayonets, and a few were knocked down with the butt-end of muskets, but recovered in time to get away with swollen heads. There was terrible fighting to get into the fort, and terrible fighting to get out of it. The cowardly stood no better chance for their lives than the fearless. Even if they surrendered, the shell of Sumter were thickly falling around them in the darkness, and, as prisoners, they could not be safe until victory, decisive and unquestioned, rested with one or the other belligerent.

The battle is over; it is midnight; the ocean beach is crowded with the dead, the dying, and the wounded. It is with difficulty you can urge your horse through to Light-house Inlet. Faint lights are glimmering in the sand-holes and rifle-pits to the right as you pass down the beach. In these holes many a poor wounded and bleeding soldier has laid down to his last sleep. Friends are bending over them to stanch their wounds, or bind up their shattered limbs; but the deathly glare from sunken eyes tells that their kind services are all in vain.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

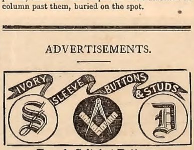
We publish in this number three more illustrations of the Battle of Gettysburg. The one on pages 504 and 505 shows us Longstreet's Grand Attack upon our Left Centre, from a sketch by Mr. A. R. Waud. This battle was fully described in our last number, and we extract that portion of the account which refers to Longstreet's attack:

After much solicitation from his subordinates, General Lee permitted General Longstreet to send his grand division on a charge upon the cemetery. The Federal soldiers were on the alert. They were hid behind their embankments, some kneeling, and some flat on the ground. The Confederate artillery opened. It was as fierce a cannonade as the one the day before, but instead of being spread all over the line, every shell was thrown at the cemetery. Experienced soldiers soon divined what was coming, and in every portion of the Federal line the cannon were directed toward the valley in front of the cemetery. All were ready. Amidst the furious fire from the Confederate cannon scarcely a Federal shot was heard. The artillerists, implements in hand, crouched in the little ditches dug behind their cannon. With arms loaded, the infantry awaited the charge.

It soon came. From the woods of short, scrubby timber and the rocks near the seminary there rose a yell. It was a long, loud, unremitting, hideous screech from thousands of voices. At the yell the Federal cannon opened. Soon the enemy's columns emerged from the woods. They came on a rush down the hill, waving their arms and still screeching. They climbed the fences and rushed along, each one bent upon getting first into the cemetery. The cannon roared, and grape and canister and spherical case fell thick among them. Still they rushed onward, hundreds falling out of the line. They came within musket-shot of the Federal troops. Then the small-arms began to rattle. The Confederates approached the outer line of works. They were laboring up the hill. As they mounted the low bank in front of the rifle-pits, the Federal soldiers retreated out of the ditch behind, turning and firing as they went along. It was a hand-to-hand conflict. Every man fought by himself and for himself. Myriads of the enemy pushed forward down the hill, across into the works, and up to the cemetery. All were shouting, and screaming, and swearing, clashing their arms and firing their pieces. The enemy's shells flew over the field upon the Federal artillerists on the hills above. These, almost disregarding the storm which raged around them, directed all their fire upon the surging columns of the enemy's charge. Every available cannon on the Cemetery Hill, and to the right and left, threw its shells and shot in the valley. The fight was terrible; but despite every effort the enemy pushed up the hill and across the second line of works. The fire became hotter. The fight swayed back and forth. One moment the enemy would be at the railings of the cemetery; then a rush from the Federal side would drive them down into the valley. Then, with one of their horrid screeches, they would fiercely run up the hill again into the cemetery, and have a fierce battle among the tombstones. It was the hardest fight of the day, and hundreds were slain there. Reckless daring, however, will not always succeed. Several attempts were made to take the place, but they were not successful; and late in the afternoon, leaving dead and wounded behind them, the enemy's forces slowly retreated upon their own hill and into their woods again.

Another illustration on page 508, also from a sketch by Mr. Waud, shows us an Attack of the Louisiana Tigers upon a Battery of the Eleventh Corps. The Tigers made the attack as fiercely as usual, but our men stood their ground stoutly, and repulsed them with a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Our third illustration, on page 508, exhibits the Gallant Charge of Crawford's Division, to which in great part the success of the day was due. An eye-witness writes:

"You have no doubt heard of the gallant charge made by the division under Crawford's command. It contributed very materially to saving the left of our line in that fearful struggle. The enemy had massed his troops on Crawford's left. The Third Corps (Sickles's) had been engaging him, but were overpowered; several guns had been lost. Two divisions of the Fifth Corps (Sykes's) had been also engaged; but nothing could withstand the pressure of the enemy, and these troops gave way. Several thousand arms had been lost. On came the enemy in a dark mass, across the wheat-field, over the stone-wall, and across the ravine. At this moment, while the fugitives were rushing through Crawford's ranks, he ordered a charge. He was drawn up in line of battle, and in column of division. His men, with loud cheers, rushed forward. Crawford himself rode to the front, and, seizing the flag of the leading regiment, encouraged the men. They dashed in; volley after volley was poured into the enemy's ranks. The 'Bucktails' got ahead, and drove the enemy back across the ravine, over the stone-wall, and through the wheat-field, retaking our ground and an immense quantity of arms.



"The left of our position was saved by this charge, and we remained masters of the field."

The General Crawford who led this gallant and most efficient manœuvre is well known throughout the country as the surgeon of the garrison of Fort Sumter under Major Anderson.

EXECUTION OF DESERTERS.

The first execution for desertion that has yet taken place in the Twelfth Corps, and we think the first in the Army of the Potomac, took place near Leesburg, Virginia, on Friday, June 19. We publish an engraving of the scene on page 509. On that day, a little after noon, the Corps was formed in three sides of a square, with the fourth side occupied by three open graves, and three empty coffins, seated upon which, bound hand and foot and blindfolded, were the three unfortunate men who were to suffer the penalty of violated military law. The condemned, William M'Kee and William Groover, of the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania regiment, and Christopher Krumbar, of the Thirteenth New Jersey regiment—all belonged to the First Division; and the painful duty of conducting the execution therefore devolved upon Captain M. P. Whitney, of the Fifth Connecticut Volunteers, the Provost-Marshal of the Division, to whom great praise is awarded for the quiet and orderly manner in which the affair passed off. A squad of eight men were placed at a distance of about three rods from each of the condemned, and a reserve was in readiness, should the first fire not prove fatal; but at the single volley the whole three dropped at once lifeless upon their coffins, into which the bodies were then placed, and after the Corps had been marched in column past them, buried on the spot.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

French (Soltaire) Patterns.

These fashionable goods are made of the finest Ivory, and brought to a high polish of all colors, Black, White, Red, Blue, &c., and engraved with Initial Letters, Old English, &c. Complete sets $1 50, free by mail. Trade supplied.

JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, New York.

The Unity of Man,

And The Unity of Language—The Law of Development—Nations, like Individuals—Latitude and Longitude, The Barbarian, Mythology—The Pyramids, Ancient Rome, War and Progress.

The American Man; Contrasted with the English, Scotch, Irish, French, etc.—The Secret of Longevity—The Perils of Life—How life is shortened—and how prolonged.

Physiology in the Pulpit—Soul and Body—Their reciprocal relations—The propensities—Dyspepsia—The true life.

Circulation of the Blood—A new Theory—Light, heat, attraction—Climate and Character—Swimming, etc., in the August No. Phrenological Journal. 15 cents, $1 50 a year. Fowler & Wells, 308 Broadway, N. Y., and all news men.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, New York.

Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

BARTLETT supplies the Needles for all Sewing Machines. Sends by Mail or Express everywhere. Also the renowned Burnished Hand Needles, 150 for 25 cents. 442 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR BRIDGEPORT.

Daily Line.

From Pier 26 East River (Peck Slip Ferry Dock).—The Steamer BRIDGEPORT, Captain Weeks, will leave New York every day at 12 o'clock noon (Sundays excepted), arriving in Bridgeport in time to connect with the Housatonic, Naugatuck, New Haven and Hartford Railroads; also the Shore Line to Saybrook and New London. Returning, leave Bridgeport every night at 11 o'clock.

Freight taken to all stations on the Naugatuck and Housatonic Railroads.

For information, inquire at the office on the Wharf, or 105 Beekman Street

GEO. W. CORLIES, Agent.

MUSQUITO ALL NETS.

MUSQUITO	NEW	NETS.
MUSQUITO	KINDS	NETS.
MUSQUITO	of	NETS.
MUSQUITO	PATENT	SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO	CANOPIES	SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO		SHIELDS.

Lace At Kelty's Curtains.

LACE	No. 359 Broadway.	CURTAINS.
LACE		CURTAINS.

Holland & Gold Window Shades

HOLLAND and GOLD	WINDOW SHADES.
HOLLAND and GOLD	WINDOW SHADES.

Wells & Walber's

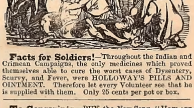
IMPROVED

Artificial Limbs,

No. 429 Broadway,

Corner Howard Street, New York.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address,



S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A PRINTING OFFICE FOR $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $12, 22, 32, and $43. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

Facts for Soldiers!—Throughout the Indian and Crimean Campaigns, the only medicines which proved themselves able to cure the worst cases of Dysentery, Scurvy, and Fever, were HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT. Therefore let every Volunteer see that he is supplied with them. Only 25 cents per pot or box.

To Conscripts.—BUY the New Song, "How are You, Conscript." Price 25 cents. For sale at all Music Stores, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by HENRY TOLMAN & CO., 291 Washington St., Boston.

A Rare Chance!

The "Printer's Devil," a first-class Literay Journal, will be sent on trial six months, free of postage, for Twenty-five Cents. Address,

"Editor Printer's Devil, Box 2900, New York."

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published;

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By Alexander William Kinglake. With Maps and Plans. Vol. I., 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

AFRICAN HUNTING FROM NATAL TO THE ZAMBESI, including Lake Ngami, the Kalahari Desert, &c., from 1852 to 1860. By William Charles Baldwin, F.R.G.S. With Map, Fifty Illustrations by Wolf and Zwecker, and a Portrait of the Great Sportsman. Small 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "One of Them," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," "Maurice Tiernay," "The Dodd Family Abroad," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK. A Tale. By Mrs. Gaskell, Author of "Sylvia's Lovers," "Mary Barton," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARASZTHY'S GRAPE CULTURE AND WINE-MAKING, &c. Grape Culture and Wine-Making: being the Official Report of the Commissioner appointed to investigate the Agriculture of Europe, with especial Reference to the Products of California. By A. Haraszthy. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

Just Ready. Price, $1 25 Paper; $1 50 Cloth.

Romola. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," &c. With Numerous Illustrations.

"Romola" is a performance of which no other woman of genius among us would have been capable than precisely George Eliot.—The Reader (London).

There are noble things to be found in "Romola," which will make the reader's heart burn within him. It will be scarcely possible to rise from the perusal without being penetrated by the "joy of elevated thoughts," without feeling a desire to cease from a life of self-pleasing, and to embody in action that sense of obligation, of obedience to duty, which is, indeed, the crowning distinction that has been conferred on man, the high gift in which all others culminate. This is high praise; and a work that can produce this effect, if only on a single reader, has not been written in vain.—The Athenæum (London).

Such an intellectual study, to use an artist's phrase, as "Tito Melema," has not been placed before the world in this generation; and we know not which to wonder at most, the accuracy of the anatomical knowledge displayed, or the art with which that knowledge is infused—there is no other fitting word—into the reader's mind. Shakespeare might have exulted in Tito.—Spectator (London).

Equal to Scott.—George Eliot has Sir Walter Scott's art for revivifying the past, but not Scott's dynamical force in making you plunge into it with as headlong an interest as into the present. For this she compensates by a deeper and wider intellectual grasp. * * It is marvelous that the wide and calm imaginative power of the writer should have produced a work which is likely to be permanently identified with English literature, in which Italy and England may feel a common pride. * * The great and concentrated interest of the book—at least after the wonderful development of Tito's character—is the portrait of Savonarola, which it is almost impossible not to feel as faithful as history as it is great as romance. * * His portrait evinces almost as great a graphic power, and far more scrupulous care, than Sir Walter Scott used in those pictures of the various Stewarts.—London Spectator.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 35 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches.. 15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " ..... 3 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Mosaic Brooches 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Onyx, and Em. Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear and Jet Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Gentle's Breast Pins..... 2 50 to 8 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Fob and Ribbon Buckles..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sets of Sleeve Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sleeve Buttons..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 12 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 3 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted Holders 4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Cases Double and Warranted.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed, and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—These selling as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement in Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be sold—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate. 20 acre tracts of farm $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good school and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Depot of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles Manufactured at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARDENBURGH'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for Kings, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 50 emancipated cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags for the backs, and no pack can play at the usual games. Two packs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual pack, same price. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

655 Broadway, N.Y., or 162 William Street, N.Y.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers discharged for wounds, entitled to bounty, we send out blanks, with Book of Information and Circular, with Lists of Prizes, by enclosing address, with stamps to pay return postage. SOMES, SON & CO., 74 Fulton Place, New York, and 476 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

$75 PER MONTH guaranteed. Testimonials of $100 cheerfully given and satisfactory men sent free. ISAAC HALE, Jr. & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Saw and Stuffing Apparatus, Universal Hummers, and 12 other new and curious articles. 10 circulars free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

TWO WORKS

VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL.

Sent by mail.

No pay expected until received, read, and approved.

1st. DR. S. S. FITCH'S SIX LECTURES on the Causes, Prevention, and Cure of Consumption, Skin Diseases, Male and Female Complaints, &c. On the Mode and Rules for Preserving Health. 300 pages, 21 Engravings. Price 50c.

2d DR. S. S. FITCH'S NEW WORK on Heart Disease, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, &c., with many valuable Medical Prescriptions for these Diseases. 168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cts. ☞ Say which book you have, giving Name, State, County, and Post-Office. Address DR. S. S. FITCH, No. 714 Broadway, New York.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell the immensely popular, unexcelled, and valuable extra large size FREE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTIONS PACKAGES, containing Sea Weeds, Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Latest Fashion Plates, Dancing Cards, Games, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Fruit Recipes, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likeness of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Games, Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, Sacks and costly Presents of Valuable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars, for each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 per cent profit allowed. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competition, and have long been the standard as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind ever manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to all parts of this army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, Jewelry, Movements, and every Package presented exact to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circular, containing Extraordinary Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

$2 positively made in 20 Cents.—Something simply useful to everybody. 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents that retails for $2. Address R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Family Sewing Machines $5.

THE ALEXANDER SILENT FAMILY SEWING MACHINE ever produced.

NOVELTY MACHINE CO.,

Cure Box 883 P. O. 442 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Unrivaled for combined with great power in Field, Marine, Theatre, Opera, and every out-door day and night double perspective glass. The only distinctly a person to know him at 5 miles. Spectacles of the greatest power and clearness for sight-seeing and improves the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changing. Cautions against imitations. The above, with all articles appertaining to the opticians' trade from the manufacturer.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,

609 Broadway, New York.

Branch at Saratoga Springs, opp. the Post-Office, between United States and American Hotels.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have his NAME WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY ON HIS CLOTHES. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a Solid Silver Badge, with his name engraved on it, payment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. Badges to be deferred to any garment. Address

DROWNE & CO.,

Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

ATTENTION!

THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

$417 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $50. Trade list sent free. Address

J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

J. HAVEN'S PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Travelers, Sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from 37 cents to $3. Sample sent Free on receipt of 37 cents. Send stamp for circular. The fine wholesome frame keeps it away from the face, and the choi electic, or string, keeps it down all round. It don't affect the breathing or sleeping, and is worth the money for its price. HAVEN & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, as Inventor and Patentee have been selling 50 Canton St., N. Y. Room No. 23. Agents wanted in all parts.

$ AGENTS WANTED.

3 MORE NEW ARTICLES now ready. For Catalogue and terms send stamp. RICE & CO., 37 Park Row, N. Y.

Tobacco Twine,

Carpet Warp,

Twine for Hop Vines.

H. A. HARVEY, Twine and Cordage Warehouse, established 1845, 44 94 Maiden Lane, New York.

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Glass Signs and Show Cards, with Frames, low prices. 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST OF THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Restorative.

Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 125 Broadway, Mutual's Building, Worth Street, Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for Circular.

WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet mailed, post-paid, for 25, containing exact copies of advertisements for persons entitled to property. Address or apply to HENRY HAYS, 640 Broadway, N. Y. Costs of arms found, painted and engraved.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Omnipotent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without injury to the skin. Price $1, free by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Printing-Presses for Sale.

One Taylor Drum Cylinder, four Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $1750.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $2000.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

The War in the United States.

A Report to the Swiss Military Department, preceded by a Discourse to the Federal Military Society, assembled at Berne, Aug. 3, 1863. By FERDINAND LECOMTE. Translated from the French by a Staff Officer. 18mo, Cloth, Price $1 00. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Just published by

D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a stimulating oily liquid of Roots, Barks, and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp, and itching of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out, or turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. Sold by druggists everywhere. Put up in a box containing two bottles. Price $1.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,

Depot No. 493 Broadway.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Established, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N.Y. ☞ Established 1840. ☜ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

Our New Major-General.

The character of GEORGE G. MEAD, M. G. C.—with a fine portrait, engraved by Rawdon, Wright, Hatch, and Smith. Physiognomy—How to Estimate Character.

Phrenology—Its Principles, His Heroes and Martyrs.

NATIONAL TYPES—William Cobbett, The Englishman, His Portrait, Character, and sketch of his life.

PHRENOLOGY and the POETS—Some interesting illustrations. LEGAL MEDICINE—Insanity, Moral Insanity, Responsibility.

REMINGTON MANNERS, The Art of Good Behavior.

WHAT DOES IT DO? Uses of Pursuits: Shall we flog our Children? To Correspondents—Negroes—Prolific Diseases—Bleeding—Constipation—Hydrophobia, Gray Hair, Clergymen's Sons, &c., in the August No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL 15 cents, by first post. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Surgeon-General Hammond,

By ordering calomel and destructive Minerals from the supply tables, has conferred a blessing on our sick soldiers. Let him not stop here. Let him order the discontinuance of the "loading," and the use of BRANDRETH'S PILLS in the place thereof. Then will commence a "new era" in the practice of medicine, which would then become emphatically

THE HEALING ART.

PURE BLOOD.

World disease affects us if our blood were pure?

Then BRANDRETH'S PURIFYING PILLS purify the blood, they restore our health, and OVER A HUNDRED YEAR'S the has proved they infallibly purify the blood.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

are purely Vegetable, and innocent as bread, but infallibly

CURE BILIOUS DIARRHŒA,

CHRONIC DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DYSENTERY,

And all Fevers and Affections of the Bowels:

Also Rheumatisms, Affections of the Kidneys and Spleen: their use has a general good effect upon every organ, because they purify the blood. Read following:

CASE OF ROSCOE E. WATSON.

DR. B. BRANDRETH, New York:—

SIR.—I was a private in Company F, Seventeenth Regiment New York Volunteers. While at Harrison's Landing and on the Rappahannock, near Falmouth, I was many of the Company were sick with bilious diarrhœa. The army surgeon did not cure us, and I was reduced to skin and bone. Your Pills were recommended to me by some of members who had worked in your laboratory at Sing Sing. They were not sick, because they used Brandreth's Pills. Some men perished upon me and others in the use the Pills, and we were all cured in from two to five days. After this our boys used Brandreth's Pills for the typhus fever, colds and rheumatisms, and in no case did they fail to restore health.

Out of gratitude to you for my good health I send you this letter, which, if necessary, the entire company will sign.

I am, respectfully yours,

ROSCOE E. WATSON.

JUNE 23, 1863. Sing Sing.

REMEMBER, NEW STYLE INSIDE THE COVERING.

Brandreth's Pills are sold at 25 cents per box, with full directions, by all respectable dealers everywhere.

The same pills, sugar-coated, SIXTY in a box, price 50c., at No. 4 Union Square.

NEW STYLE AT NO. 4, DIRECT FROM LABORATORY.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE BRANDRETH HOUSE,

NEW YORK.

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS of WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and salable Watches in the American market! The article especially deserving public attention at this time is their celebrated

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

This really meritorious imputation has been receiving the most flattering notices of the Press in all parts of the country. The New York Weekly, of July 25d, '63, says: "We have been shown by Messrs. Hubbard Bro., who are the exclusive importers of the article, what they most appropriately term the RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER, being a superbly finished Silver Watch, which is warranted to keep the most accurate time in all climates. The beauty of these timekeepers is only equaled by their cheapness."

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has a heavy solid STERLING SILVER cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $84. Sent by mail, $1 00 additional for postage; if registered, 20 cents extra. Should retail readily at from $2 to $3 00 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Also

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HISTORY OF OUR OWN FACE, OR LIGHT OF GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH EXPERT TIMEKEEPER.

Recently Invented and Patented Improvement.

"The N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 16th, 1863, on page 147, engraves the "Magic Time Observer," shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD BROS., of New York, are the sole importers. We invited the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. Each of the watches we have observed, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for time and reliability that we have ever offered. Fitted and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering it a very saleable article. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer case being of a rich gold. It has the improved lever action lever movement, and is warranted to be an accurate timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $294. Sample of Watches, in case, sent to you for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $35. By mail the postage is 35 cents; if registered, 45 cents additional required.

We have no agents or travelers. Buyers must deal with us direct ordering from this advertisement. Traces, Chains, and Jewelry, manufactures and sold in the United States money or draft payable to our order in this city. If you wish goods sent by express or mail, state the amount of the purchase with your order. Correspondents will please name in the paper from which they make selections, the number or errors that might otherwise occur. Write your address in full. Illustrated Lectures are now being delivered. We are requested to call in person, when it is convenient for them to do so.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published:

JOURNAL OF A RESIDENCE AND A GEORGIAN PLANTATION in 1838–1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST; being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With a Map Embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. Large 12mo, Leather Binding, $3 50.

A THIRD EDITION OF INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York; Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the Author of "The World of Dreams," "Out of the Depths," "The World's Verdict," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ST. OLAVE'S. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. Part IV. Price 25 cents.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The best Popular Fairy Stories selected and rendered anew. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," &c., &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For August, 1863.

The papers of permanent value which have been published in magazine form under a uniform title set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE a desirable acquisition to any portion of private library. The Publishers can supply complete sets, or any Number from the commencement. For Twenty-seven Years HARPER'S MONTHLY has been issued punctual. Any volume, containing six Numbers, bound in Cloth, will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, for Two Dollars and Fifty Cents. Complete sets, now comprising Twenty-six Volumes, uniformly bound, will be sent by express, the purchaser at the charge of the purchaser, for One Dollar and Eighty-eight Cents per Volume.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

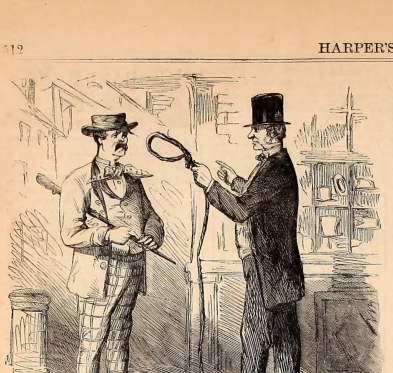
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.



TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 00 each, or $20 for $25.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for each Insertion; and One Dollar per line for Outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

PUBLIC OPINION.

ONE OF "THE PEOPLE."—"No good can come of them Riots we got up, eh? O, bother! look at me New Clothes, and me Hegant new Neck Tie."

MR. PUBLIC OPINION.—"Ah! yes, my friend; but to match the New Clothes, considering how you came by them, allow me to tell you that there is only one kind of Neck Tie—AND HERE IT IS!"

Attention, Army and Navy!
50,000 Agents Wanted.
Army Corps and Division Pins.
Gens. Grant, Banks, Mead,
and all the Generals.
Also
Head-Quarters
FOR
American Watch Chains, Engraved Spring Lockets, Guard and Neck Chains, Bracelets, Seal Stone, Masonic, California Diamond, Plain and Chased Rings, Fine Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, Gents' Fine Gold California Diamond Pin and Cluster Pins with Chain attached, Coral, Opal, Lava, Mosaic, and Jet Enamelled Brooches and Ear Rings, Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, a Solid Silver Shield or other Corps or Division Pin, with your Name, Co., and Regiment handsomely engraved upon it. I will send to any one, on the receipt of $1, either of the above articles, together with my wholesale circular to Agents.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4576. 598 Broadway, N. Y.

Wanted, at $15 per Day.

We want energetic Agents and reliable Canvassers for a genteel business, at a commission of from $3 to $15 per day. No humbug! Address C. M. DUNN & CO., Publishers, at either Cincinnati, O., Chicago, Ill., or 185 Bleecker Street, New York.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF Pimples on the Face, L.Y.D.S.
Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S
YELLOW DOCK SYRUP,
Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Channel, Joint, and Limb.
Use Dating or Public (which often cures).
Depot, 158 CHATHAM ST., N. Y. Sold 592 GRAND St.
Ask for LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1848. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

500 more Agents Wanted,—$5 a day guaranteed, and no capital required. For particulars, send stamp to
J. W. STEPHENS, Morristown, New Jersey.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong; and are exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE A CO.
202 Broadway, New York.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, JOHN B. HOGG, late PRATT, HOGG & CO., 100 William St., N.Y.

A Saving of 20 per cent. by buying Housekeeping Articles at C. D. ROSENFIELD'S Great Bazaar, Cooper Institute, Astor Place, New York.

WATCHES FREE.

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of finer quality. Writing Paper, Envelopes, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers can always earn an Extra Dollar, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Premium for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. Sent "15 per day Easy" on inside page.
S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York. largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

National Union League.

League Pins in Silver Plate, Fine Gold Plate, and Solid Silver, price from $2.50 to $12 per doz. Samples can be sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of $2.50, or single pin for 50 cents. Or upon receipt of $1.00. Our assortment is very fine. Many of our designs have been adopted by different organizations throughout the country. Also a complete assortment of Army Pins and Badges.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,
Manufacturers Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

STAMMERING.

Cured by Bates' Patent relentific appliances the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering, Stuttering, &c. They look like Prize Medal at the last London Exhibition.
For case Edition of Pamphlets and Drawings describing the same, address H. C. I. MEARS, 377 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 5076.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of palm oil, honey, and other articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in a neat case, for $7. Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CLIAS. F. SORTON & CO., 42 Ann Street, New York.

The American Parlor, Or Floor Skate, With Rubber Cushions, Anti-friction Axles, Frederick Stevens, 315 Pearl Street, near Fulton, and 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

Physiognomy.

"Signs of Character" and How to Read them.
Nature. The Perfect Nose. The Confiding Nose. The Economical Nose. Feminine Nose. National Noses. Aristocratic Nose. The German, English, Irish, French, Indian, Negro, and Mongolian Noses. Prolific Ireland and "Noted Noses." Noses of Sculptors.—Perfect Noses.—Double Noses.—a Taper's Nose.—and the end of the Nose.
A HALIAD FOR THE TIMES. Orthodox—Medical College for Women. Being patented. Psychical distinctions of Race. Science and the Arts.—Articles on Ethnology, Physiology, Phrenology, Physiognomy, and on various useful subjects in the Phrenological Journal for August. 15 cents by first post.—by FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y., and know men.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints by writing to Dr. ADEE, 181 Pearl St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,
METROPOLITAN
PURCHASING AGENCY,
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614
NEW YORK CITY.

Union Badge.
PER HUNDRED, $10.00.
SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.
Sent free by Express or Mail.

We will also forward to any address, on receipt of order accompanied by cash, ANY ARTICLE MANUFACTURED, at the LOWEST PRICES: Photographic Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Corps Badges, or any other articles procurable in the City.
We will forward, on receipt of 25 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GILLMORE, BURNSIDE, ROSECRANS, SIGEL, BANKS, SHERMAN, HALLECK, SCHENCK, SICKLES, ASSISTANT SURGEON, DENTIST, or any of the leading OFFICERS in the ARMY and NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PAPER DOMINOES.—This excellent article, in metal, durable, and of convenient size for the more expensive kinds, will relieve the tedium of the Camp and the Hospital. Sent by mail, per mail, post paid, per hundred, 10 cents. Address as above.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.
10 COLLARS FOR 40 CENTS.
THE GENUINE
CLOTH LINED PAPER COLLAR,
At Wholesale and Retail.

Gents' Furnishing Goods.
I have the largest and best assorted stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars wholesale and retail.

SHIRTS
MADE TO ORDER,
The perfect of my establishment. In this department, I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always enabled to give that which will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.

6 for.....$12
6 for..... 15
6 for..... 18
6 for..... 21
Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.

SO FIT! NO SALE!
Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on
CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
Lafarge block. 675 Broadway, N. Y.

BALLOU'S
Patented
French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Warranted to FIT, and to be CHEAPER
for the same qualities and make than those of any other Shirt House in this city.
Circular containing drawings and prices sent free.

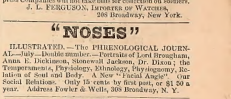
For sale by all the principal dealers throughout the United States.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, New York.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.
Address
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N.Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Selphe's Patent, 516 Broadway, N. Y., are the best substitutes for lost limbs the World of Science has ever invented. (Established 24 years.) Send for Pamphlet. Soldiers supplied.

$22. WATCHES. $22.
A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.



$22. Genuine. $22.
Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.
Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.
J. L. FERGUSON, IMPORTER OF WATCHES,
208 Broadway, New York.

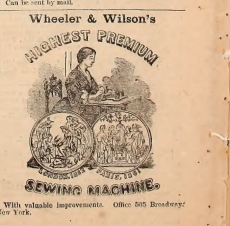
"NOSES"

ILLUSTRATED.—The PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL—July—Double number.—Portraits of Lord Brougham, Anna E. Dickinson, Stonewall Jackson, Dr. Dixon; the Temperaments, Physiognomy, Ethnology, Physiognomy, Relation of Soul and Body. A New "Facial Angle." Our Facial Relations. Only 15 cents by first post, or $1 20 a year. Address Fowler & Wells, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Indelible Pens. Portage, 200 per cent. profit. Superb Watch free to Agents. $10 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATTELL & CO., 99 John St., N.Y.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

GUNS, PISTOLS.
Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N.Y.
15 Rue d'Enghien, Paris.
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.



A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE
For 50 cts. (coin preferred, magnifying small objects 500 times. Free of different power. Sent by Mail, free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.
Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

LADIES & GENT'S STEEL COLLARS AND CUFFS.
ENAMELED WHITE.
Having the appearance and comfort of linen have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are easily cleaned in one minute. To military men or travelers they are invaluable.
Price 25 cents; sent by post on receipt of price.
Wholesale and retail.
S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to dealers.
Agents wanted throughout the country.

WASHINGTON AS COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.
The original of this picture is in possession of
GEN. LEE AT RICHMOND.
It was captured by our forces and returned to its owner by the Government. This copy was made while it was in Washington. It is the only picture extant of Washington in his uniform as Commander-in-Chief, and is probably the best likeness of
THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY.
Just published in card photograph, price 25 cents, by
E. & H. T. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway, N.Y.
Can be sent by mail.

Wheeler & Wilson's

With valuable improvements. Office 505 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 346.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

IN TIME OF WAR.

Tapers are white faces in each sunny street,
And signs of trouble meet us every where;
The nation's pulse hath an unsteady beat,
For scents of battle foul the summer air.

A thrill goes through the city's busy life,
And then—as when a strong man shuts his breath—
A stillness comes; and each one in his place
Waits for the news of triumph, loss, and death.

The "Extras" fall like rain upon a drought,
And startled people crowd around the board
Wherein the nation's sum of loss or gain
In rude and hurried characters is stored.

Perhaps it is a glorious triumph gleam—
An earnest of our Future's recompense;
Perhaps it is a story of defeat,
Which smiteth like a fatal pestilence.

But whether Failure darkens all the land,
Or whether Victory sits its blood ablaze,
An awful cry, a mighty throb of pain,
Shall cause the sweetness from these summer days.

God! how this land grows rich in loyal blood!
Poured out upon it to its utmost length,
The incense of a people's sacrifice—
The wrested offering of a people's strength!

It is the costliest land beneath the sun!
"Its priceless"; purchaseless! And not a rood
But hath its title written clear and signed
In rosee stain here's consecrated blood.

And not a flower that gems its mellowing soil
But thriveth well beneath the holy dew
Of tears, that ease a nation's straining heart,
When the Lord of battles smites it through and through.

MORGAN'S RAID.

We publish below an illustration of the ENTRY OF THE REBEL RAIDER MORGAN INTO THE TOWN OF WASHINGTON, OHIO, on the occasion of his late raid into that STATE. The famous bandit levied pretty freely on the defenseless towns and villages through which he passed, directing his men to provide themselves with food, clothing, horses, and whatever else they wanted. In these respects he treated loyal men and Copperheads with perfect impartiality—rubbing some opponents of "this Abolition war" very thoroughly. We gave in our last number the fact of his capture. We now append the following interesting account of the last excursion of the famous bandit, from the Columbus Journal of July 30:

Yesterday afternoon, in accordance with orders of the War Department, John Morgan and twenty-eight of his command were placed in the Ohio Penitentiary, where they are to be subjected to close confinement until the rebels see proper to release the officers of the Streight and Grierson expedition, now inmates of the Libby Prison at Richmond. The prisoners arrived on the afternoon train from Cincinnati, which stopped at the State Avenue crossing, thus saving the trouble of marching them from the depôt. A detachment of the Provost Guard had been detailed to keep the road from the track to the Penitentiary clear of people —a measure that was absolutely necessary, considering the large crowd that had collected. It required but a few minutes for the Guard, under command of Lieutenant Irwin, to conduct the prisoners to the Penitentiary, when General Mason turned them over to N. Merion, Esq., the Warden, who received the charge with as much grace as the circumstances would allow.

The examination of the prisoners which followed was a tedious process, but was not devoid of interest. It was conducted with due regard for the feelings of the prisoners, and at the same time it was very minute. One fellow was compelled to hand over a watch he had concealed in one of his pantaloon legs, between the lining and the cloth, while others handed over articles, including greenbacks and "Confederate strips." These things will at the proper time be returned to those from whom they were taken, unless they were a part of their stockings in their late raids. Morgan himself had several hundred dollars in money, and what he considered as money, the greater part of which consisted of greenbacks.

As the examination of each prisoner was completed, he was marched to the wash-house, where he was required to give himself a "washing," and from thence he was taken to his cell. Morgan, who was the first one to pass through this ordeal, did so with as much indifference as he could command, which, however, was but little; for as he passed into the ante-room that leads to the cells, his step was far from being as firm as one would expect, notwithstanding his efforts to the contrary. The prisoners are to be governed by the rules of the prison, which will prevent them from talking with each other. Their beards have been shaven in accordance with these rules, and they will doubtless find themselves otherwise inconvenienced by them. They will receive the same treatment as other prisoners receive, which is all they ask, and which is better than has been done to many a Union soldier who has died in some Southern prison. They will be closely confined to their cells, though they will doubtless be allowed to take some exercise each day. We understand that details from the Provost Guard will keep close watch over them.

There were several other facts connected with this matter, which we are compelled to postpone for the present. However, we hope that this retaliatory measure on the part of our authorities will soon have the desired effect to secure the speedy release of the officers of Colonel Streight's expedition, among whom are several citizens of Columbus.

THE CAPTURE AND BOGUS SURRENDER OF MORGAN.

The following letter appears in the Cincinnati Times:

CINCINNATI, Thursday, July 30, 1863.

I overtook Major-General Morgan and his entire force, on the 20th inst., at 3 o'clock P.M. On the first sight of the enemy, I found that he was moving rapidly toward Smith's Ford. I at once commenced a rapid movement to intercept him. I succeeded in my attempt. The result was the surrender of Gen. Morgan's forces to my command.

On my approach to the road on the enemy's front, I observed a flag of truce advancing to me. I proceeded to the spot and asked the bearer what he wanted. He said he demanded a surrender of the militia forces now advancing. I told him at once to return to General Morgan, and tell him that I did not command militia; that I would not surrender, but demanded an unconditional surrender of his entire forces, or I would open fire immediately upon them.

In a few minutes Captain Neil of the Ninth Kentucky cavalry (under my command) came up from my left with Major Steel, of the rebel force, bearing a flag of truce, and stating that General Morgan's forces had already surrendered, and they hoped they would not be fired on. I assured Major Steel that there was no danger while the flag was present.

I at once concluded that the surrender was complete, and remarked to the parties that all should remain quiet until General Shackelford arrived. I then rode forward and met General Morgan under a full belief that the affair was all settled.

It was soon observed by some one that the terms of surrender were made with Captain Burbridge, of the militia, who was a prisoner in Morgan's ranks, he penciling Morgan and his officers to be paroled, and field and line officers to retain their side-arms. On seeing Captain Burbridge, he told me that such was the case. I asked at what time and how long since Morgan had surrendered to him. He said at the same time I myself had intercepted him. This was quite a trick, and I paid no more attention to the affair, but turned John and his party over to General Shackelford, and proceeded to disarm the prisoners, all except the line officers; I let them keep their side-arms for the present, until the Burbridge surrender was further investigated. Burbridge's surrender was a mere ruse.

GEORGE W. RUE,
Major Ninth Kentucky Cavalry.

MORGAN'S RAID—ENTRY OF MORGAN'S FREEBOOTERS INTO WASHINGTON, OHIO.

RUSE DE GUERRE.

So, Phillip, it seems you're offended—
I'll own I've not acted quite right;
But is the occasion sufficient
To stir up your wrath in its might?
If you hadn't appeared so excited,
If you were not so easily teased,
I should never have gone off with Charlie—
But you knew I would do as I pleased!

Great Mogul! am I your Sultana,
To come and to go at command?
How you could imagine I feared you
Is a thing that I don't understand;
If you hadn't assumed le dictateur
With such an imperial air,
I should never have thought of offending—
But your face it said, "Go if you dare!"

Shall I own that the mirth and the music
Of that night were all lost upon me?
Even Charlie's low tones were unheeded—
Ah! I thought of one dearer than he!
While you were resolving to cast me
Beyond the confines of your heart,
I sighed in the midst of rejoicing
That you in the scene had no part.

One kind look—my heart would have softened;
One whisper—my tears had burst forth!
But your words in their bitter upbraiding—
Ah! they stifled regret at its birth;
And my spirit, all tameless, rose proudly,
Indignation gave strength to each nerve;
I knew I was wrong, but, oh, surely,
I'd done nothing such wrath to deserve.

Now, Phillip, you know that I love you,
In spite of the notions you take!
And my pout is ashing right sadly,
But I don't think 'tis likely to break.
'Tis a pity, I'll own—and reads badly!
But 'tis the material's tough—
I'm not going to die, man oter Phillip,
Because—you don't love me enough!

You know you are perfectly killing!
Addie Bell is aware of it too;
She's tender and kind and clinging,
And then—she is dying for you!
If you love her, I'm perfectly willing
To her slip into my place;
I never had half so much sweetness,
Nor half so much languishing grace.

So, Phillip, you're welcome to dangle
Around that "dear amiable girl,"
You're welcome to praise in my hearing
The tint and the twine of each curl;
You're perfectly welcome to whisper
The sweetest of things—when I'm by
I'm content if you find your elysium
In the light of her pretty blue eye.

You can't make me jealous, cher Phillip!
There's no use in trying that game;
You might die of spontaneous combustion—
'Twould be hard to put me in a flame!
So I think you had better consider;
Don't be rash, but come back while you can,
For I think—and am I mistaken?—
That you are a sensible man.

My position at present is trying;
Poor Charlie but lives in my sight—
And that handsome, distinguished Lieutenant
Was very attentive last night!
And Addie told Lou, in a whisper,
She really preferred him to you.
Ah, Phillip, he's terribly handsome,
And his eyes are so tenderly blue!

So you see how the matter stands, Phillip,
'Tis't Addie with whom you've to deal;
You can't vote on me by your rattling—
I can cleverly hide what I feel;
So if you're pretending, you'd better
Be wise, and come back while you can;
For I think—and am I mistaken?—
That you are a sensible man.

[Variations in the shape of a shower of tears.]

Come back if you love me, dear Phillip,
I'm willing to own I was wrong!
I give up, for my spirit is broken—
I'm missing you all the day long.
So Phillip, now you consider,
And decide to come back while you can?
For I think—and am I mistaken?—
That you are a sensible man.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1863.

THE SITUATION.

THOUGH it is not certain that Meade may not at any time attack Lee, or Lee Meade, yet still the presumption is that active operations in the field have come for the present along the whole line. Grant has permitted a large number of his troops to go home on furlough. Rosecrans evidently means no further advance at present, and is devoting himself to the work of reconstruction in Tennessee. And there is very little reason to believe that in the present dog days, with matters as they are, either Meade or Lee would gain much by risking another battle. The prospect is that the month of August will be a month of inaction.

Every where except at Charleston. There, under a tropical sun, and upon the burning sands of sea-islands, a handful of gallant men, led by Gilmore, and ably seconded by our ironclad navy, are slowly but surely undermining the rebel stronghold—the nursery of treason. It is the story of Fort Henry, and Fort Donelson, and Fort Pulaski, and Vicksburg, and Port Hudson over again. Slow but sure approaches; desperate, unsuccessful assaults; a gradual accumulation of power in the shape of men and guns; a steady tightening of the grip round the rebel throat; a dogged Northern tenacity against which Southern fire burns itself out; and at last "unconditional surrender"—such has been the uniform history of all these sieges, and such we doubt not, will be the history of the siege of Charleston. It is due to the Administration to say that they have never shoved any tardiness, on their account, in supplanting the hands of the General in command. Troops were forwarded to Grant before Donelson, and again before Vicksburg, as soon as he could use them; Gilmore, at Pulaski, got all the guns he needed as fast as he could place them in position; and now we have reason to believe that the resources of the Government are being strained to the utmost to give him what he wants at Charleston. The capture of Fort Sumter will probably do as much for the science of artillery as that of Pulaski did.

In four or five weeks the other armies will move, and then the word will be, Ho for Mobile, Chattanooga, and Richmond! Now the centre of interest is Charleston.

THE REBEL WAR-PIRATES.

MR. RICHARD COBDEN, one of the few Englishmen who are not entirely blinded by the prospect of securing the carrying trade of the world for British vessels, declared the other day in Parliament that Laird, the ship-builder, is about to launch two more ships of war for the rebels, and that if they got to sea successfully the United States would declare war on England.

We think Mr. Cobden is mistaken in supposing that we are now at war with England at present. The addition of two more vessels to the Anglo-Rebel fleet now afloat will not inflict much injury upon us. We have already sufficed about as much as piracy can inflict. Our merchant navy has been practically driven from the seas. The insurance on goods shipped in American bottoms goes to 5 per cent.—a premium which effectually drives our ships out of the market. A large proportion of our finest vessels have been sold to foreign flags, and of the remainder the bulk lie idle in port. There are still, of course, a good many American vessels afloat in one sea or other, and five pirates will probably capture a dozen of them than three could. But the additional risk and damage will not justify Mr. Lincoln in complicating his present embarrassments by a declaration of war against Great Britain. So far as the immediate present is concerned, John Bull can pursue the piratical business in which he is engaged without fear of any other punishment than the scorn and contempt of all honest men.

After we have accomplished the work we have in hand, and re-established the national authority over every foot of the national domain, we shall then seek a reckoning with England. And this is a kind of claim which does not lose by keeping, and which will be barred by no statute of limitations. Mr. Cobden was quite right in saying that the United States Government is keeping an exact account of the value of every American ship destroyed by the Anglo-Rebel pirates, with the fixed purpose of presenting the bill to the British Government in due time, and collecting payment thereof. If the present Government or its successor were disposed to neglect this duty, the people would remind them of it. Each separate report of the destruction of an American ship by the British pirates Alabama, Florida, and Georgia; each account of the attentions bestowed upon the rebel officers, and the assistance afforded them by the Government of Her Majesty; each magnanimous lie uttered in Parliament by members of the Government and their supporters; each smirking gratification displayed by Lord Palmerston to excuse the piratical ventures of his countrymen, sinks deep into the memory of every American, and will be treasured up till the day comes for retribution.

The experience of this war has proved that the restraints of municipal law are inadequate to control the mercenary instincts of Englishmen. The Neutrality Act, if carried out in England as it was in this country during the Russian war, would have prevented the departure of a single pirate from British waters. But as Mr. Under-Secretary Layard says, this would have crippled "a most useful and important branch of British industry," and many other parties, from the ministers of the crown down to the Liverpool rabble, combined to defeat the object of the law and to render it a mere dead letter. We must have better security hereafter than a municipal law.

This war has also taught us the wisdom of the policy recommended by many of our leading men in 1812, when they urged upon the Government the necessity of seizing Bermuda and Nassau. Those nests of pirates, peopled by the illegitimate offspring of treason and smuggling, are too near our shores to be under any other flag than our own. When the time comes for our Minister to present his little bill for the ships destroyed by British pirates, the title to these islands will also be placed in suit, and if war comes their fate will be quickly settled.

We have very little apprehension of war with Great Britain. If we put down the rebellion, and then, with a large army and a large fleet of iron-clads to support our claims, demand the indemnity to which we are entitled, and the material guarantees which our safety requires, in the shape of a cession of Nassau and Bermuda, and the Virgin Islands, and Canada, John Bull will blunter mightily, but he will yield at last. He never fights except for dollars. Greed of gain drove him into the piratical business, and greed of gain will turn him about face when we are able to lay our hand on his throat. Had he believed for a moment that the United States would succeed in this war, he would never have allowed a pirate to sail; when he finds that we have succeeded, he will be as humble as he is now arrogant; and with many declarations of his abiding regard for his good customers in the United States will pay his little bill with a grimace, inwardly groaning over his own stupidity at having formed so blundering a calculation of the future of the American War.

THE LOUNGER.

THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

THE Government of the United States, after sagacious deliberation and taught by events, has perfected a policy for the suppression of the rebellion which seeks to overthrow. That policy is not with the use of all the measures that a state of war may render necessary. It makes war under the Constitution, which simply grants the power, leaving the method to the exigency of circumstances. The Constitution does not prescribe making war by an army and navy, by killing people or maiming them, by confiscation acts or emancipation of slaves. The Constitution authorizes the Government to make war, but it leaves entirely to it to select the means at its discretion. But that there may be no doubt that every means whatever may be used in prosecuting the war, the Constitution expressly declares that, when the public safety requires it, the writ of habeas corpus, the most sacred security of the most fundamental right, that of personal liberty, may be suspended.

In pursuance of this authority the Government has adopted and proclaimed its policy. It consists of war by sea and land; of measures of confiscation, conscription, and emancipation. It is a policy adopted after long reflection, after a universal public debate. Every part of the loyal country, through its orators, its press, its representatives, conventions, and senators, has discussed the question. The President, a singularly dispassionate man, examining every proposition with the utmost conscious that to the strongest friends of the policy which seemed to him wisest and most necessary he must also be most merciful and hearted, after holding the hands of his impetuous lieutenants and delaying and pondering long, at last confirmed his policy which all the stages we must examine by and effectively, but which also causes the war itself to destroy the root of the war.

This policy was matured and adopted in the full consciousness that it would not conciliate the rebels in arms, and would afford their friends in the loyal States no plea for their secret incoherent and furious declamation. The declaration of any policy whatever must have had the same effect. For so long as the rebels were united, so long as it was a matter of mere fighting in the field, the rebels could continue it until they saw that they were vowed to ruin, they could give it up, and reunite with their late political friends with whom they had chosen to quarrel, in order that they might have a chance to vote for Mr. Vallandigham.

The policy of the Government has entirely ruined this scheme. The policy which declares that some permanent and adequate blessing to the country shall be purchased by the great outlay for the war; that the priceless lives of the noblest youth shall not be lost in vain; and that over their graves Davis and Company shall not step smilingly back to Washington to have another trial of craft when that of muscle shall have failed. It is a policy which exasperates the friends of the rebels at the North, so that they gnash their teeth with rage. It is a policy which leads them to play with fire. They nominate Vallandigham, an open rebel, but not armed, because he can better serve the rebellion without arms, for Governor of a loyal, free State. They smile at the success of the worst criminals, burning, pillaging, and massacring, as a "movement of the people," and a "great popular uprising." They hear with satisfaction that they can not conceal of the misfortune of their country, and refuse to the last to believe the victories of the national flag. It is a policy at which the rebels tremble, and which thoroughly unmasks their allies at the North.

Meanwhile, under this policy, the Government of the United States has its hand upon the throat of this rebellion, and forces a future of peace and compensation for the war. The policy does not unite the North, indeed, and no policy could. Had another been adopted, the North would still have been divided. A timorous and superficial policy, while it might have propitiated desperate political partisans, who would have seen in the fear and weakness of the Government the promise of their own success, would have arrayed against that Government a party formidable for its intelligence, earnestness, and force. In making war upon the rebels the Government was obliged, therefore, to make its choice between two parties at the North. It must have relied either upon those who wished the rebellion abandoned and both sides destroyed by every power of war, or upon those who wished to give the rebels a chance to do by intrigue what they might fail to achieve by force. The Government has made its choice. It has preferred Joseph Holt to Clement L. Vallandigham, and to free slaves rather than to return them. It has chosen to believe in its own majesty and resources, and in the good doctrine of the human heart which it was bound to illustrate and enlarge, and to believe in itself and in that principle as soberly, resolutely, and religiously as the rebellion believes in its annihilation of human rights, which it was established to obtain. The enemies of that Government, and therefore of the people, are rebels and Copperheads. What the Copperheads say the rebels applaud. What the rebels do the Copperheads cheer. The friends of that Government have all thought, patriotic citizens, who wish that this war shall make any similar war impossible, and who, knowing what caused the war, are aware that the cause shall cease to exist. If these citizens are, as we have no doubt, the vast majority of the people of this country, the Government will be saved and permanent peace established, although the process may be long. If, on the other hand, the Copperheads and rebels are the most numerous and powerful, then, either by force of arms or by political combination, the Government, as made and interpreted by its framers, and understood by every true American to-day, will be overthrown, and another, although possibly called by the same name—a system of which the cornerstone is injustice, and not equal rights, will be practically established upon its ruins.

TREATMENT OF CAPTURED COLORED SOLDIERS.

AFTER the assault upon Fort Wagner there was the usual number of rumors that the rebels were to negotiate for the care of the wounded and the exchange of prisoners. The Government officer said to the rebel agent that the officers and men of the colored regiments were to be treated like all others. The rebel agent replied that that was a question for the consideration of his superiors.

That may be, but it is no question for the Government of the United States. Not only do its articles of war provide for the equal play upon the part of the enemy, but its honor is inexorably associated with the enforcement of those articles; and the Government is bound to be especially alert in the case of these prisoners, because they are peculiarly assailable. It must take nothing for granted but the ill-faith of the rebels. Their spirit is sufficiently shown by the amusing indignation they express at our employment of colored soldiers, and the poor insult they intended for Colonel Shaw of the Massachusetts Fifty-fourth, by placing him under a scene of his own race. Where else could he be so nobly and fitly buried? With those devoted soldiers of his and of the country, and for them and the country, he faced that storm of rebel fire, and died smiling. Where should he be buried but with them? On all the hill of South Carolina there is no grave so holy and prophetic as that grave. But the malice of the rebels is not less, and their spirit is apparent; and with the officers and soldiers of the colored regiments will be treated as honorable prisoners is a hopeless expectation.

We have seen men to fight for us. We did not give them an equal pay with other soldiers; we did not allot to them the offices of honor; we did not give to the flag whose presence is doubtfully concede to them; we required, in a word, of these men, whom our prejudices have hitherto kept in every conceivable disadvantage, the qualities that only the proudest and most self-dependent people show, and we promised them but a very uncertain reward for all their fighting. Yet there is not a man who has dispassionately studied the subject, who does not know that for many a year we must maintain a colored army, and that that very fact furnishes a solution of some of the most embarrassing questions that the Administration has begun. The discipline, endurance, and fiery heroism of these troops are already established. The charge of the Second Louisiana, and of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts at Fort Wagner, are magnificent for their steadiness, impetuosity, and dauntless courage. Were we as deficient as these soldiers our difficulties would disappear.

Now then is the time to show every colored man in the land whether we are in earnest, or whether he would be simply a fool to fight for a flag which does not protect him. How can a solitary man of that race, except the few sublimely heroic, enlist, until he knows the fate of his brethren captured at Wagner? Or how can we ask any man whatever to imperil his life for us, without promising him equal fate with every other man? The Government can not evade the question. Already the rebel journals declare that if the colored prisoners are treated as prisoners of war, their fate may be as well abandoned at once. And the rebel Congress have long since doomed every officer of our colored regiments to the gallows, and every soldier to the slave pen.

It will, of course, be difficult for the Government to ascertain the fate of these unfortunate men. But it should not suffer itself to be cozened by the rebels. It should at once demand from the rebel President an explicit guarantee of the same treatment that all our soldiers in their hands receive, and the rebels should be apprised that an instant answer must be made. After due delay, if the Government should find that the natural suspicion of foul play is correct, then if its retaliation is swift, sure, and deadly, if the rebels are not taught, as by fire, that every man who fights beneath the national flag is equally protected by the people whose sovereignty that flag symbolizes, we are simply unworthy of success.

THE VOICE OF THE CHARMER.

The incessant efforts which the rebels administer to their allies at the North do not discomfort that amiable body. The truth is that they are used to it. The good old days when the present Southern traitors ruled the Government they snubbed imperiously their followers from the free States, and now that they are trying to ruin it, by the mere force of habit they kick contemptuously their henchmen of the North.

Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire—a name which is even more infamous in our history than that of James Buchanan, a man who was selected by the present traitors before the consummation of their treason, as the most servile of all their tools in the free States, and therefore the most serviceable, has been stealthily did their dirtiest work without making a single wry face as Buchanan did—descended the last Fourth of July by making a speech in which he abused the Administration and all loyal citizens, excused and justified the rebellion, and threatened a counter-revolution. Of course he said that his heart's desire was Union with the dominance of slavery, and talked of recontruction by pacific methods.

But his quondam masters are appalled at the impudence of their Helot. "What! when we have declared our right to secede and to establish independent government, and, in general, to have our own way as usual, do you pretend to contest our decision and talk of reunion and reconstruction? Know your place, fellow! Didn't we tell Valandigham that we would trade with him, holding our noses? Do we tell you that we would secede or be chained to a corpse than again enter the Union with you and the rest of the rubbish that we used so long as we found it serviceable, but which we always as heartily despised as we do at this moment. Crawl out of our sight, and let us hear no more Union or reunion from you!"

But the patient crew take the snubbing and the sneering philosophically. They believe that by-and-by even Pierce will make the best terms they can. They can not persuade themselves that the rebellion is other than a political trick. "Come back, brethren," they cry, "and have your way as you always did, and always shall, and always ought to. Come back, and see in what a still fouler slime of obsequiousness we can wallow. Just try us. And we will wait until you are ready, as in our duty."

The door mat cries to the passenger to come in out of the mud. But he pushes on unheeding. The faithful mat does not despair. When the mud is deeper, it says to itself, he will be obliged to come in, and then he will wipe his boots on me, and I shall be happy.

A PLAIN ANSWER TO A PLAIN QUESTION.

After maligning the Administration and meeting at every measure adopted to suppress the rebellion—after declaring that Mr. Lincoln is as much a traitor to his country and the Constitution as Jeff Davis—after doing their utmost to destroy public confidence in the honest and patriotic conduct of the war—after espousing with fierce ardor the cause of the rebel sympathizer and abettor in the North—after declaring that there is more respect for personal rights under the sway of the rebellion than under the Government of the United States—after denouncing the war as wicked and fratricidal, and frankly declaring that they are striving to secure a party, assuming to be the Democratic party, to power—after doing all that Davis himself would have done, and exactly in the way that he would direct, the Copperheads turn upon loyal citizens of the United States and with an air of injured dignity demand to know whether there is any question about their loyalty.

None at all. No man at the North or South has any doubt upon the subject. "Virtue, Sir," cried a man in the town to a gentleman who had made some remarks in her hearing, "do you mean to insinuate that there is the least doubt of my virtue?"

"Not the least, Madame," was his satisfactory reply.

WITHIN AND WITHOUT.

By way of exposing the grinding and hopeless tattoo of the "Union Despotism" our Copperhead friends are fond of extolling the superior freedom of the rebel society. It seems at first sight to be inconsistent that people who in profound peace never hesitated to destroy every vestige of the Constitutional right of free speech should in time of desperate war absolutely secure it. It is also singular, at first blush, that a community in which street fights and amateur assassinations were familiar in quiet times should during war be so composed as to challenge the admiration of the victims of the latter institution at Washington."

The amusing absurdity of this effort to help Jeff Davis and the gentry who have combined against this Government, is exposed by the book of Colonel Estvan, an ex-officer of the rebel army. "A fearful state of things now grew up in Richmond," he says. "Assassination and murder were the order of the day." "An imprudent word heard by one of the secret police agents, who were always spying about to get men into their clutches, was sufficient to bring the speaker before the Provost Marshal and from thence to prison." "Many an honest citizen in this fearful time offered up a heart-felt prayer to Heaven, 'Preserve me, O Lord, from my friends, for I have to fear of the enemy.'"

Colonel Estvan, a rebel officer, had the advantage of seeing things as they were, and he tells us how they were. Copperhead friends merely tell us not what is true, but what they would like to have us believe, in order that the rebellion may seem less tyrannical and revolting than it is.

HOW TO DO IT.

The key of the present political situation is the fear of certain parties lest the Union should not be restored until slavery is practically abolished. They are therefore for dulcet words and velvet measures, in order that as the rebels may lay down their arms in a gush of fraternal emotion, and that they may count upon the united vote of the rebel States for the return of their measures. Shorn of their Southern alliance, and deserted by the patriotic in their Northern ranks, how could these leaders hope to control before the people? They insist, therefore, for it is their only salvation, that the President shall invite the rebel States to return to their duty, and they further insist that the Government, in other words, the loyal people of the United States, can offer no terms other than the Constitution and the laws. We have recently seen this statement, almost in the same words, in several papers which are very anxious that the Union shall be saved, provided that slavery is saved also.

They may be very tranquil. The Government of the United States will offer the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance of it to every rebel in the land. And the rebel and the rebel's friends should endeavor to remember that as the war was essentially waged to subdue rebellion, so every measure which the exigency of war demanded was not less constitutional, the Government of war was constitutionally and of necessity the judge of the exigency, and that, in the course of the war and under the Constitution, the rebels have lost all rights in the United States. The Constitution and the laws in pursuance of it, which are offered to the rebels, therefore, include all the war measures as much as they include the three-fifths representation or the revenue law.

Thus when the friends of the rebels say that nothing can be offered as terms but the Constitution, they are correct if they mean what they say—they are correct if they mean that the Constitution, and the whole Constitution, and nothing but the Constitution, as construed by the courts of the United States, will secure their future peace and the restoration of their property or any measures as they choose. The Government which they will not have allowed a fierce rebellion to overthrow the Government will not be driven by logical jugale to undermine. General Pemberton and his thirty thousand men late of Vicksburg, and General Lee's army late of Pennsylvania, late of Port Hudson, for instance, are not very likely to be admitted by a nation in its senses to an equal vote with loyal citizens because they have already taught us. Lee was a cavalry Colonel in our service; Joe Johnston was Quarter-master-General; Sidney Johnston was Colonel of Cavalry. Their honorable obligation could bind them, it might be supposed that the flag of their country was its symbol. We have been shamefully undeceived. Could there be any more stringent oath than that of Davis, Slidell, and Mason, sworn legislators, Heaven knows in the name of the country? Have they not taught us the value of that oath? Would Floyd's promise to-morrow to be a faithful citizen be more sacred than his oath before God to the Government six years ago? Judicious Copperheads will see that Toombs has given us no reason to suppose that he will be a good boy because he is sorry. They will insist that he loves his Uncle Samuel very much. But, under the circumstances, his uncle is too sensible a man to take any such view. He prefers to ask how many dollars we pity the poor, "Robert, how much do you love me?"

CIVET WANTED.

The rebels on Morris Island complain that they had to fight colored soldiers. These whippers of women and children are fond of crying for help themselves as "gentlemen," think themselves dishonored by fighting with honest men who earn their living by the sweat of the brow and their children. Of course the Government of the United States will not hesitate to recall all its colored soldiers. Of course it is strictly magnanimous to meet rebels with rifles held by any other than lily-white hands. Of course "Conservatism" will have to move in the matter, and possibly get writing brethren, the "gentlemen" of South Carolina or of Texas and Arkansas, shall not be so sadly annoyed. An ounce of civet is worth a pound. These precious chevaliers do not find it distasteful to beget mulatto children, but to be exposed to a musket in the hands of a colored man, "is positively shocking to their sensibilities."

"ROMOLA."

We have before mentioned this noble story while it was serially appearing in Harper's Magazine. It is now issued in a volume, and every reader of "Adam Bede" and "The Mill on the Floss" will be surprised by the new power developed by the author.

To call "Romola" the finest historical novel yet written may seem a rather vague and general praise; but the reason why we should hesitate to do so is not that we have any doubt of it, but because it seems a needless praise. It is not necessary to undervalue its remarkable creative power. Tito Melema and Romola, the hero and heroine, are drawn with no subtle and earnest a hand, and the coloring of the whole book is so gorgeous and sombre, that it is a spell from which the imagination is not easily released. Every page is a witness of the faithful study and careful thought with which the work has been prepared; and the claims of Miss Evans to the first rank among English novelists are now established beyond question.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

The following Major-Generals are without commands:

1. Major-General George B. M'Clellan.
2. Major-General John C. Fremont.
3. Major-General Benjamin F. Butler.
4. Major-General Joseph Hooker.
5. Major-General David Hunter.
6. Major-General Don Carlos Buell.
7. Major-General Irwin M'Dowell.
8. Major-General Robert A. Mackenzie.
9. Major-General Samuel R. Curtis.
10. Major-General Alexander W. Mahlon.
11. Major-General R. H. Milroy.

The New Colonel Thomas W. Sherwood Higginson, of Worcester, the pioneer commander of a negro regiment in the war, raised that dignity as a brief furlough on 30th ult.

A picnic and ball were given on Saturday last by Colonel Sir Percy Wyndham and staff, at the cavalry headquarters at Warrenton. Invitations were accepted by most of the prominent officials, civil and military. It was an elegant affair.

The United States gun-boat Mahaska left this port on 31st ult., for the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron. She is commanded by Captain Crayton, U. S. N.

Brigadier-General Devens has been assigned to the Department of the West. He will at once proceed to Ohio, and take command of all the cavalry in that Department. Captain R. M. Sawyer, U. S. A., Captain Captain D. E. Harder, of Ohio, accompany him—the former as Assistant Adjutant-General, and the latter as Aid-de-Camp.

Captain Dahlgren, formerly of General Hooker's staff, who was wounded at Hagerstown, has had his foot amputated, and was on 30th ult. very low. He has since improved somewhat.

General Halleck was making calls in Washington on 30th ult. He is said to be about to take a command.

General Sprague is at the head of the Cavalry Bureau about to be organized in the War Department. His appointment insures thorough organization and the future efficiency of that branch of service.

Brigadier-General Griffin, who has commanded the Fifth Army Corps since the removal of General Meade's post, has resigned for some cause not stated. As Captain of the battery which bears his name, General Griffin did excellent service in the first battle of Bull Run, but he has not been conspicuous in command of a corps since the battle of Mechanicsville, on the Peninsula. He assumed the command of the Fifth Corps, relieved a short time before the first battle of Fredericksburg.

Adjutant-General L. Thomas has been relieved from duty on the Mississippi, and is now in New York, and by Doctor-General D. B. Rackett detailed in his stead.

Commander Daniel Ammen has been appointed by the President Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance in the Navy Department at Washington.

Adjutant-General Thomas has left for the West, to organize more negro regiments. He will proceed directly to Memphis, and thence to Cairo, via New Orleans, organizing regiments all along the River. He will be gone three weeks. He is accompanied by his son, Lieutenant Thomas, Mr. J. A. Ware, late editor of the Chronicle, accompanies him as Fifteen Hundred Dollar Clerk.

To the list of dismissals from the military service for disloyal conduct, published in our last number, are added the following:

Major Edward C. O. Hallee, Seventh United States Infantry, for disloyal conduct and the utterance of disloyal sentiments.

Captain H. P. Mitchell, Eleventh New York heavy artillery, for repeated utterances of treasonable and disloyal sentiments.

Captain William H. Butler, Nineteenth Ohio Volunteers, for disloyal conduct and disloyal sentiments.

Captain George F. Emmons has been detached from the command of the Monongahela and ordered as fleet captain of the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Commander J. H. Strong has been ordered to the command of the Monongahela.

The iron-clad Weehawken was launched from Rowland's ship-yard, Greenpoint, on Wednesday morning. A large number of ladies and gentlemen were present to witness the ceremony. In the displacement of the blocks Jarvis Rowland, the foreman, was caught between the ways and seriously injured; two other workmen were slightly injured. Excepting these accidents the launch was all that could be desired.

Lieutenant-Colonel Francis O. Wyse, Fourth United States Artillery, has resigned, and his resignation has been accepted.

Lieutenant-Colonel James A. Hardie has been appointed Assistant Inspector-General, in place Brigadier-General Cuyler, ordered to New York.

The United States steamer Memphis sailed from Hampton Roads on the 29th, for Charleston.

The United States steam-sloop Oneida captured on the 26th of July the rebel steamer Fox, from Nassau, laden with cotton, blockade-runners, from Mobile. The United States steamer Tioga, on the coast of Texas, on the 7th ult. chased two small vessels, both of which ran ashore and were fired by our men to prevent the enemy from saving them. Their cargoes consisted of cotton.

The unfortunate affair at Key West, a party of which Major-General Hitchcock was President, in the case of Harris R. Cambell, charged with the murder of Lieutenant Wood, resulted in a verdict of "Not Guilty." As the finding of the court is not considered to be in accordance with the testimony and facts, the War Department issued an order dissolving the court and severely censuring its members.

A grand artillery review of the different batteries stationed at Camp Barry, near Washington, General Casey commanding, took place last week, on the parade-ground north of Fort Slocum. Batteries Edgerton and Barry, Chief of Artillery, with their staffs, were present. Every thing passed off satisfactorily, with the exception of an accident by which two men were thrown off a caisson and seriously injured.

Captain Frank A. Gethers, Co. E, Third Pennsylvania, has been cashiered for cowardice.

The unfortunate Lieutenant and soldiers on Saturday united in paying the last tribute of respect to the remains of the late Brigadier-General Ward. Thousands who fell from wounds received in the assault upon Port Wagner, moved yesterday to the grave. The funeral took place from St. Paul's Methodist Church, Fourth Avenue, and the procession was a magnificent and touching display of the life and character of the deceased. A large procession of citizens from Brooklyn and Newburgh, where the remains of the gallant soldier were interred with military honors.

Lieutenant Robert Stuart, Second New York cavalry, was accidentally drowned on 30th ult., while officer of the day, at Warrenton cavalry brigade, of General Gregg's division. He was a very fine officer, and much beloved by all his brother officers. He was from Rodyn, Long Island, and a brother of Hon. David Stuart, of Illinois, formerly a member of Congress. He was buried with a Colonel commanding a brigade with General Grant. Captain Dowdigg, of his company, left on 31st with his body, which was embalmed by Brown & Alexander, of Washington, and forwarded to New York. He will be buried in Detroit.

Colonel A. A. Wise, Chief of the Ordnance Bureau, Navy Department, has left Washington for the North, to procure guns and ammunition to complete the siege of Charleston.

Theodore F. Allen, of Philadelphia, has been appointed Additional Paymaster in the United States Army, with the rank of Captain, and assigned to duty at General Meade's headquarters. His predecessor, Captain Cox, is made Assistant Chief Commissary of the Army of the Potomac, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel.

The official report of General Grant's operations at Vicksburg reached Washington last week. It is said to be one of the most interesting reports ever made to the head-quarters of the army.

Lieutenant Monroe Forster, United States Navy, has been detached from the Pawnee, and appointed by Admiral Dahlgren Flag-Lieutenant of the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Acting-Master John O. Osmond has been dismissed from the navy.

Lieutenants Nolan and Wilkes, the former of the Sixth and the latter of the Fifth United States cavalry, were married in General Bryan's fight at Culpepper on Saturday.

DOMESTIC INTELIGENCE.

AFFAIRS AT CHARLESTON.

Beauregard reports heavy bombardment dispatches to the 31st ult. Cumming's Point was bombarded on the 30th for twelve hours. Fort Wagner, Gregg, Sumter, Cumming's Point, and two Monitors, Ironsides and Weehawken, Wagner, and Gregg were replied to. Seven were killed and one wounded in Battery Gregg. On the next morning all were brought to the main land. Beauregard the Union works on Morris Island; Fort Wagner kept up the fire until 2 o'clock. No report of casualties.

GENERAL GILMORE'S LOSSES.

General Gilmore reports his loss in the action on Morris Island on 10th, 11th, and 18th of July, at 650 killed and wounded. He estimates the missing at 300, making a total loss of 950.

THE CAMPAIGN IN THE SOUTHWEST.

Memphis dispatches of the 29th of July state that General Sherman's army had said to be on Pearl River, a few miles west of Meridian, where fortifications are being thrown up. General Sherman will make the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, from Okolona on the north to Mobile on the south, his line of defence. He is said to have received large reinforcements from Bragg's army. Mississippi is virtually abandoned by the rebels. The rebel forces in the state from Mississippi to Alabama and Georgia has been carried to such an extent that the Governors of those States have issued proclamations forbidding their further introduction. General Johnston's rebel rabble is said to have formed a large number back. All is quiet at Port Hudson and Vicksburg. Reinforcements from the North are being strengthened, and the enlistment of negro troops is progressing rapidly.

FIGHT NEAR CULPEPPER.

A reconnoissance made by General Buford with his cavalry command across the Rappahannock on Saturday, confirms the report of the concentration of Lee's force near Culpepper. Two men crossed at the Railroad Station, and driving Stuart's cavalry before them, advanced to the centre of Culpepper, where a heavy rebel force was encountered. The fight was severe, and lasted until dusk, when General Buford withdrew to a strong position east of Stuart's position. The losses on both sides were considerable.

DISAFFECTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Disaffection with Davis and his Confederacy in North Carolina is growing rapidly. The Raleigh Standard denounces Davis as a dictator in whom no confidence can be placed, and predicts the failure of his attempt to set up a government. The Richmond Enquirer, alarmed by the covert specimen of an Irishman John Mitchell, elucidates for the benefit of the Raleigh paper the doctrine of the Supreme Court. The latter defies the Richmond powers and says that Government is created by the rebel Court and the paper also, and must force with force. The Standard denounces the Court as the bugaboo of the North as the agent of Great Britain seeking to divide this country. Meanwhile the Richmond Government and the rebel armies, of whom 40,000 have been killed and wounded, are fighting. Everybody says the States should be Northington at once to locate with terms of reconciliation can be made.

RETALIATION.

The Government gives notice that the law of retaliation is to be fully carried out. Every case of ill-treatment of our officers or men, by the rebels, is to be visited in kind—hanging for hanging, shooting for shooting, imprisonment for imprisonment. If a black soldier is taken prisoner and sold into slavery, a rebel officer will be confined at hard labor in the mines, there to remain until the black soldier shall be liberated.

KENTUCKY UNDER MARTIAL LAW

General Burnside, having become satisfied that one object of the rebel incursion into that State is to overawe the loyal citizens, and intimidate voters, was about enforcing the election of delegal candidates, at the election on the 3rd inst., by placing the State under the order martial law. All military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in the preservation of the laws and the purity of suffrage, and the Election Judges will be sworn to their duties. The election appears to have been a great Union victory.

DEATH OF YANCEY.

Richmond papers announce the death of Wm. L. Yancey, one of the first and fiercest leaders of secession. He was born in Columbia, South Carolina, in 1815, but made Alabama his home. In 1850 he urged the Legislature of Alabama to call a State Convention in case a Republican President should be elected. In 1860 he was a member of the Charleston Convention, and was among the earliest of the seceding delegates. He went to work for Confederacy, and came even to New York, where he spoke in favor of a coalition of all factions to beat Lincoln. In December he was a leading spirit in the Alabama Convention and reported the ordinance of secession. He was sent as Commissioner of the Confederacy to Europe to plead for aid, but returned in February, 1862, disgusted with the blockade, and took his seat as a Senator in the Confederate Congress.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

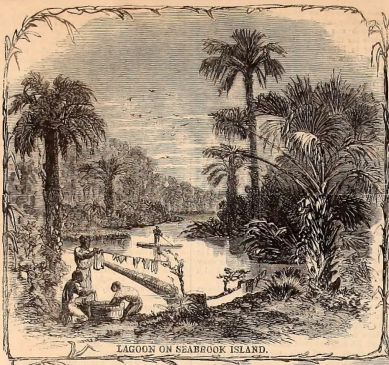
THE NEUTRALITY LAW.

The House of Commons has had another important debate on the Foreign Enlistment Act. Mr. Bright moved the Government to put a stop to the fitting out of privateers, as the American Government had done. He condemned an indemnification from England for every vessel that the Government had destroyed or would destroy. Mr. Layard and Lord Palmerston defended the conduct of the English Government. Mr. Gregory, who drew the decision to read a letter from Secretary Welles, who, in reply to a statement of Mr. Laird's that he had received an offer in 1861 to build vessels for the Federals, denied that directly or indirectly any application had been made to Mr. Laird by his order, and that he had always declined the numerous applications of English and other foreign ship-builders.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

Great preparations are being made for laying the Atlantic cable. Very advantageous conditions for manufacturing the cable have been offered to the Company by Glass, Elliott, & Co., who show the greatest confidence in the success of the enterprise.

RUSSIA.



THE POLISH QUESTION.

A great irritation exists in England, France, and Austria against Russia, in consequence of the last Russian note, and the tone of the semi-official papers is very various. The contradictions between the three Western Powers are very active.

1. Charleston and Savannah Railroad.—2. Ashley River.—3. Charleston.—4. Cooper River.—5. Wando River.—6. Castle Pinckney.—7. Fort Ripley.—8. Fort Johnson (James Island).—9. Stono River.—10. Fort Sumter.—11. Fort Moultrie.—12. Battery Gregg (Cummings' Point).—13. Fort Wagner.—14. General Gilmore's [illegible]
15. Captured Works (Morris Island).—16. Light-house Inlet.—17. Union Battery (Folly Island).—18. Iron-clads and Wooden Ships.—19. Hotel.—20. Sullivan's Island and Rebel Batteries.—21. Moultrieville.—22. Mount Pleasant.—23. Breach Inlet.—24. Stem Creek.—6, 9. Rebel Batteries on James Island.

BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, AND ITS ENVIRONS, SHOWING THE SCENE OF GENERAL GILMORE'S OPERATIONS.—[See Page 519.]

LAGOON ON SEABROOK ISLAND.

LANDING PLACE.

OUR BIVOUAC ON SEABROOK ISLAND.

REBEL BATTERIES ON MORRIS ISLAND

KIAWHA AND SEABROOK ISLANDS.

THE CAMPAIGN IN SOUTH CAROLINA.—SCENES ON THE SEA ISLANDS, NEAR CHARLESTON.—[See Page 519.]

BELLE'S FAIRY PRINCE.

SOME are born to sewing, some achieve sewing, and some have sewing thrust upon them. Margery Grant, sitting by the window opening on the little garden, achieved sewing, not as an occupation or an amusement, but rather as the development of some function, as natural and as much a part of her as the beating of her heart. A nun-like figure, with a self-communing face, looking off occasionally at shivering boughs or sparkling river, but only as if finding there the completion or the development of her thinking; sitting in an absolute quiet that extended itself even to the dead black folds of her widow's weeds.

Belle, younger sister of Margery, clearly was of those who have sewing thrust upon them. Her very air of solemn and conscientious incapacity betrayed her. She showed a bird-like restlessness, a butterfly impatience, under the linen yoke on which she was working. She took occasional stitches, with long pauses between them, in which she made solemn pretenses of holding her work up and judging of the effect. Then she quarrelled with the cotton, and plunging into the depths of her workbasket, was there beguiled by various slips of newspaper which she felt it her duty to read. She kept a watchful eye on the road, and if so much as a bird chanced to run along the fence she spied it. Presently she shook off the yoke altogether, measured it with her finger, and cheated (there was just an eighth, and she informed herself that she had accomplished three sixteenths), folded it, tucked it in her work-basket, cut off a rose-bud peering in at the window and put it in her bosom, went over to the piano, struck a few notes, took up an open book lying there, and read out,

"'Come, Care and Pleasure, Hope and Pain,
And mingle me the fated Fairy Prince.'

Or, if you have none, as the article is said not now to be in market, oblige us with a Giant, Messieurs, or even an ogre with two heads," added the young lady, dancing up to her sister. "I am wearied of vegetating: so much embroidery, so many pages, a walk to the rock, a muslin wrapper in the morning, and a silk dress at dinner, through the long crawling year. Why, I would welcome even Pain to be sure that I had still a soul."

"You may welcome Pain, but you must wait long to bid it farewell," returned Margery, calmly.

Belle stared and looked about her:

"Margery, where is May?"

"In the hall or on the piazza."

"No, I have not seen her there for an hour."

Margery put down her work hastily. May was her only child—her three-year-old darling. Belle ran down the walk to the gate, calling, "Mary! May!" The call rang out loudly in the still summer air, but Belle heard no lisping voice in answer, and nowhere a glimpse of the little pink frock and little toddling feet. Margery came down to the gate after her.

"Do you see her? I have searched the house, and she is not there. The child is surely strayed away. My poor lost lamb!"

Belle stared at her sister.

"No need fretting yet, Margery. She may have run up the hill. Do you see while I look for her on the road. She can not have gotten far."

But all the while her heart was sinking within her, for only a few yards hence was the river, and Margery was a widow, and lived only in her child.

"I prayed for pain," she thought; "but let it not be that of my sister's, O merciful God! If such prayers are answered let it be mine!"

Came toward her at that moment a stranger—a gentleman with close, curled hair, and weapons of eye-glass, that gave him, in Belle's eyes, very much the air of a grandfather. This gentleman carried in his arm something fat, white, and warm, with little shoes, golden curls, and blue sash ribbon.

"May!" cried out Belle, running up to him flushed and panting. "Oh, Sir, please give her to me! That is our baby."

Geoffrey Horton looked down smiling.

"I am very glad to have found you. Will you let me carry her for you? You see we are very good friends."

So Belle met her fairy prince: a grave gentleman with eye-glasses, and several years her senior, whose visits she received very much as she did air or sunlight, or any other comfortable thing about whom she occasionally jested with Margery, who had kissed his hands on the day that he brought her her child. Margery always received such jesting calmly.

"Laugh as you like, Belle. He is a man. There are not too many in this odd world."

A year went on. Mr. Horton, Geoffrey's mother, and Norah, her daughter, at Geoffrey's request had called on Margery, and from that, coming to know and like each other, they had fallen into visiting pleasant neighborly ways. Geoffrey's house stood next theirs, standing a little back, and uplifted on a knoll, and on summer evenings Belle had a fashion of tripping up the shaded path to read with Norah, or Norah brought her work and finished there. Belle and Margery and Mrs. Horton came in, and gossiped solemnly with Margery, who seldom visited. Then as the summer went on, Margery grew into a fondness for putting May to bed herself; and when she had lisped out her prayers, would nestle down beside her on the pillows, and in that cuddle her till she fell off into sleep, and then lie watching the black eyelashes, and the dimpled hands, and perfect peace of mouth and brow all through the warm evening, leaving Belle very much to herself.

At such times Belle passed the evening at the Hill, and Geoffrey came with her back to the gate; and it was noticeable that, at twilight, Belle got a way of rolling her hair afresh, and fastening a fuchsia in the heavy coils at the back, or a little knot of bright ribbon at her collar. Margery saw it, and smiled to herself.

One evening, when the summer was half over, standing before her glass, and knotting a fleecy thing called a "twilight" under her chin, raised her on a sudden a presentiment—a thing that gave her a sinking of the heart and a chill in place of the pleasant flutter with which in ordinary she prefaced such visits. She had a mind not to go; but she had not seen Norah that day, and could not get on with the sack that she was knitting for May till Norah showed her the stitch. That decided the matter; put the question, you see, in the light of duty. So she went; and Presentiment, finding itself unheeded, followed her, gave her a second chill, by way of remembrancer, at sight of Mrs. Horton, Norah, and a strange lady on the piazza, and no Geoffrey. Strangers were her pet aversion; and when before had Geoffrey been absent? She hardly knew how to trust him. The strange lady was Mrs. Hayward. So much she learned. And then Norah, after the fashion of girls, drew her away where they could work and talk a little apart.

Mrs. Hayward followed her with a slow, soft glance.

"I have heard rumors," she said, "but hardly credited them, Geoffrey seemed always such a careless bachelor. She is a beautiful woman, however. I can't wonder that we never saw Geoffrey in town."

Mrs. Horton was taken off her guard.

"Geoffrey! Oh, you mistake—quite. This is Norah's friend, a very nice girl, sister of a widow, our neighbor. Nice people—the nicest people in the world."

So Mrs. Hayward knew that, let Geoffrey think what he would, Belle was not nice in her; so means regarded the nicest girl in the world as eligible. That lady, meanwhile, was ruminant, laboring with an idea. She had met Mrs. Hayward, who had learned all she wished, and baited Mrs. Horton at the same time. Belle was pretty, and been were fools, and Geoffrey was not the plumply on their own destruction, if ever let loose from feminine leading-strings. When she next spoke to Belle something had already resulted in her tone, that helped on Belle's presentiment to another little lumpish chill.

Horse took rein, and gave the carriage-way; a gay voice—a woman's voice, and a sweet one—rang out under the old trees that lined the road, and emerged from their shade. Belle was in a doubtful plight, a slender figure sitting easily in the saddle, a perfectly poised head, a dark sparkling face, half hidden by the long feather that had set its drooping plume, and—Geoffrey Horton.

"There!" quoth Presentiment, "I told you so."

"That is Gretta Hayward," said Norah, very low—and, I think, a little timidly. Gretta is one of those pleasant people who are so exceedingly civil, and always make you feel snubbed. She is pretty, and always dresses well, and has many sins. She has no heart, but plenty of brains. Fancy having a patent damper and perpetual extinguisher for a sister-in-law."

Belle gave Norah's hand a little squeeze, and pretended not to see the outstretched hand of Geoffrey. This was surely unreasonable. She had never even asked herself what Geoffrey's presence or absence meant, and beheld her now burning with a sudden sense of injury! Gretta eyed her curiously, and Belle, feeling the scrutiny, returned it steadily. The sparkling face was not handsome on inspection, but it was very attractive, and, over taking you by surprise. The pout of her crimson lip, the deepening light of her eyes, the grace and restraint of every motion of her eyelashes, manner, motion, look, all puzzled, tantalized, and charmed. In that moment's silent looking up and down of Belle, Gretta and herself were antagonistic, and would have flamed into dislike even on neutral ground.

Bell turned away to Norah and her work-basket. Miss Hayward swept past them into the drawing-room, where they presently heard her singing. At last Geoffrey's step hesitated, went in also.

Belle put up her work.

"I have a headache. I am going home."

Norah looked up pained.

"Oh! but wait for Geoffrey."

"Why, there is no danger. Good-night."

And she and Presentiment went down the hill together. Margery, when she came to bid her good-night, looked keenly at her.

"Child, you are ill. What ails you?"

"I have a headache, and I was vexed because I went to-night. There was what could she think, but that it was a pastoral and pleasant sight? Certainly, not that the spectacle of a respectable family taking their evening airing was a dagger in the tender heart of her poor little sister. The afternoon made it worse. Going down with Margery to lay away her work, she met them in the morning. Geoffrey came to Belle about some book of which they had talked together. He had sent it home and almost have brought it, but Miss Hayward—

Belle put up her little head.

"Pray give yourself no trouble about it, Mr. Horton," and walked away.

Margery, seeing suspicion in Mrs. Horton, triumph in Gretta, and something inexplicable in Geoffrey, came out from her world of shadows and set herself to study her sister; not that it needed powers of divination to understand this poor child! She drooped miserably, and had heart for nothing. She still went to the Hill: for she would not have it said that she had visited Geoffrey, but her pride cost her dear, for there every look between the two, from whom she could never turn her eyes, was a fresh stab, every low-whispered word food for bitter thinking and miserable remembrance.

Norah was openly indignant, but dared not frame her thought in words held back by something in Belle's pale face. Only once, looking after Gretta and her brother going to hunt wild flowers, she dropped the hot words that, like most fools, Geoffrey was cruel also.

"Why?" asked Belle, promptly. "Because he keeps Miss Hayward long in her angling?"

But for all this told front Margery grew daily more anxious about Belle.

"I shall send you to Aunt Steele's," she said at length. "You can drink cream and roll on the hay there if you like. At any rate I shall not spy you more."

Belle would have preferred torment where she was to peace in Paradise; but her death would be another kind to Margery, and it seemed but a poor mission to die for somebody who didn't care a fig about it; so she ordered down her trunks and began clean-starching her muslins, which in country-reading means a journey. Hetty, their little maid, carried the news to the Hill that Miss Belle must be going on a visit, and in half an hour it had reached Norah by domestic telegraph, whereat she rejoiced. Norah had now a test for Geoffrey, and at supper she tried it. "Mother, Belle is going away to visit her aunt; Margery thinks that her health is failing."

Here she glanced from under her eyelashes at Geoffrey. He was whispering to Gretta.

"Very sudden. There is an excellent thing for her," responded Mrs. Horton, oracularly, and the subject dropped. Norah, however, watching him as she spoke, saw Geoffrey, just at twilight, going down the hill, and astonished Gretta by instantly, turning around and kissing her, without the smallest provocation.

Belle, wearied out, had nestled down on the lounge in the parlor, and there fell asleep, her cheek resting on her little soft palm, and wearing the patient, grieved look about mouth and eyes that you see sometimes in children. So some one found her, and, sitting down beside her, called himself superfluously hard names, as he watched her. One hand rested in her lap, and he dared to take it, at first timidly, then he drew up in a fright, and, seeing who was there, got up, crimson to the temples. Geoffrey was quite ready for confession, and would even have pleaded his pardon, but Belle would not understand. Geoffrey grew desperate.

"Belle, if you have a mind to be miserable, so have mine!"

"A prudent resolve on your part; but what have I to do with that?"

"Don't be hypocritical, but pray hear me out, and forgive me."

"That implies that I have reason to complain. I know of none."

Dangerous ground this, quaking under his feet; the Sybil in a terrible on the one hand, the Chrysbdis of insufferable contempt on the other.

"Oh, these women!" he groaned, and was going, when he saw her face, and caught something like a sob. With that he gathered courage, and, sitting down beside her, said, softly,

"Belle, I have loved you ever since you first came to me, claiming May, in such a pretty tremor of delight."

And as this tigress melted at once into tears, confessing all her sins, specially that of loving Geoffrey Horton, and ending,

"But how could you find it in your heart to go on so?"

"How?"

"With Miss Hayward."

"Simply that you might find it in your heart that you loved me. I knew it, but could hardly tell you so."

"You had nearly lost by it, Sir."

"You would have come to terms."

"You think so?"

MAUD.

EVERYBODY had voted the day too warm for any exertion but eating, breathing, and had given themselves over to tides-à-tête and iced-water in cool halls and recessed windows. Maud curled her fat form all, and even down present, lyly in walking costume—braided Nankin dress, marvelous little boots, and garden hat. A jaunty little figure enough! Seeing her thus equipped, Paul, who had been lounging on the steps, volunteered to go with her.

Paul was thirty, Maud eighteen, and in his society apt to entertain an unpleasant sensation of being considered a child. However, Mark Farquhar was coming on the piazza, where for the last hour he had been flirting with Esther Varian; so she was not altogether bereft. Mark had just tied Esther's little blue silk cravat in a sailor's knot, and fastened it with his own scarf-pin. His fingers had touched her throat, and his black curls brushed her clear brown cheeks.

Maud tied her own cravat, and kept her cheeks cool by a constant fanning; therefore she only looked with becoming indignation at Esther Varian, and went with Paul, talking very fast, till they were out of hearing of the house, when she suddenly she fell from the height of volubility flat to a languid monosyllabic mood. Paul smiled to himself, and was patient. It was a part of his creed to give his fish plenty of line.

So they walked in silence over the sunny road. The trees met artfully from the river, showing almost painfully bright between tree and house-tops; vineyards on either side looked sultry and Southern in that glowing air—made one think of panting hours and of the fierce suns that must bring them to their autumn purple; and the monotonous, a solemn wooded form, stretching up before them like the huge portal of some mystic land of delight, seemed to recede as they advanced, in lands of delight always do.

Maud flagged and grew weary, and Paul, looking about for a seat, discovered a stone-wall topped by some logs, and seated her thereon, under a spreading walnut-tree. She was a little creature, slender, and little in her movements, and just now pale with fatigue, and perhaps a little sorrowful, as she took off her hat and laid it beside the rest-trunk, looked less a woman than some sweet child whom Paul might take in his arms without harm and hush into quiet. All about her was daintily pure and neat; the edge of snowy skirt showing over the soft gray stuff upon the legs, the little ruffle at her throat, the handkerchief peeping from the braided pocket of her dress, even as became such a little lily sprite. She was deft too in her ways; what she touched fell naturally into its place, as though her little fingers were a decalogue of order —a veritable home fairy, that would be naturally by a man's hearth and nestle lovingly in his arms and heart, thought Paul; and, so thinking, he looked at her with a light in his eyes that she brought the blood redly to her cheeks.

"Why are you so silent?" Tell me what you were thinking about:" he said, hastily.

"If I did you might be in the plight of Aladdin, who troubled an old lamp and summoned a genii."

"What do you mean?"

"Or like the people who, digging for a well, struck on the cave of Herculaneum."

"Provoking! I don't like to be teased."

Her eyes were sparkling, her color beginning to rise. "And," thought Paul, with much satisfaction, however, only in a swift gleam from his eyes.

"Or perhaps," he drawled, "you would think, if you knew of what I was thinking, the simile of the dead man who revived on touching the prophet's bones the power of approbation."

"What are you saying?"

"Something impertinent."

Maud gave him a little peevish shake.

"I will not be so teased. What were you thinking of?"

"It is fortunate that a prophet's bones are not to be found in every grave," pursued Paul, his eyes dancing. "Fancy the Satters receiving their father back to life in that style."

Maud burst into a laugh; then came back to the subject, for she was a persistent little thing.

"Mr. Trowbridge!"

"Miss Maud."

"I am not to be evaded. I shall proceed to extremities," Maud sprang up her little hand.

"I defy you."

The hand descended on his ear as if so much thistle-down had lighted there; but Paul caught the fingers, and when she tried to withdraw them, held them fast, looking straight into her eyes in a way that made the long lashes swiftly down on her flushing cheeks, and made her silent for a moment. Maud was not used to be with her eyes and heard him with her ears, but had never taken him in mentally. Now she recognized his indifference as a subtle fact that was becoming incomprehensible to herself. Paul still held the passive hand, still watched the downcast eyes and changing face.

"I was thinking of you," he said, softly.

"What of me?"

"I will not tell you now."

"Why, then, did you make me curious?"

"Are you curious?"

"Very."

"You shall know it, then, in two weeks."

"That is a long time," returned Maud, in some surprise. "I never thought Paul," (for "Paul" for what I have to do.") "You will not forget?"

"I never forget."

There came trees down the road, and Maud saw a Magenta parasol, a white plume, a trimly-belted morning-dress, a mass of yellow hair, a face dazzling with beauty—Esther Varian, in short, and with her Mark Farquhar. Esther nodded toward them with a little air of triumph. Mark put up his glass. Maud colored with anger. It was not enough to pain and wound her. It must be done openly, that the world might know that she suffered. She was privileged to be a child and an action what, as a gentleman, his tongue might not utter—what, as a woman, she must endure in silence.

She had quite forgotten Paul; but now he made her look at him, though how she scarcely knew, as he had released her hand, and certainly had not spoken. Than his face, nothing could well be more calm, or, to her, nothing more unlike what it had very quietness she found in some way strength and reassurance, and in that deep calm something that seemed to look right into her shrinking soul.

"Please take me home," she said, putting out a little hand, to be helped down.

They walked back almost in silence. Maud was quite recovering herself. That mood of Paul had lounged by her side, and she had thought of him very much as of the bird skimming before them, or of the trees, nothing more and nothing cruel to herself. She had known Paul a year. What had he said or done in this short hour that must make him different from part of the whole? Why should she feel herself in some way conquered? What had he done? What did she feel?

Esther and Mark were already back on the piazza. They had taken a short-cut across the fields.

"Plainly a scouting party," said Paul.

Maud looked up, ready for answer, and sat down upon the steps, her brown eyes full of soft light, and her cheeks flushed into the pink of sea-shell, and her hair, wherever it could escape the restraint of comb and net, falling naturally into waves and ripples. At that moment she was lovely.

"We were talking of you," said Esther. "When we passed you Mr. Farquhar would leave it that you were Rochester and Jane Eyre, only that Rochester should have been on the fence and Jane was not pretty. It was an effective tableau, however."

"Vastly!" said Paul, with perfect gravity. "A coincidence! In my heart I have often likened Miss Maud to little Jane. There must exist a resemblance in character."

Esther bridled.

"Don't thank him, Maud. It is a libel. Jane Eyre was most unwomanly."

Paul's eyes began to sparkle.

"Your reason, Miss Varian."

"The book itself. As an example, the scene in the garden where she confesses her love to Mr. Rochester. Till a man confesses himself, I think it unfeminine even to have questioned one's self about him; but to love while yet unasked is, to my thinking, impossible for a true woman, though, of course, I don't speak ex cathedrâ."

"It is then an exchange, in which the lady is specially cautious of being cheated."

"I deny it," broke in Maud. "There is no law that says a woman shall not dare to reverence, to admire, to love, whatever is great and noble, spontaneously, involuntarily, as does a man. Pride, delicacy, instinct, will indeed control and mask its expression, but the thought of her should be prefaced in the heart of some man who knows not properly how to reverence her; but to sit cowardly down, and when a heart and hand are offered, affect surprise and take it, as of gratitude, or expediency, or because convinced by reasoning, is not womanliness, but hypocrisy or self-deception. For it is scarcely possible that man should love, and woman should be unconscious. Even if too weak to dare ask the verdict of our heart, if we find a thing lovable we love; if strength, or rest, or knowledge that we crave, we take it in virtue of the very necessity of our nature. We drink in light and air without reasoning, and involuntarily our moral nature also takes its light and life. Right, honor, possibility, external circumstances determine its expression; but its receiving or its rejection is not of ourselves, or within our province, or subject to any law but that of God."

"Bravo!" said Paul.

"Maud thinks best to define her position," returned Esther, with a world of scornful meaning.

"By way of contrast," retorted Paul, softly.

Esther colored to the temples. Mark came and sat down by Maud.

"Have I offended? You have scarcely looked toward me to-day."

"It must have been that you were not within my range of vision."

"Be it so. You are in arrears, then, for a whole morning's kindly notice. Will you come and play chess?"

Maud rose, and in so doing dropped her gloves. Paul picked them up and placed them in his breast.

"I will keep these as hostages," he said, significantly.

Then came now a time of much self-questioning and self-communing with Maud; for, however it was that, do or speak what or with whom she would, the consciousness of Paul attended her: not always strictly expressed in her thought, but ever by it, besetting her in the morning, and going with her through the day; and thus submitting to a stronger will and a fixed purpose, which under no almost womanish gentleness, she stood affrighted, fancying this new frame of mind a moral monstrosity, and hated herself; and when she exercised in herself a relish for this submission she despised her self and rebelled, only to be conquered anew. So wise was she in theory, so simple in practice!

All this fighting in secret wore on her, and just as the two weeks came to an end one of her best aches stood upon her. Now Maud's headaches were not affairs of eau de Cologne and a few hours; so finding one at hand she at once relinquished all thought of the mountain party, so long discussed, and sat quietly down to suffer. Paul came to her in the library, where she had ensconced herself on the coolest and most quiet sofa, and seeing her face white and drawn with suffering, was moved with compassion.

"Poor child! let me stay with you," he said, earnestly. "You look as if you needed nursing."

But she motioned him away.

"By no means. You can do nothing; and I am better alone."

He stood a moment, looking obstinate, and as if about to contest the point.

"Go, please, go!" she urged.

He went at last, and her countenance fell; for all the while she wished him to stay, as he might have known. He could be inflexible enough when he chose. She must make him, on a sudden, so yielding? He had chatted much with Esther Varian of late. Perhaps she coupled the facts together and framed over it; be that as it may, her headache grew upon her.

About noon, as she sat there, propped against pillows and her head pressed hard over a cologne-plex, some one opened the door quietly, and coming to her side laid a palm cool as ice upon her forehead. It felt like opened hot air. "Mr. Drysdale! I thought that you had gone!" And then the sudden start and speaking cost her such a throb of pain that, spite of herself, she cried out. Paul went for Cologne and ice-water, brushed back the soft hair, and bathed her temples, saying,

"It seems you are not better alone, after all."

"It is very disagreeable to deprive you of your pleasure."

I give you no thanks for such consideration. I did not choose to be so deprived, and so remained at home in spite of you."

Maud was silent.

"Are you better? Does your head pain less?"

"Yes," she whispered, lying with her temples in his hands, for it had occurred to her that Paul might not be the most fitting nurse, and that she should have needful martyrdom in the name of propriety rather than his attentions.

"What is it? am I awkward? don't I help you?"

"Oh! Paul, affecting stolidity.

"Oh no; but—"

"Hush, then; you are talking yourself into a fever. Your cheeks are flushing already."

She was quiet a little longer, then made another move.

"I am better now, thank you."

"Well enough to hear me talk?"

"Oh! quite!"

"Have you remembered that to-day I am to tell you of what I was thinking under the old wateroak tree?"

"Yes," very faintly, and turning her head quite away, till only the tip of a little ear was visible.

"Shall I tell you?"

"If you choose."

"Have you no longer curious?"

"No."

"I conclude, then, that you have divined it as to?"

She was silent.

"Tell me," he said, bending over her and speaking earnestly, "have you thought that, looking at you that day, I knew that the liking I had always felt for you had ripened into love, so that as you trembled when I held your hand, that I was vowing to myself so one day to hold it and call it mine? If so, then you already know what yet were so curious to hear that day."

Maud answered only by nestling her head deeper in the pillow.

"Are you angry? shall I go away?" he asked.

She put out her hand, and, taking his, laid it under her cheek. That was her answer, and Paul desired no better.

THE MARYLAND CAMPAIGN.

We publish on pages 520 and 521 a group of pictures from sketches by Mr. A. R. Waud, illustrating the recent Maryland campaign. That campaign, though not ended, has for the present, and eventful, that the public will be glad to see it once more described with the pencil. Mr. Waud writes:

"The first sketch shows the pass through Thornton's Gap, in South Mountains, with the New York militia hurrying home on the news of the riots. The next one, a view looking down the Potomac River at Williamsport, showing where the rebels forded with their wagons. The little sketch on the right, "Pontoon Bridge Falling Water," not a misnomer, the bridge as has been reported, but a very well-built one of boats like ours, painted leaf-color.

"Upper Marlboro, Maryland, is described in the sketch itself. As these fellows marched in by thousands, great excitement was produced in Frederick City and neighboring country.

"The charge of the 6th was a very gallant affair up a hill and over the rifle-pits and ditches of the enemy's rear-guard. The 6th charged with sabre, and a number of men were killed and wounded, but they took a large number of the enemy's soldiers.

"The bridge over the Monocacy, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, was destroyed last year by the rebels. In their recent raid into Maryland the Stuart cavalry did not venture to approach it.

"The sketch of Emmettsburg shows the burned district, and the rebels driving herds of captured horses through the town.

"On the field of battle it is a common thing for the rebel wounded to get up, and holding up their hands in token of submission, run into our lines to get attended to by our surgeons, which they prefer to experiencing the tender mercies of their own."

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

We publish on page 516 a BIRDS-EYE VIEW of the ENVIRONS OF CHARLESTON, showing the seaislands on which Gilmore's army is contending with the enemy for their capture, and on page 517 a number of views on Morris, Seabrook, and other islands where our troops are encamped.

The following letter from the Herald correspondence will enable our readers to form an idea of the present condition of affairs on Morris Island:

There is a continual and uninterrupted heavy artillery fire going on night and day between Fort Wagner and Johnson, and the new batteries erected near it, the work on Cummings Point, between Fort Gregg and Fort Wagner, and our batteries, aided by the iron-clads, which play parties on Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg, statistically exchanging a shot with Sumter.

The new rebel battery on Morris Island, which have either been built within the past fortnight or have long been masked, are constructed with the greatest caution, but do not interrupt the steady advance and progress of our work. They have evidently been erected against the position and they manage to explode their shells high in the air, which, when they burst, rain down. They do not, rarely, inflict injuries on our gallant troops who wield the spade and pick as well as they have to use muskets. Fort Wagner, when not kept silent by the iron-clads and our mortar and rifle batteries, directs its fire on Gregg, Cummings Point, and the new batteries, and our sharp-shooters are now so close to the latter that they can hear any gunner who attempts to level the large pieces bearing on our trenches.

The rebels in Wagner closed up the embrasures on the southern face of the work three days ago and have remained silent until this morning at daylight, when they cleared the embrasures and proceeded to fire their new and five guns in position, two of them being new ones, from which they threw the New Brunswick rocket. They seemingly did not desire their guns and take to their bombproofs, where they are a little secure. Our work then went on as rapidly and quietly as ever.

Of Fort Wagner the same correspondent writes:

Fort Wagner is an irregular bastioned work, situated on the northern end of Morris Island, two thousand five hundred yards distant from Fort Sumter. It is composed entirely of sand, which, beyond doubt, is the best material to withstand the effect of shell. Its armament is six guns; but these guns have recently been mounted on the sea face to annoy the Monitors. On the southern face of the work all the obstructions that engineering skill can devise have been placed so as to annoy our troops in case of an assault. On the northern side of the work there has been erected a mockery parapet, which not only commands the approach from the northward, but enables its garrison to lie sheltered in event of our troops gaining an admittance to the interior. It has its traverses, galleries, and covered ways, and upon the whole is a very formidable work. The magazine is situated in the southern centre of the seaward portion of the work, and although exposed to the fire of our iron-clads, it is as well built as to defy the projectiles which have already struck it.

CAPT. JOHN RODGERS, U.S.N.

CAPTAIN JOHN RODGERS, of the Weehawken, whose portrait we give on page 525, is the son of that gallant and distinguished officer, Commodore John Rodgers, who was the father of the American navy. A native of Maryland, he entered the navy at an early age, in 1828, and from the first exhibited that zeal and ability for which he has since been so distinguished. He saw much service in the grades of Midshipman and Lieutenant; and for many years was employed on the coast survey in the coast of Florida against the Seminole Indians, and in the Coast Survey. In 1852 he was appointed to command the North Pacific and Behring Straits Exploring Expedition, and succeeded to the command on the return to the United States—in consequence of severe illness—of his superior officer, Captain (now Commodore) Ringgold. He performed the arduous task that devolved upon him in a manner creditable to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the Government, taking his vessel, the Vincennes, into the Arctic region and to a point of way had ever before penetrated. On the return of the expedition, in 1856, Commander Rodgers, who had been promoted during the cruise, was then engaged in preparing the charts and report of his explorations. When in 1858 we had a difficulty with England, in consequence of the boarding and searching of American vessels in the West Indies and Gulf, Commander Rodgers was appointed to active service, and was appointed to the Water Witch, and proceeded to the Gulf. The difficulty, however, was settled, and Commander Rodgers returned to the Arctic charts. When the rebellion broke out he again promptly applied for active service, and, with other officers of the army and navy, was sent to Norfolk, to attempt saving the vessels there. Too late for that, Commander Rodgers, with Captain (now Admiral) Smith of the Engineers, was assigned to the difficult and dangerous duty of blowing up the Dry Dock. After making the necessary preliminary arrangements, the detachment that had accompanied them was sent back to the boats, and the two officers, with a single sailor, remained to apply the fire to the appointed mines. But Commander Rodgers told the Lieutenant who took back the men that he thought there was but little chance of success, and that he remained to see that the distance from the boats and the intervention of the ship-houses, which, when in flames, would cut off their retreat. The Lieutenant justified this opinion, but the two officers escaped by the land-gate, and with their solitary seaman—a small boat-load—were enabled to pull down the harbor, but a heavy fire of musketry from the shore compelled them to surrender, and they were taken prisoners. Subsequently there, however, they were kindly treated and soon released, as Virginia had not then passed the ordinance of secession.

On his return to Washington Commander Rodgers was appointed to the important and highly responsible duty of superintending the fitting out of Western rivers. Every thing in the way of buying, building, arming, equipping, and organizing had to be done, and he accomplished all the duties of the post in a manner whose soul was in his work. The purchased gun-boats, properly prepared, were already to be active service. Commander Rodgers rapidly progressing to completion, when he was relieved by Captain (the late and lamented Admiral) Foote. The change was the occasion of General Halleck's comment, who subsequently expressed great regret, saying it arose from error, from false representations or contrivance. Commander Rodgers declined to accept the place on his staff of executive officer for naval affairs connected with his movements. He then was detached from the Carondelet, and was appointed to the steamer Flag, then off Charleston, and sailed in Admiral Du Pont's flag-ship, the Wabash, on the first South Atlantic Expedition. He commanded a flotilla sent up to reconnoitre the harbor before the action, which was engaged with Tatnall's brig-of-war, in the attack on Fort Royal; the services of Commander Rodgers were alluded to by Admiral Du Pont in the warmest terms; and as a mark of the confidence he was sent ashore to ascertain if the forts had surrendered, and with his own hands hoisted the Union flag on the ramparts. Captain Rodgers for the first time since it had been torn down at Sumter.

Proceeding in the Flag to Savannah River, he ascertained that the rebels had left Tybee Island, and landing there he took possession of it, and handed it over to the army, again himself hoisting the Union flag upon the soil of Georgia, for the first time since the act of secession. Several battles and skirmishes in the expedition followed. Commander Rodgers in possession of much valuable information connected with Fort Pulaski, and the data he obtained being added to general information in the capture of that important fort.

The Flag, needing repairs, was ordered to the North; and Captain Rodgers went on, rather than be idle, Commander Rodgers, at the request of General M'Clellan, joined his staff to assist in embarking and landing the troops for York River. He was then appointed to the Galena, an iron-clad on a new model, but which proved to be a lamentable failure. In command of the James River flotilla, composed, among other vessels, of the original Monitor, he was ordered to proceed to Richmond. After attacking and silencing several forts on his way he reached the obstructions just above Fort Darling, on Drury's Bluff, consisting of three rows of sunken vessels, secured by piles and chains. The Monitor could not elevate her guns to reach the batteries, and had to drop down for nearly a mile, and the fire was thus concentrated on the Galena, which sustained the unequal fight for three hours and a half, and when she retired had but five cartridges left for her great guns, and not a loaded shell. This was one of the severest, if not the severest, fight of the war. In the late capture of the Atlanta she surrendered after five shots; but the Galena was pierced by forty-six of those heavy shot and shells, was greatly cut up, and had fifteen of her crew killed outright, besides the wounded. Among the latter was Commander Rodgers, slightly, from two pieces of shell. Though pronounced unseaworthy by a survey, the Galena remained in the river, and during the fight of Malvern Hills she took part in that contest, firing by signal among the rebel troops, and rendering most essential service, as was generally acknowledged by General M'Clellan in his official dispatches.

Transferred to the new iron-clad Weehawken, and promoted to the rank of Captain, he, as his passage from New York to Fortress Monroe, encountered one of the most severe storms ever experienced on the coast. Fearing for the safety of his tow, a side-wheel steamer, he cast her off, and ordered her to take harbor at Delaware Breakwater, which she reached with difficulty; but the Weehawken, though having the same place of refuge, continued on, and came safely into Hampton Roads, to the agreeable surprise of all who knew she was out in that storm. This proof of the seagoing qualities of that class of vessels was a great satisfaction to the Navy Department, being considered of as much importance as a naval victory; for it restored the confidence which had been in those iron-clads as sea-going vessels which had been destroyed by the then recent foundering of the Monitor in a much less violent gale.

Attached to the squadron of Admiral Du Pont, he was selected to lead the iron-clads in the attack on Forts Sumter and Moultrie and the outer batteries at Charleston. The little squadron, with the Weehawken in the van, was allowed to proceed unmolested until it reached a position on certain buoys, on which point all the rebel guns had been trained; and then, at the same instant, three hundred of the heaviest guns opened upon the devoted vessel. Such was this furious attack that the spray thrown up hid the hull of the Weehawken from the sight of the spectators, who at one moment thought she was sunk; but she bore it all, and with her consorts continued to return the fire, calmly and steadily pressing on till she reached the sunken obstructions, through which he vainly attempted to find a possible passage. The general fight was a most terrific one, the result signal was made, and as the Weehawken was bringing up the rear while retiring further from complications she received two or three heavy shot; and, not to be outdone in courtesy, the Weehawken was slowly turning round, and, with her single eleven-inch gun fired a 15-inch solid shot, which was the last gun fired on either side. Never before were any vessels exposed to such a fire as the iron-clads, and fleet of iron-clads sustained would have utterly destroyed in half the time the immense fleet that Nelson had at Trafalgar.

The next service of Captain Rodgers was the recent capture of the iron-clad Atlanta. This vessel of 2000 tons, formerly the British Fingal, had been prepared with great care and at immense expense, on the plan of the Merrimac. For months she had been a thorn in the side of Admiral Du Pont, bearing a raid upon our wooden blockaders. Hearing she was positively coming out, the Weehawken, Captain Rodgers, and the Nahant, Commander Downes, were sent to watch her. The Atlanta came out in full belief and expectation of capturing both vessels, but suddenly appeared before them in the first gray of the morning, and at once opened her fire. The Weehawken did not return it till within 200 yards, when, as the Atlanta proceeded to fire her broadside, the Weehawken opened with her 15-inch gun, throwing a solid shot of 450 pounds. Only two shots were fired when the Atlanta surrendered, before the Nahant, who was gallantly trying to get into position, had fired a shot. The first shot from the Weehawken virtually settled the result. Though her iron-plated roof presented an angle of forty-five degrees, the heavy shot did not glance, but penetrated it, and threw an immense quantity of iron and wooden splinters among the crew, killing and wounding many, some by the splinters, and some by the mere concussion; another shot killed one man and wounded seventeen.

This capture was one of the most important of the war; for not only was the vessel a most dangerous foe to the fleet, but she was built and owned by the iron-clads in Charleston harbor, and there is no estimating the consequences that might have resulted from the escape of these powerful iron-clads concerted, and leaving our wooden blockaders, or even those of our Northern sea-ports, exposed to their ravages.

We close this notice with the following extract from the highly complimentary dispatch addressed to Captain Rodgers by the Secretary of the Navy:

"Your early connection with the Mississippi flotilla and your gallant conduct in the attack and capture of the first iron-clads on the Western waters; your brief conduct in the action on Drury's Bluff, your high courage that led you to put to sea in the Weehawken upon the approach of the violent storm, in order to be assigning qualities of those new craft, at the time when a sail unknown now to the service of them would have been the manner in which you, with your associates, proved the iron-clads under the concentrated fire of Fort Sumter, Charleston harbor, and there tested and proved the efficiency of those vessels, and of them especially, thus answering successful achievement in the capture of the Atlanta, also, your skill and ability in the attack, passage, and devotion to the country and the cause of it fallen, reported to you, of self, and as well as the honorable duties on land, and in successful encounter with formidable floating antagonists, of the capabilities or qualities of attack and resistance of the Monitor class of vessels and their heavy armament. For these heroic services able acts I have presented your name to the President, requesting that he recommend that Congress give you a vote of thanks, in order that you may be advanced to the grade of Commodore in the American Navy."

REMINISCENCES OF THE MARYLAND CAMPAI

IGN,—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 519.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Mr. Hardie was taken by surprise for once, and had not a word to say; but looked in his son's face, mute, and gaping, as a fish.

During this painful silence his children eyed him inquiringly; but not with the same result; for one face is often read differently by two persons: to Jane, whose intelligence had no aids, he seemed unaffectedly puzzled; but Alfred discerned, beneath his wonder, the terror of detection rising, and then thrust back by the strong will: that stoical face shut again like an iron door; but not quickly enough: the right words, the "open sesame," had been spoken, and one unguarded look had confirmed Alfred's vague suspicions of foul play: he turned his own face away: he was alienated by the occurrences of the last few months, but Nature and tender reminiscences still held him by some fibres of the heart: in a moment of natural indignation he had applied the touch-stone; but its success grieved him; he could not bear to go on exposing his father; so he left the room with a deep sigh, in which pity mingled with shame and regret; he wandered out into the silent night, and soon was leaning on the gate of Albion Villa, gazing wistfully at the windows, and sore perplexed, and nobly wretched.

As he was going out, Mr. Hardie raised his eyebrows with a look of disinterested wonder and curiosity; and touched his forehead to Jane, as much as to say, "Is he disordered in his mind?"

As soon as they were alone, he asked her coolly what Alfred meant. She said she had no idea. Then he examined her keenly about this fourteen thousand pounds: and found, to his relief, Alfred had never even mentioned it to her.

And now Richard Hardie, like his son, wanted to be alone, and think over this new peril, that had risen in the bosom of his own family: and, for once, the company of his favorite child was irksome: he made an excuse and strolled out in his turn into the silent night. It was calm and clear: the thousand holy eyes, under which men prefer to do their crimes—except when they are in too great a hurry to wait—looked down and seemed to wonder any thing can be so silly as to sin; and beneath their pure gaze the man of the world pondered with all his soul. He tormented himself with conjectures: through what channel did Alfred suspect him? through the Dodds? were they aware of their loss? had the pocket-book spoken? If so, why had not Mrs. Dodd or her son attacked him? But then perhaps Alfred was their agent: they wished to try a friendly remonstrance through a mutual friend before proceeding to extremities; this accorded with Mrs. Dodd's character as he remembered her.

The solution was reasonable; but he was relieved of it by recollecting what Alfred had said, that he had not entered the house since the bank broke.

On this he began to hope Alfred's might be a mere suspicion he could not establish by any proof, and at all events he would lock it in his own breast like a good son: his never having given a hint even to his sister favored this supposition.

Thus meditating, Mr. Hardie found himself at the gate of Albion Villa.

Yet he had strolled out with no particular intention of going there. Had his mind, apprehensive of danger from that quarter, driven his body thither?

He took a look at the house: and the first thing he saw was a young lady leaning over the balcony, and murmuring softly to a male figure below, whose outline Mr. Hardie could hardly discern, for it stood in the shadow. Mr. Hardie was delighted: "Aha, Miss Juliet," said he, "if Alfred does not visit you, some one else does. You have soon supplied your peevish lover's place." He then withdrew softly from the gate, not to disturb the intrigue, and watched a few yards off; determined to see who Julia's nightly visitor was, and give Alfred surprise for surprise.

He had not long to wait: the man came away directly, and walked, head erect, past Mr. Hardie, and glanced full in his face, but did not vouchsafe him a word. It was Alfred himself. Mr. Hardie was profoundly alarmed, and indignant: "The young traitor! Never enter the house? no; but he comes and tells her every thing directly, under her window, on the sly: and, when he is caught—defies me to my face." And now he suspected female cunning and malice in the way that thunder-bolt had been quietly prepared for him and launched, without warning, in his very daughter's presence, and the result just communicated to Julia Dodd.

In a very gloomy mood he followed his son, and heard his firm though elastic tread on the frosty ground, and saw how loftily he carried his head: and from that moment feared, and very, very, nearly hated him.

The next day he feigned sick, and sent for Osmond. That worthy prescribed a pill and a draught, the former laxative, the latter astringent. This ceremony performed, Mr. Hardie gossiped with him; and, after a detour or two, glided to his real anxiety. "Sampson tells me you know more about Captain Dodd's case than he does: he is not very clear as to the cause of the poor man's going mad."

"The cause? Why Apoplexy."

"Yes, but I mean what caused the apoplexy?"

Mr. Osmond replied that Apoplexy was often idiopathic.* Captain Dodd, as he understood, had fallen down in the street in a sudden fit: "but as for the mania, this is to be attributed to an insufficient evacuation of blood while under the apoplectic coma."

"Not bled enough! Why Sampson says it is because he was bled too much."

Osmond was amused at this; and repeated that the mania came of not being bled enough.

The discussion was turned into an unexpected quarter by the entrance of Jane Hardie, who came timidly in and said, "Oh, Mr. Osmond, I can not let you go without telling you how anxious I am about Alfred. He is so thin, and pale, and depressed."

"Nonsense, Jane," said Mr. Hardie, "have we not all cause to be dejected in this house?" But she persisted gently that there was more in it than that: and his headaches were worse: and she could not be easy any longer without advice.

"Ah, those headaches," said Mr. Osmond, "they always made me uneasy. To tell the truth, Miss Hardie, I have noticed a remarkable change in him, but I did not like to excite apprehensions: and so he mopes, does he? seeks solitude, and is taciturn, and dejected?"

"Yes. But I do not mind that so much as his turning so pale and thin."

"Oh, it is all part of one malady."

"Then you know what is the matter?"

"I think I do: and yours is a wise and timely anxiety. Your brother's is a very delicate case of a hyperæsthetic character; and I should like to have the advice of a profound physician. Let me see, Dr. Wycherley will be with me to-morrow: may I bring him over as a friend?"

This proposal did not at all suit Mr. Hardie; he put his own construction on Alfred's pallor and dejection, and was uneasy at the idea of his being cross-questioned by a couple of doctors.

"No, no," said he, "Taff has fancies enough already; I can not have you gentlemen coming here to fill his head with many more."

"Oh, he has fancies, has he?" said Osmond, keenly. "My dear Sir, we shall not say one word to him: that might irritate him: but I should like you to hear a truly learned opinion."

Jane looked so imploringly, that Mr. Hardie yielded a reluctant assent, on those terms.

So the next day, by appointment, Mr. Osmond introduced his friend Dr. Wycherley: bland and bald, with a fine head, and a face naturally intelligent, but crossed every now and then by gleams of vacancy; a man of large reading, and of tact to make it subserve his interests. A voluminous writer on certain medical subjects, he had so saturated himself with circumlocution, that it distilled from his very tongue: he talked like an Article; a quarterly one; and so gained two advantages: 1st, he rarely irritated a fellow-creature; for, if he began a sentence hot, what with its length, and what with its windiness, he was apt to end it cool: item stabs by polysyllables are pricks by sponges. 2dly, this foible earned him the admiration of fools; and this is as invaluable as they are innumerable.

Yet was there in the mother-tongue he despised one germ of a word he vastly admired: like most quarterly writers. That charming word, the pet of the polysyllabic, was "of."

He opened the matter in a subdued and sympathizing tone well calculated to win a loving father, such as Richard Hardie—was not.

"My good friend here informs me, Sir, you are so fortunate as to possess a son of distinguished abilities, and who is at present laboring under some of those precursory indications of incipient disease of the cerebro-psychical organs, of which I have been, I may say, somewhat successful in diagnosing the symptoms. Unless I have been inadvertently misinformed, he has, for a considerable time, and only with slight intermissions, experienced persistent headache of a kephalalgic or true cerebral type, and has now advanced to the succeeding stage of taciturnity and depression, not* unaccompanied with isolation, and, probably, constipation: but as yet without hallucination, though possibly, and, as my experience of the great majority of these cases would induce me to say, probably, he is not† undisturbed by one or more of those latent, and, at first, trifling aberrations, either of the intelligence, or the senses, which in their preliminary stages escape the observation of all but the expert nosologist. In that case, Sir, be assured you have acted the part of a wise and affectionate parent in soliciting the opportune attention of a psychological Physician to these morbid phenomena at present in the initial process of incubation."

"There you see," said Osmond, "Dr. Wycherley agrees with me: yet I assure you I have only detailed the symptoms, and not the conclusion I had formed from them."

Jane inquired timidly what that conclusion was.

"Miss Hardie, we think it one of those obscure tendencies which are very curable if taken in time—" Dr. Wycherley ended the sentence —"but no longer remediable if the fleeting opportunity is allowed to escape, and diseased action to pass into diseased organization."

Jane looked awe-struck at their solemnity; but Mr. Hardie, who was taking advice against the grain, turned satirical: "Gentlemen," said he, "be pleased to begin by moderating your own obscurity; and then perhaps I shall see better how to cure my son's: what the deuce are you driving at?"

The two doctors looked at one another inquiringly; and so settled how to proceed. Dr. Wycherley explained to Mr. Hardie that there was a sort of general unreasonable and superstitious feeling abroad, a kind of terror of the complaint with which his son was threatened; "and which, instead of the most remediable of disorders, is looked at as the most incurable of maladies:" it was on this account he had learned to approach the subject with singular caution, and even with a timidity which was kinder in appearance than in reality; that he must admit.

"Well, you may speak out, as far as I am concerned," said Mr. Hardie, with consummate indifference.

"Oh yes!" said Jane, in a fever of anxiety; "pray conceal nothing from us."

"Well then, Sir, I have not as yet had the advantage of examining your son personally, but, from the diagnostics, I have no doubt whatever he is laboring under the first foreshadowings of cerebro-psychical perturbation."

Jane and her father stared at him: he might as well have recited them the alphabet backward.

"Well then," said he, observing his learning had missed fire, "to speak plainly, the symptoms are characteristic of the initiatory stage of the germination of a morbid state of the phenomena of intelligence."

His unprofessional hearers stared another inquiry.

"In one word, then," said Dr. Wycherley, waxing impatient at their abominable obtuseness, "it is the premonitory stage of the precursory condition of an organic affection of the brain."

"Oh!" said Mr. Hardie, carelessly: "I see; the boy is going mad."

The doctors stared in their turn at the prodigious coolness of a tender parent.

"Not exactly," said Dr. Wycherley; "I am habitually averse to exaggeration of symptoms. Your son's suggest to me 'the Incubation of Insanity,' nothing more."

Jane uttered an exclamation of horror: the doctor soothed her with an assurance that there was no cause for alarm. "Incipient aberration" was of easy cure: the mischief lay in delay. "Miss Hardie," said he, paternally, "during a long and busy professional career, it has been my painful province to witness the deplorable consequences of the non-recognition, by friends and relatives, of the precedent symptoms of those organic affections of the brain, the relief of which was within the reach of well-known therapeutic agents if exhibited seasonably."

He went on to deplore the blind prejudice of unprofessional persons; who choose to fancy that other diseases creep, but Insanity pounces, on a man: which he expressed thus neatly; "that other deviations from organic conditions of health are the subject of clearly defined though delicate gradations, but that the worst and most climacteric forms of cerebro-psychical disorder are suddenly developed affections presenting no evidence of any antecedent cephalic organic change, and unaccompanied by a premonitory stage, or by incipient symptoms."

This chimera he proceeded to confute by experience: he had repeatedly been called in to cases of mania described as sudden, and almost invariably found the patient had been cranky for years; which he condensed thus: "His conduct and behavior for many years previously to any symptom of mental aberration being noticed, had been characterized by actions quite irreconcilable with the supposition of the existence of perfect sanity of intellect."

He instanced a parson, whom he had lately attended, and found him as constipated and convinced he was John the Baptist engaged to the Princess Mary as could be.

"But upon investigation of this afflicted ecclesiastic's antecedent history, I discovered that, for years before this, he had exhibited conduct incompatible with the hypothesis of a mind whose equilibrium had been undisturbed: he had caused a number of valuable trees to be cut down on his estate, without being able to offer a sane justification for such an outrageous proceeding: and had actually disposed of a quantity of his patrimonial acres, 'and which' clearly he never would have parted with had he been in any thing resembling a condition of sanity."

"Did he sell the land and timber below the market-price?" inquired Mr. Hardie, perking up, and exhibiting his first symptom of interest in the discussion.

"On that head, Sir, my informant, his heir-at-law, gave me no information: nor did I enter into that class of detail; you naturally look at morbid phenomena in a commercial spirit, but we regard them medically: and, all this time, most assiduously visiting the sick of his parish and preaching admirable sermons."

The next instance he gave was of a stock-broker suffering under general paralysis and a rooted idea that all the specie in the Bank of England was his and ministers in league with foreign governments to keep him out of it.

"Him," said the doctor, "I discovered to have been for years guilty of conduct entirely incompatible with the hypothesis of undisordered mental functions. He had accused his domestic of peculation, and had initiated legal proceedings with a view of prosecuting in a court of law one of his oldest friends."

"Whence you infer that, if my son has not for years been doing cranky acts, he is not likely to be deranged at present."

This adroit twist of the argument rather surprised Dr. Wycherley. However, he was at no loss for a reply. "It is not insanity, but the Incubation of Insanity, which is suspected in your intelligent son's case: and the best course will be for me to enumerate in general terms the several symptoms of 'the Incubation of Insanity:'" he concluded with some severity, "after that, Sir, I shall cease to intrude what I fear is an unwelcome conviction."

The Parent, whose levity and cold reception of good tidings he had thus mildly, yet with due dignity, rebuked, was a man of the world; and liked to make friends, not enemies; so he took the hint, and made a very civil speech, assuring Dr. Wycherley that, if he ventured to differ from him, he was none the less obliged by the kind interest he took in a comparative stranger: and would be very glad to hear all about the "Incubation of Insanity." He added, "The very expression is new to me."

Dr. Wycherley bowed slightly; and complied: "One diagnostic preliminary sign of abnormal cerebral action is Kephalalgia, or true cerebral headache; I mean persistent headache, which is not accompanied by a furred tongue, or other indicia significant of abdominal or renal disorder as its origin."

Jane sighed. "He has sad headaches."

"The succeeding symptom is a morbid affection of sleep. Either the patient suffers from Insomnia; or else from Hypersomnia, which we subdivide into sopor, carus, and lethargus; or thirdly from Kakosomnia, or a propensity to mere dozing, and to all the morbid phenomena of dreams."

"Papa," said Jane, "poor Alfred sleeps very badly: I hear him walking at all hours of the night."

"I thought as much," observed Dr. Wycherley; "Insomnia is the commonest feature. To resume; the insidious advance of morbid thought is next marked by high spirits, or else by low spirits; generally the latter. The patient begins by moping, then shows great lassitude and ennui, then becomes abstracted, moody, and occupied with a solitary idea."

Jane clasped her hands, and the tears stood in her eyes; so well did this description tally with poor Alfred's case.

"And at this period," continued Dr. Wycherley, "my experience leads me to believe that some latent delusion is generally germinating in the mind, though often concealed with consummate craft by the patient: the open development of this delusion is the next stage, and, with this last morbid phenomenon, incubation ceases and insanity begins. Sometimes, however, the illusion is physical rather than psychical of the sense rather than of the intelligence. It commences at night: the incubator begins by seeing nocturnal visions, often of a photopsic* character, or hearing nocturnal sounds, neither of which have any material existence, being conveyed to his optic or auricular nerves not from without, but from within, by the agency of a disordered brain. These the reason, hitherto unimpaired, combats at first, especially when they are nocturnal only: but being reproduced, and becoming diurnal, the judgment succumbs under the morbid impression produced so repeatedly. These are the ordinary antecedent symptoms characteristic of the incubation of insanity; to which are frequently added somatic exaltation, or, in popular language, physical excitability—a disposition to knit the brows—great activity of the mental faculties—or else a well marked decline of the powers of the understanding—an exaggeration of the normal conditions of thought—or a reversal of the mental habits and sentiments, such as a sudden aversion to some person hitherto beloved, or some study long relished and pursued."

Jane asked leave to note these all down in her note-book.

Mr. Hardie assented, adroitly; for he was thinking whether he could not sift some grain out of all this chaff. Should Alfred blab his suspicions, here were two gentlemen who would at all events help him to throw ridicule on them.

Dr. Wycherley having politely aided Jane Hardie to note down "the preliminary process of the Incubation of disorders of the Intellect," resumed: "Now, Sir, your son appears to be in a very inchoate stage of the malady: he has cerebral Kephalalgia and Insomnia—"

"And, oh doctor, he knits his brows often; and has given up his studies; won't go back to Oxford this term."

"Exactly; and seeks isolation, and is a prey to morbid distraction and reverie: but has no palpable illusions; has he?"

"Not that I know of," said Mr. Hardie.

"Well but," objected Jane, "did not he say something to you very curious the other night; about Captain Dodd, and fourteen thousand pounds?"

Mr. Hardie's blood ran cold:

"No," he stammered, "not that I remember."

"Oh yes he did, papa: you have forgotten it: but at the time you were quite puzzled what he could mean: and you did so." She put her finger to her forehead: and the doctors interchanged a meaning glance.

"I believe you are right, Jenny," said Mr. Hardie, taking the cue so unexpectedly offered him: "he did say some nonsense I could not make head nor tail of; but we all have our crotchets; there, run away, like a good girl, and let me explain all this to our good friends here: and mind, not a word about it to Alfred."

When she was gone, he said, "Gentlemen, my son is madly in love; that is all."

"Oh, Erotic monomania is a very ordinary phase of insanity."

"His unreasonable passion for a girl he knows he can never marry makes him somewhat crotchety and cranky: that, and overstudy, may have unhinged his mind a little: suppose I send him abroad? my good brother will find the means; or we could advance it him, I and the other trustees; he comes into ten thousand pounds in a month or two."

The doctors exchanged a meaning look. They then dissuaded him earnestly from the idea of Continental travel.

"Cœlum non animam mutant qui trans mare currunt," said Wycherley, and Osmond explained that Alfred would brood abroad as well as at home, if he went alone: and Dr. Wycherley summed up thus: "The most advisable course

---

* "Arising of itself." A term rather hastily applied to disorders the coming signs of which have not been detected by the medical attendant.

The birth of Topsy was idiopathic—in that learned lady's opinion.

* Anglicè, "accompanied."
† Anglicè, "disturbed."

* Luminous.

is to give him the benefit of the personal superintendence of some skillful physician possessed of means and appliances of every sort for soothing and restraining the specific malady."

Mr. Hardie did not at first see the exact purport of this eloquent peripharsis. He knitted his brows. Presently he caught a glimpse: but said he thought confinement was hardly the thing to drive away melancholy.

"Not in all respects," replied Dr. Wycherley: "but, on the other hand, a little gentle restraint is the safest way of effecting a disruption of the fatal associations that have engendered and tend to perpetuate the disorder. Besides, the medicinal appliances are invaluable; including, as they do, the nocturnal and diurnal attendance of a Psychophysical physician, who knows the Psychosomatic relation of body and mind, and can apply physical remedies, of the nature of which on the physical instrument of intelligence, the gray matter of the brain, we have seen so many examples."

The good doctor then feelingly deplored the inhumanity of parents and guardians in declining to subject their incubators to exposure and salutary restraint under the more than parental care of a psychosomatic physician. On this head he got quite warm, and inveighed against the abominable cruelty of the thing.

"It is contrary," said he, "to every principle of justice and humanity that a fellow-creature's deranged perhaps only on one point, should for the want of the early attention of those, whose duty it is to watch over him, linger out a life of existence separated from all who are dear to him, and condemned without any crime to be a prisoner for life."

Mr. Hardie was puzzled by this sentence, in which the doctor's usual method was reversed, and the thought was bigger than the words.

The doctors did not interfere, but let the suggestion resume.

"Oh," said Mr. Hardie at last, "I see. We ought to incarcerate our children to keep them from being incarcerated."

"That is one way of putting it with a vengeance," said Mr. Osmond, staring. "No; what my good friend means—"

"Is this; where the patient is possessor of an income of such a character as to enable his friends to devote a sincere attention to ameliorating the consequences of neglected morbid phenomena of the brain, there a lamentable want of humanity is exhibited by the nonrestraint refusal to the patient, on the part of his relatives, of the incalculable advantages of physician accompanied with the safeguards and preventions of restraint."

But ere the mellifluous phrase had done oiling his paradox with fresh polysyllables, to make it slip into the Banker's narrow understanding, he met with a curious interruption. Jane Hardie fluttered in to say a man was at the door accusing himself of being deranged.

"How often this sort of coincidence occurs," said Osmond, philosophically.

"If you refuse him, dear papa; it is not for money: he only wants you to give him an order to go into a lunatic asylum."

"Now, there is a sensible man," said Dr. Wycherley.

"Well but," objected Mr. Hardie, "if he is a sensible man, why does he want to go to an asylum?"

"Oh, they are all sensible at times," observed Mr. Osmond, sad.

"Singularly so," said Dr. Wycherley, warmly. And he showed a desire to examine this paragon, who had the sense to know he was out of his senses.

"It would be but kind of you, Sir," said Jane, "poor, poor man!" She added he did not like to come in, and would they mind just going out to him?

"Oh no, not in the least: especially as you seem interested in him."

And they all three rose and went out together, and found the petitioner at the front door. "Who should it be, but James Maxley!"

His beard was unshaven, his face haggard, and every thing about him showed a man broken in spirit as well as fortune: even his head low hali its vigor, and, whenever he had uttered a connected sentence or two, his head dropped on his breast, pitiably: indeed, this sometimes occurred in the middle of a sentence, and then the rest of it died on his lips.

Mr. Richard Hardie was not prepared to encounter one of his unhappy creditors at so publicly, and, to shorten the annoyance, would have dismissed him roughly: but he dared not: for Maxley was no longer alone, nor unfriended: when Jane left him, to intercede for him, a young man joined him, and was now comforting him with kind words, and trying to get him to smoke a cigar: and this good-hearted young gentleman was the Banker's son in the flesh, and his opposite in spirit, Mr. Alfred Hardie.

Finding these two in contact, the Doctors interchanged demeaner glances.

Mr. Hardie asked Maxley sullenly what he wanted of them.

"Well, Sir," said Maxley, despondently, "I have been to all the other magistrates in the borough; for what with losing my money, and what with losing my missus, I think I 'ain't quite right in my head; I do see such curious things, enough to make a body's skin creep, at times."

And down went his head on his chest.

"Well?" said Mr. Hardie, peevishly: "go on: you went to the magistrates, and what then?"

Maxley looked up, and seemed to recover the thread: "Why, they said 'no,' they couldn't send me to the 'sylum, not from home: I must be a pauper first. So then my neighbors they said I had better come to you." And down went his head again.

"Well but," said Mr. Hardie, "you can not expect me to go against the other magistrates."

"Why not, Sir? You have had a hafful o' money of me: the other gentlemen hain't had a farthing. They owes me no service, but you does: nine hundred pounds' worth, if ye come to that."

There was no malice in this; it was a plain, broken-hearted man's notion of give and take; but it was a home thrust all the same; and Mr. Hardie was visibly discountenanced, and Alfred more so.

Mr. Osmond, to relieve a situation so painful, asked Maxley rather hastily what were the curious things he saw.

Maxley shuddered. "The unreasonablest beasts, Sir, you ever saw or heard tell on: mostly snakes and dragons. Can't stop my head to do no work for them, Sir. Blest creeter heart, if it was to leave you gentlemen now, and go and dig for five minutes in my garden, they would come about me as thick as bugs on cabbage: why, 'twas but yesterday I tried to hoe a bit, and up comes the fearfullest great fiery sarpint: scared me so I heaved my hoe and killed it. Then presently I seemed to come out of a sort of a kind of a mist into the clear; and there laid my poor missus's favorite hen; I had been and killed her for a sarpint." He sighed: then, after a moment's pause, raised his voice to a whisper. "Now suppose I was to go and take some poor Christian for one of these gre--at bloody sarpens I do see now and then. I might do him a mischief, you know, and not mean him no harm neither. Oh dooze take and have me locked up, gentlemen, for I'm sure like I 'ain't fit to be about, my poor head is so mazed."

"Well, well," said Mr. Hardie, "I'll give you an order for the 'Sylum."

"What, make a pauper of me?"

"I can not help it," said the magistrate: "it is the routine; and it was the routine at a meeting of the bench last month that we must adhere to the rule as strictly as possible: the asylum is so full: and you know, Maxley, it is not as if you were dangerous."

"That I be, Sir: I don't know what I'm a looking at, or a doing of, but I 'ah' gone and killed my poor Susan's hen if I hadn't a been beside myself? and she in her grave, poor dear: no, not for untold gold would I have done that too; used to be, however: but now I don't seem to care for money nor nothing else." And his head dropped.

"Look here, Maxley, old fellow," said Alfred, exactly in the way to the work-house; "it's a crocodile, and will be sure to bite you into an asylum whether the Barkington magistrates like it or not: that is the routine, I believe; and as reasonable as most routine."

Dr. Wycherley admired Alfred for this, and whispered Mr. Osmond, "How subtly they reason."

Mr. Hardie did not deign to answer his son, who indeed had not lifted his head and looked Mr. Hardie in the face.

"You be a hard man:" said he, trembling with emotion. "I 'ah' been a hard man to dozens of our all, you ha' broke her heart, and turned my head, and if I was to come and kill you 'twould only be natural revenge. Stead of that I comes to you like a lamb, and says give me your name on a bit of paper, and put me out of harm's way. No, Sir," says you, "I'll be d--d first." Be you in the work-house? You that owes me nine hundred pounds and my dead missus 's?" With this he rose, and felt in his own pocket, as of his pocket, and flung it at Mr. Hardie's head before any one could stop him.

But Alfred Hardie stepped forward, and caught it with one hand, and with the other delivery of a wicket-keeper, within a foot of his father's nose. "How's this, Governor?" said he: then, a little sternly, "Don't do that again, Mr. Maxley, or I shall have to give you a hiding—to keep up appearances." He then opened the note in his pocket, and said, quietly, "I shall give you your money for these, before the year ends."

"You wont be quite so mad as that I hope," remonstrated his father. But he made no reply: they very seldom answered one another now.

"Oh," said Mr. Wycherley, especially him like a human curiosity, "nullum magnum ingenium sine mixturâ dementiæ."

Mr. Osmond, who was classically stultitiæ," retorted Alfred in a moment: and met his offensive gaze with a point-blank look of supercilious disdain.

Then, having shut him up, he turned to Osmond: "Come, Sir, you are the proper man for a poor fellow, who asks for a hospital, so Routine gives him a work-house: come, you know there is no limit to your skill and benevolence; you cured Spot of the worms, cure poor old Maxley of his snakes; oblige me."

"That I will, Alfred," said Osmond, heartily: and wrote a prescription on a leaf of his memorandum book, remarking that, though a simple purgative, it had many records of its great many serpents, and dragons, and not a few specires and hobgoblins into the bargain.

The young gentleman then went to work quickly, and said kindly to Maxley, "get that made up—here's a guinea—and I'll send somebody to see how you are to-morrow."

The poor man took the guines, and the prescription, and his head drooped again, and he slouched away.

Dr. Wycherley remarked significantly that his conduct was worth imitating by all persons similarly situated: and concluded oracularly: "Prophylaxis is preferable to therapeusis."

"Or, as Parson would say, 'Prevention is better than cure.'"

With this parting blow the Oxonian suddenly sauntered away, unconscious, it seemed, of the existence of his companions.

"I never saw a plainer case of Incubation," remarked Dr. Wycherley, with vast benevolence of manner.

"Maxley's?"

"Oh, no; that is parochial. It is your profoundly interesting son I alluded to. Did you notice his supercilious departure? And his morbid esteem of reparies?"

Mr. Hardie replied with some little hesitation, "Yes; and excuse me, I thought he had rather the best of Maxley with you."

"Indubitably so," replied Dr. Wycherley: "they always do: at least such is my experience. If ever I break a lance of wit with an incubator, I calculate with confidence on being untinseled with abnormal rapidity: and rare, indeed, are the instances in which my anticipations are not promptly and fully realized. Now a similar rush of progression the incubator is seldom a match for the confirmed maniac, either in the light play of sarcasm, the circumlocutions of wit, or the severe encounters of dialectical ratiocination."

"Dear, dear me, Sir, then how is one to know a genius from a madman?" inquired Jane.

"By sending for a psychological physician."

"If I understand the doctor right, the two things are not opposed," remarked Mr. Hardie.

Dr. Wycherley assented, and made a remarkable statement: "Incubation:" One half of the aggregate of the genius of the country is at present under restraint; fortunately for the community, and unfortunately for itself."

He then put on his gloves, and, with much kindness but solemnity, warned Mr. Hardie not to neglect his son, nor to suppose that matters could go on like this without "disintegrating or disorganizing the gray matter of the brain. Above all," said he, "that in many recorded cases of insanity the brain on dissection has revealed no signs of structural or functional derangement: and, on the other hand, considerable encephalic disorganization has been shown to have existed in other cases without mental symptoms sufficient to suggest: but such phenomena are to be considered as pathological curiosities, with which the empiric would fain endeavor to identify the general conclusions of science. The only safe mode of reasoning on matters so delicate and profound is a priori: and, as it may be assumed as a law of self-evident proposition, that disturbed intellectual action, in the same relation to the brain disordered respiration is to the lungs, it is as philosophical, reasoning a priori, to assume the possibility of typical conditions or other mental habits of some one, as to suppose that can be reversed of pyrosis, and abnormal evanate, with all the of wit and ratiocination, without loss of the able impairment of coherent, distantiated, modification, of the psychical, motorial, and sensorial functions of the great cerebral ganglion. All that would be absurdly absurd to pronounce that these several functions can be disarranged for months, without more or less disorganization of the medullary matter of the cerebral hemisphere of the encephalon. Therefore—dissection of your talented son would doubtless reveal at this moment cubical concretions or atheromatous deposits in the cerebral blood-vessels, or an encrystal abscess, probably of no very recent origin, or, at least, not of recent inspissation, and opacity, of the membranes of the encephalon, or more or less pulpy disorganization of one or other of the hemispherical lobes: Therefore—reasoning?"

"Good-morning, Sir: and a thousand thanks for your friendly interest in my unhappy boy."

"Not at all, my dear Sir: I took their departure" (Psycho-cerebral for "departed"), and left Jane Hardie brimful of anxiety. Alfred was not given to dejection, but to two words, "Pooh" and "Stuff," and so smoke on: and, not being a university woman, she could not keep her eye on the above assumption while following the series of inferences the learned doctor built so neatly, story by story, on the foundation of the quicksand of the previous conjecture.*

"Now not a word of this to Alfred," said Mr. Hardie. "I shall propose to him a little tour, to amuse him, and take his mind."

"Yes, but papa, if some serious change is really going on inside his poor head."

"Pooh," said Mr. Hardie, impatiently.

"Don't you see that if the mind can wound the brain, the mind can cure it?" Then, after a while, he said, peevishly, "My child, I must give you a lesson: men of the world use enthusiasts—like those you read of—as tools, and throw away their tools; we don't let them make tools of us. Osmond, you know, is jackal to an asylum in London; Dr. Wycherley, I have been told, has two or three such establishments by himself or his agents: blinded by self-interest, and that of his friends, to the practical world of life, I can be sure! — they would confine a melancholy youth in a gloomy house, among afflicted persons, and give him nothing to do but brood; and so turn the scale against his reason: but I have my children's interest at heart more than they have, and I shall turn Alfred's mind away his mind with fresh objects, break off associations, and restore him to a brilliant career. Jane, you are to second me in my little scheme for his good."

"That I will, papa."

"Somehow, I don't know why, he is cooling to me."

"He does not understand you, as I do, my own papa."

"But he is affectionate with you, I think."

"Oh yes, more than ever: trouble has drawn us closer. Papa, in the midst of our sorrow, how much we have to be thankful for to the Giver of all good things!"

"Yes, little angel: and you must improve Heaven's goodness by working on your brother's affections, and persuading him to this continental tour."

This appealed to, Jane promised warmly; and the man of the world, finding he had a blind and willing instrument in the one creature he loved, kissed her on the forehead, and told her to run away, as he was Mr. Skinner, who no doubt wanted to speak on business.

Skinner, who had in fact been holding respectfully aloof for some time, came forward on Jane's retiring, and in a very obsequious tone requested a private interview. Mr. Hardie led the way into the little dining-room.

They were no sooner alone than Skinner left off fawning, very abruptly; and put on a rugged resolute manner that was new to him: "I am come for my commission," said he, studdily.

Mr. Hardie looked an inquiry.

"Oh, you don't know what I mean, of course," said the little clerk, almost brutally: "I've waited, and waited, to see if you would have the decency, and the gratitude, and the honesty, to offer me a trifle out of It; but I see I might wait till doomsday before you would ever think of thinking of anybody but yourself. So now shell out without more words or I'll blow the gaff." The little wretch raised his voice louder and louder at every sentence.

"Hush! hush! Skinner," said Mr. Hardie, anxiously, "you are under some delusion. When did I ever decline to recognize your services? I always intended to make you a present, in handsome terms."

"Then why didn't ye do it without being forced? Come, Sir, you can't draw the wool over Noah Skinner's eyes; I have had you watched, and you are looking toward the U. S., and that is too big a country for me to hunt you in. I'm not to be trifled with: I'm not to be palavered: give me a thousand pounds of it this moment or, I'll blow the whole concern and let you along with it."

"A thousand pounds?!"

"Now look at that!" shrieked Skinner. "Serves me right for not having seven thousand. What right have you to a penny piece of it more than I have? If I had the luck to be a widower, I'd be proud of a thousand. I should as you where it is this moment or I'll go to"

"But I haven't you took up for a thief; and that's the lie: you ——"

"But I haven't you took up for a thief; and that's the lie: you ——" close to your heart: I can see it bulge. Job was a patient man, but his patience went at last." With this he ran to the window and threw it open.

Hardie entreated him to be calm. "I'll give it you, Skinner," said he, "and with pleasure, if you will give me some security that you will not turn round, as soon as you have got it, and be my enemy."

"Enemy of a gent that pays me a thousand pounds? nonsense." Why should I? We are in the same boat," added he like a man, "and you know you have nothing to fear from me: but I will—not—go halves in a theft for nothing: would you? Come, Sir, will it be to peace or war? Will you be content with thirteen thousand pounds that don't belong to you, not a shilling of it, or will you go to jail a thief, and lose it every penny?"

Mr. Hardie groaned aloud, but there was no help for it. Skinner was on sale: and must be bought.

He took out two notes for five hundred pounds each, and laid them on the table, after taking their numbers.

Skinner's eyes glistened: "Thank you, Sir," said he. He put them in his pocket. Then he said quietly, "I now you have taken the numbers, Sir, so I'll not run for a bit: but he made safe against the criminal law. You are a deep one; you might say I robbed you."

"That is a very unworthy suspicion, Skinner; and a childish one."

"Oh, it is diamond cut diamond. A single line, Sir, just to say that I have made this faithful services you have given Noah Skinner two notes for £500 Nos. 1084 and 85."

"Write any hocus-pocus you please, I have your receipt for them."

It was Skinner's turn to hesitate. After reflecting however on all the possible consequences, he saw nothing to fear; so he consented.

The business completed, a magic change took place in the little man: "Now we are friends again, Sir; and I'll give you a piece of advice: mind your eye with Mr. Alfred; he is down on us."

"What do you mean?" inquired Mr. Hardie, with bill-disgusted anxiety.

"I'll tell you, Sir. He met me this morning: and says he to me, 'Skinner, old boy, I want to speak a word with you.' He put his arm on my shoulder, and turns me round, and says he all at one time 'the fourteen thousand pounds?' 'You might have knocked me down with a feather. And he looked me through like a gimlet, mind ye. 'Come now,' says he, 'you see I know all: you did,' he said, 'Captain Dodd's fourteen thousand pounds: I had passed through my hands.' Then I began to funk again at his knowing that: perhaps he only guessed it after all: but at the time I thought he knew it; I was

* So novices sitting at a conjuror see him take a weddingring, and put it in a little box before a large, or even little theatre with another little box, and put that before another lady: "Hey presto! pass!" in box 2 is discovered a weddingring, which is instantly claimed to be the ring: on this their great minds are fixed, and with this is them business done: Box 1, containing the real ring all the time, is overlooked: and the conjuror, the lawyer or not, does what he likes with his impressions in an escape—for the good of its health.

So poor Argus, when Fleurant enumerates the consequences of his omitting a single—does that I say?—be tormented by the hallucinated disorders, which succeed to each other logically enough, all the absurdity being in the first link of the chain; and from that his mind is diverted.

flustered, ye see. But I said, 'I'd look at the books; but I didn't think his deposit was any thing like that.' 'You little equivocating humbug,' says he: 'and which was better, to tell the truth at once and let Captain Dodd, which never did me any harm, have his own, or to hear it told me in the felon's dock?' those were his words, Sir: and they made my blood run cold; and if he had gone on at me like that, I should have split, I know I should: but he just said, 'there, your face has given your tongue the lie; you haven't brains enough to play the rogue. Oh, and—another thing—he said he wouldn't talk to the sparrow-hawk any more, since there was the kite hard by: so by that I guess you turn is coming, Sir; so mind your eye. And then he turned his back on me with a look as if I was so much dirt. But I didn't mind that; I was glad to be shut of him at any price."

This intelligence disconcerted Mr. Hardie terribly: it did away with all hope that Alfred meant to keep his suspicions to himself. "Why did you not tell me this before?" said he, reproachfully.

Skinner's sharp visage seemed to sharpen as he replied, "Because I wanted a thousand pounds first."

"Curse your low cunning!"

Skinner laughed. "Good-by, Sir: take care of yourself and I'll take care of mine. I'm afraid of Mr. Alfred and the stone-jug, so I'm off to London, and there I'll un-Skinner myself into Mr. Something or other, and make my thousand pounds breed me." And he whipped out, leaving his master filled with rage and dismay.

"Outwitted even by this little wretch!"

He was now accountable for fourteen thousand pounds, and had only thirteen thousand left, if forced to reimburse; so that it was quite on the cards for him to lose a thousand pounds by robbing his neighbor and risking his own immortal jewel: this galled him to the quick; and altogether his equable temper began to give way; it had already survived half the iron of his nerves. He walked up and down the parlor chafing like an irritated lion. In which state of his mind the one enemy he now feared and hated walked quietly into the room, and begged for a little serious conversation with him.

"It is like your effrontery," said he: "I wonder you are not ashamed to look your father in the face."

"Having wronged nobody, I can look anybody in the face," replied Alfred, looking him in the face point-blank.

At this swift rejoinder Mr. Hardie felt like a too-confident swords-man, who, attacking in a passion, suddenly receives a prick that shows him his antagonist is not one to be trifled with. He was on his guard directly, and said, coldly: "You have been belying me to my very clerk."

"No, Sir; you are mistaken: I have never mentioned your name to your clerk."

Mr. Hardie reflected on this answer and told him, and found he had made another false move. He put that out of the Dodds' minds with an assumption of sincere.

"Not to the Dodds," replied Alfred, calmly.

"What, not to Miss Julia Dodd?"

"No, Sir; I have seen her but once, since—discovered about the fourteen thousand pounds."

"What fourteen thousand pounds?" inquired Mr. Hardie, innocently.

"What fourteen thousand pounds!" repeated the young man, disdainfully. Then suddenly turning on his father, with red brow and flashing eyes: "the fourteen thousand pounds Captain Dodd brought home from India: the fourteen thousand pounds I heard him claim of you with curses; ay, miserable son, and miserable man, that I am, I heard my own father called a villain; and what did my father reply? Did you hurl the words back into your accuser's throat? No; you whispered, 'Hush! hush! I'll bring it you down.' Oh, what a hell shame is!"

Mr. Hardie turned pale and almost sick: with these words of Alfred's fled all hope of ever deceiving him.

"Then, there," said the young man, lowering his voice from rage to profound sorrow: "I don't come here to quarrel with my father, nor to insult him, God knows: and I entreat you for both our sakes not to try my temper too hard by these childish attempts to blind me: and, Sir, pray dismiss from your mind the notion that I have disclosed to any living soul my knowledge of this horrible secret: on the contrary, I have kept it gnawing my heart, and almost maddening me at times. For my own personal satisfaction I have applied a test both to you and Skinner; but that is all I have done: I have not told dear Julia, nor any of her family; and now, if you will only listen to me, and do what I entreat you to do, she shall never know; oh, never."

"Oho!" thought Mr. Hardie, "he comes with a proposal: I'll hear it my way."

He then took a line well known to artful men: he encouraged Alfred to show his hand; maintaining a complete reserve as to his own: "You say you did not communicate your illusions about this fourteen thousand pounds to Julia Dodd that night: may I ask then (without indiscretion) what did pass between you two?"

"I will tell you, Sir. She saw me standing there, and asked me in her own soft angel voice if I was unhappy. I told her I must be a poor creature if I could be happy. Then she asked me, with some hesitation I thought, why I was unhappy. I said because I could not see the path of honor and duty clear: that, at least, was the purport. Then she told me that in all difficulties she had found the best way was to pray to God to guide her; and she begged me to lay my care before him, and ask his counsel. And then I thanked her, and bade her goodnight, and she me; and that was all passed between us two unhappy lovers, whom you have made miserable; and even cool to one another; but not hostile to you. And you played the spy on us, Sir; and misunderstood us, as spies generally do. Ah, Sir, a few months ago you would not have condescended to that."

Mr. Hardie colored, but did not reply. He had passed from the irritable into the quietly vindictive stage.

Alfred then deprecated further discussion of what was past, and said abruptly: "I have an offer to make you: in a very short time I shall have ten thousand pounds; I will not resign my whole fortune; that would be unjust to myself, and my wife; and I loathe and despise Injustice in all its forms however romantic or plausible. But, if you will give the Dodds their £14,000, I will share my little fortune equally with you: and thank you, and bless you. Consider, Sir, with your abilities and experience, five thousand pounds may yet be the nucleus of a fortune; a fortune built on an honorable foundation. I know you will thrive with my five thousand pounds ten times more than with their fourteen thousand; and enjoy the blessing of blessings, a clear conscience."

Now this offer was no sooner made than Mr. Hardie shut his face, and went to mental arithmetic, like one doing a sum behind a thick door. He would have taken ten thousand: but five thousand did not much tempt him: besides, would it be five thousand clear? He already owed Alfred two thousand five hundred. It flashed through him that a young man who loathed and despised Injustice—even to himself—would not consent to be diddled by him out of one sum while making him a present of another: and then there was Skinner's thousand to be reimbursed. He therefore declined in these terms:

"This offer shows me you are sincere in these strange notions you have taken up. I am sorry for it: it looks like insanity. These nocturnal illusions, these imaginary sights and sounds, come of brooding on a single idea, and often usher in a calamity one trembles to think of. You have made me a proposal: I make you one: take a couple of hundred pounds (I'll get it from your trustees) and travel the Continent for four months; enlarge and amuse your mind with the contemplation of nature and manners and customs; and if that does not clear this phantom £14,000 out of your head, I am much mistaken."

Alfred replied that foreign travel was his dream; but he could not leave Barkington while there was an act of justice to be done.

"Then do me justice, boy," said Mr. Hardie, with wonderful dignity, all things considered. "Instead of brooding on your own fantastical idea, and shutting out all rational evidence to the contrary, take the trouble to look through my books; and there you'll find you owe me, at this moment, not fourteen thousand, but of eighty thousand pounds, honorably sacrificed in the struggle to fulfill my engagements: who, do you think, will believe, against such evidence, the preposterous tale you have concocted against your poor father? Already the tide is turning, and all, who have seen the accounts of the Bank, pity me; they will pity me still more if ever they hear my own flesh and blood insults me in the moment of my fall; sees me ruined by my honesty, and living in a hovel, yet exposes into that poor but honest abode, and stabs me to the heart by accusing me of stealing fourteen thousand pounds: a sum that would have saved me, if I could only have laid my hands on it."

He hid his face, to conceal its incongruous expression: and heaved a deep sigh.

Alfred turned his head away and groaned.

After a while he rose from his seat and went to the door: but seemed reluctant to go: he cast a longing, lingering look on his father, and said, beseechingly: "Oh think! you are not my flesh and blood more than I am yours; is all the love to be on my side? have I no influence even when right is on my side?" Then he suddenly turned and threw himself impetuously on his knees; "Your father was the soul of honor: your son loathed fraud and injustice from his cradle; you stand between two generations of Hardies, and belong to neither; do but reflect one moment how right a thing honor is, how short and uncertain a thing life, how sure a thing retribution is, in this world or the next: it is your guardian angel that kneels before you now, and not your son: oh, for Christ's sake, for my mother's sake, listen to my last appeal. You don't know me: I can not compromise with injustice. Pity me, pity her I love, pity yourself!"

"You young viper!" cried the father, stung with remorse but not touched with penitence. "Get away, you amorous young hypocrite; get out of my house, get out of my sight, or I'll spit on you and curse you at my feet."

"Enough!" said Alfred, rising and turning suddenly calm as a statue: "let us be gentlemen, if you please, even though we must be enemies. Good-by, my father that was."

And he walked gently out of the room, and, as he passed the window, Mr. Hardie heard his great heart sob.

He wiped his forehead with his handkerchief. "A hard tussle," thought he, "and with my own unnatural, ungrateful, flesh and blood: but I have won it; he hasn't told the Dodds: he never will: and, if he did, who would believe him, or them?"

At dinner there was no Alfred; but after dinner a note to Jane informing her he had taken lodgings in the town, and requesting her to send his books and clothes in the evening. Jane handed the note to her father: and sighed deeply. Watching his face as he read it, she saw him turn rather pale, and looked more furrowed than ever.

"Papa!" said she, "What does it all mean?"

"I am thinking."

Then, after a long pause he ground his teeth and said, "It means—WAR."

OUR WORKS BEFORE JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.—SKETCHED BEFORE THE EVACUATION BY CAPTAIN ANDREWS OF ANTIETAM AND FIFTH ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS.—[SEE PAGE 525.]

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE C. STRONG.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE LATE COLONEL ROBERT G. SHAW.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

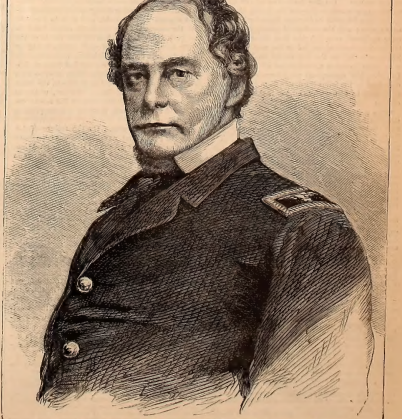
THE LATE GENERAL GEORGE C. STRONG.

WE publish on this page a portrait—from a photograph by Brady—of the late GENERAL STRONG, who died in this city on 30th ult., from the results of a wound received in the recent attack on Fort Wagner.

George C. Strong was born at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, in 1836, entered West Point in 1855, and graduated in 1857. He entered the Ordnance Department, and on the outbreak of the rebellion was in command of the Watervliet Arsenal. He applied for active employment, was placed on the staff of General M'Dowell, and served in that capacity at the battle of Bull Run. He served for a short time on the staff of General M'Clellan, but was soon transferred to General Butler, and preceded to organize the Butler expedition. He was stationed for some time in Boston and vicinity, and sailed for the Gulf, arriving at Ship Island March 24, 1862. When New Orleans was taken he removed his office to that city, and transacted the business of the Department of the Gulf. The labor and exertion attendant upon his position nearly cost him his life, which for some time was despaired of, but a compulsory visit to the North restored him to health. As chief of General Butler's staff he conducted several expeditions to Biloxi and up the Mississippi, and thus betrayed a character for gallantry that only wanted the opportunity to develop itself.

He returned to the North with General Butler, and after a brief period of inactivity was, at the request of General Gilmore, placed in command of a brigade in the Department of the South. He had previously been appointed Brigadier-General, on the recommendation of General Butler. The following, from the Herald correspondence, will show how he commenced his work:

During the early part of the army movements under General Gilmore to General Strong's brigade was awarded the post of honor, as may be gathered from the following extract from general orders:



SPECIAL ORDERS—No. 2. July 9, 1863.

The attack on Morris Island will take place to-morrow morning at break of day, by opening our batteries at the north end of Folly Island. General Strong's brigade will embark to-night, and hold itself in Folly Island Creek ready to move forward, and at the proper time occupy the south end of Morris Island.

The brigade landed in due order, and, with General Strong and staff at their head, the advance kept on long after they got under the rebel fire. The General, who had fallen into the water, after he got his ducking pulled off his riding-boots to pour out the water, and was too eager to get on to stop and put them on; so he headed the charge with only stockings on, and in that state led the troops on over hot sand-ridges, up the beach, across shell-banks and oyster-beds, regardless of the style of footing. This conduct pleased the troops amazingly, and the colonel moved on slowly and silently up the beach without account, so that when they arrived within two hundred yards of the fort, when a charge was ordered.

GENERAL QUINCY A. GILMORE.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY HAAS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

CAPTAIN JOHN RODGERS, OF THE "WEEHAWKEN."—[SEE PAGE 526.]

General Strong then sent up to the men at the proper moment and said, "Now, boys, and trust in God! Forward, the Connecticut Seventh!" And away they went as a double-quick, with their General at their head. The first double-quick, with their bayonets, heavily charged with opened with its usual effect, and a third young officer grape and canister, still the survivors pressed on, passed the smoke through the embrasures of the works and entered them, and stood on the parapet after the charge the following was added to the Commanding General's congratulatory order:

Special praise are due to Brigadier-General George C. Strong and his command for the heroic gallantry with which they carried the fortifications on Morris Island, this being the first instance during the war in which powerful works have been assaulted successfully by a column disembarked under a heavy artillery fire.

He was placed in com- and of the troops on Morris Island, in charge of the column which was to assault Fort Wagner on the evening of 18th. The correspondents say that before the attack Gen. Strong addressed the troops in a few words of fire, which inspirited them so that they felt "like tigers in the attack." The Herald correspondent thus narrates the fearful struggle:

Strong's brigade marched in column up past the right of our batteries, then deployed and advanced in line a short distance, then deployed again and marched up the beach in close order. As they came near the movement, each pitcher shell over and among the troops. When the brigade had got within about 400 yards, it got two-thirds the distance to the fort the rebels in Fort Wagner came out in full force, with their severest musket fusilade almost together and poured a deadly fire into our troops. The guns were brought to bear on them, and grape and canister were showered upon them. With a shout they advanced, but were driven back, with a double-quick, and rallying, directly up into that terrible fire. Musketry rattled, Sumter's shells screamed overhead, guns, bullets whistled, canister tore, grape plowed along the ground, the fort was lighted up almost constantly by the fire from muskets, guns, rifles, and cannon, and the flash of shells, but steadily, pleasing shouts of cheers. They never stopped —never wavered—never faltered, but step by step they fell at their enthusiasm they deserved a better fate."

One who knew him well wrote of him, most truthfully:

It was that rare quality that commands at once the love and obedience of men, and which makes the born leader and for a commander. Of a most genial and kindly nature, of manners so gentle as to disarm the most prejudiced, and that brooked nothing coarse, of a clear mora insight that no evil association had marred, of strength of purpose showing always at noble ends, of a courage quiet but cleer-eyed, of thoughtfulness for others, of considerateness for subordinates, and at the same time moulds all others brought in close and daily contact with him, he was observed at once by when only a second lieutenant in the Second Massachusetts, how much he resembled, in these respects, the late Colonel Shaw. This country has lost in him one of its best soldiers, and one of its most accomplished men.

Colonel Shaw was only about twenty-seven years of age, and had married a few weeks before he joined the army of the South.

GENERAL QUINCY A. GILMORE.

We publish on page 525 a portrait of General Gilmore, the commander of our army near Charleston, from a photograph by Lieutenant Haas.

General Gilmore was born in Ohio, about thirty-six years ago. He graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1845, and graduated in 1849, at the head of a class of 43 members. He was appointed to the Engineer Corps, and promoted to a First Lieutenancy in 1856, and to a Captaincy in 1861. From 1849 to 1852 he was engaged on the fortifications of Hampton Roads, and from 1852 to 1856 he was instructor of Practical Military Engineering at West Point, and during this time he designed the new fort which is now being erected on Hilli. He served from 1856 to 1861 as Purchasing Agent for the department in New York, and made many friends here. In 1861 he was assigned to the staff of General Sherman, and accompanied him to Port Royal. General Sherman appointed him Brigadier-General of Volunteers — a rank which the President made haste to confirm. General Gilmore had active service in the Peninsula campaign against Fort Pulaski, and it is to his skill that the success of the bombardment is due. It was very justly one of the first results of his efforts to breach a fort of such strength and at such a distance confers high honor on the engineering skill and self-possession of our officers. Much more. Failure in an attempt made in opposition to the opinion of the ablest engineers in the army would have destroyed his reputation. In fact in this case is wholly attributable to his talent, energy, and independence, deserves a corresponding reward.

That reward he won. On the failure of Admiral Du Pont's first naval attack on Charleston he was appointed by Admiral Dahlgren, and General Hunter by General Gilmore. The latter at once commenced his attack on Charleston, proceeding to land at Morris Island and advance on Fort Wagner with his customary energy and caution. How well he has succeeded our news is there to show. The capture of the west of Charleston, and theses who know him best are satisfied that he will not be disappointed.

THE CAPTURE OF JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.

We publish on page 524 an illustration of our world-famous Jackson, Mississippi, with the rebel works in the background, drawn by our artist Captain Achenbach of the Ninety-seventh Illinois Volunteers. As everyone remembers, Jackson was evacuated within forty-eight hours after our picture was taken. The Herald correspondent thus describes the appearance of the place after we entered:

It would begar description to attempt to portray the appearance of Jackson after the rebels retreated. Destruction was visible on all hands. Our own army, on its first visit to Jackson, destroyed much valuable property; and, to complete the catalogue, the rebels burned up fifty or sixty buildings, and left the remainder riddled by shot, on the ground of military necessity, to accomplish the defeat of the enemy. Another reason which they were not able to transport in their retreat. The day was sultry, scarcely a current of fresh air being felt, and the smoke from the ruins of the fires poured along through the principal streets, making a trip through the city decidedly uncomfortable.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Appalling and Mysterious.—A gentleman (?) and his wife took lodgings some time since in a street not far from Broadway. One morning the gentleman went out, apparently alone, and did not return. On subsequently searching the room the landlady was horrified on discovering that her lodger had taken his better-half with him, and left his quarters. Surgical aid was called in, but too late to be of any assistance.

Art Manufactures.—The other day a gentleman holding an official position gave a rising young modeler his card, requesting him to call upon him at more main end of the mug for drinking purposes.

Education.—It is the part of a virtuous government to give good instruction to its youth. In the great metropolis we are often taught a moral lesson by the sight of a young man being brought up by a police magistrate.

Sauce from a Gander.—A foolish friend of ours declares that the discovery of the source of the Nile would in the Dark Ages have been called an act of source-ery.

A Cool Thing for the Warm Weather.—Running into the Bank and inquiring if they can oblige you with change for five cents.

SONGS OF THE HOUSEHOLD.—THE MAT.

Be good enough to wipe your shoes, I'll thank you, for It's

To splash those marks injurious which arise,
Remember when the mat is placed, the prejudice is strong
In favor of the friction it supplies.

Eat Your Words.—Eat your words and sup stairs before our eyes.

So be good enough, etc.

The Previous Question.—Has she much tin?

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Fokkings.—If cotton is to be was a very rude man, indeed, to pass a sleepless night without even nodding.

Molly Gutta.—Depends entirely on your head in a pail of boiling water may be comforting, but is hardly to be recommended as a cure for corns.

Pops wants to know if, when distance lens enchantment to the view, the latter is ever returned? We hardly think so; most probably it was left a loan.

Novel Disease.—The gentleman who caught a train is receiving.

In what case is it absolutely impossible to be alive and sure?—In the case of a watch.

As a hotel table one day, one boarder remarked to his neighbor, "I see the papers say there is a healthy place for children." "Why so?" asked the other. "Because I never see any dead ones beefsteaks."

A man, not long since, committed suicide by drowning, as the jury expressed it, "in the corner field on the quest on his hat and bottle, found on the bank of the river. Verdict, "Found drowned."

The proprietor of a bone mill advertises that those sending their own bones to be ground will be attended to with punctuality and diligence.

Jones complained of a bad smell about the pot-office, and asked Brown what it could be? Brown didn't know, but suggested that it might be caused by "the dead letters."

What is drinking?—Suicide of the mind.

"After you," as the tea-kettle said to the dog's tail.

"More work and less noise," as the lady's watch said when it beat St. Paul's.

A secretary being asked by an intimate friend why he had so few private mails, apply replied, "Because mails did not promote me."

Advice.—Philosophical physic, pleasant to give but unpleasant to take.

Patter.—The mist that vapors round insignificance.

"By your leaves, gentlemen," as the winds said to the trees in autumn.

Why would tying a slow horse to a post improve his pace?—Because it would be a way to make him fast.

"I never did see such a wind and such a storm," said a man in a coffee-room. "And yet, Sir," inquired a would-be wit, "since you saw the wind and the storm, why should that cause to be?" "The wind blew and the storm rose," was the ready rejoinder.

"Little boys should be seen and not heard." That's what a little fellow told his teacher when he could'n say his lesson.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Piles! Piles!

Dr. Wilbur's Vegetable Pills are a certain cure for Blind and Bleeding Piles. The worst case yield after one or two doses. No surgical operation nor external application should be resorted to; such treatment only aggravates the disease. Testimonials from ladies and gentlemen of the highest respectability can be seen at the Office. Price 50 cents per box. Sent by mail to any part of the country. Sold at all the druggists, and by the proprietor, J. YOUNG, 81 Broadway, N. Y.

French (Solitaire) Patterns.

These fashionable goods are made of the finest Ivory, and brought to a high polish of all colors, Black, White, Red, Blue, &c., and engraved with Initial Letters. Old English, &c. Complete sets $1 50, four by mail. Trade supplied.

JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, New York.

Sight and Hearing.—Dr. Von Moschzisker, the only legitimate European OCULIST and AURIST in the country, has his OFFICE 1027 WALNUT Street, PHILADELPHIA, where he may be consulted on DEAFNESS and all maladies of the EYE and EAR.

Gas Stoves for Cooking and Heating. Eagle Gas Stoves.

Patented July 1st, 1863.

These Stoves contain the latest improvements.

No Dirt, Smoke, or Ashes.

Will do Cooking or Heating Cheaper than Coal or Wood.

Every Stove is Warranted.

Depot 474 Broadway, N. Y.

H. D. BAKER, Sole Manufacturer.

$1 WATCHES AND JEWELRY $1

The only chance offered to get good jewelry for One Dollar, and a Watch, if you want one. Send 19 cents for blank certificate and catalogue, giving the name of every article, and make your own selection.

H. BLISS & CO., 85 & 84 Nassau Street, N. Y.

A RICH NUMBER.

The Phrenological Journal for August, now ready, contains: George Gordon Meade, Phrenological Character and Biography; Jefferson Davis, Character; The Law of Development; The Unity of Man; The American Man; Physiognomy—No. 1; Phrenology and the Bible; Something about Lions; Republican Manners; The Secret of Longevity; Admiral Foote, Phrenological Character and Biography; Fiery and Physiology; The Circulation of the Blood; Shall we Flog our Children? Negro Peculiarities; Position when Sleeping; Stammering; Clergymen's Sons, &c.; National Defences.—No. 1; Something about the Princess Alexandra; The Question of Crinoline; A Visit to Phrenological Science; The Question of Size, &c. $1 50 a year. Fowler & Wells, No. 308 Broadway.

MANUAL

For Quartermasters & Commissaries

Containing Instructions in the preparations of vouchers, abstracts, returns, &c., embracing all the recent changes in the several regulations, together with instruction respecting taxation of salaries, &c. By Capt. R. E. Haynes, U. S. A. 12mo., price $1. Sent free by mail on receipt of price. Just published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Bartlett supplies the Messrs for all Sewing Machines. Sends by Mail or Express everywhere. 428 Broadway, Cincinnati, and 5 Beekman, 150 fer 19 cents all sizes. 442 Broadway, N. Y.

Family Sewing Machines, $5 to $15.

The acknowledged simplest practical Machines ever produced. Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine Co., 508 Broadway, N. Y.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Village and City throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unscented, and saleable extra large size Fancy Soaps, Perfumes, Razors, and Jewelry Packages, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotting, Beautiful Fashions, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepers, Household Receipts, Games, Jokes, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Secrets, Advice, &c., &c., the whole for only $1, sealed, securely, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents. Wholesale rate to agents very low. Great Extra Original, Largest, and Cheap Prize Package House in the World.

We assert it boldly.—There are no other Medicines so reliable, effectual, and convenient as HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT.—Any sufferer may be sure. They are invaluable to the Soldier exposed to Wounds, Sores, Fevers, and Skin Complaints. They never fail. Only 25 cents per box or pot.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something required by every person. Sent to any address sent free by mail for 20 cents that retails for $2, by E. G. FOSCOTT, 191 Nassau Street, New York.

Printing-Presses for Sale.

One Taylor Drum Cylinder, four Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 33x51. Price $1750.

One Taylor Drum Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 33x51. Price $2500.

Apply to ELLIS & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

A PRINTING OFFICE FOR $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

The LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the cheapest and best yet invented. They are as easy as ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas at Thousands. Druggists, Grocers, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill Heads, Circulars, Shipping Tags, and Labels at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

Dougall's Illustrated Almanac.—The most amusing lavation for additive interest to Portrait-Cards. Stereoscopic Views and Photographic Albums. 331 Broadway, and Booksellers and Newsmongers, &c.

New Maps of Charleston Harbor, S. C., Port Hudson, and Vicksburg, showing all of the Fortifications, Batteries, &c. Size 20x30, price only 10 cents. Agents wanted everywhere. G. W. TOMLINSON, Publisher, 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

PORTABLE

Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Case Watches.....	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches.....	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches.....	35 00 each.
800 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Etc. Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
1500 Gent's Breast Pins.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
2500 Sets of Boom Studs.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sleeve Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings.....	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
8000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All Gold Pens 14 Carats and Warranted.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, well sealed and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. The Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents in any, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

293 Broadway, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Potatoes, &c., to be seen.—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate. Only a few tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good title and sound society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Depot of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rail road free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union Troops, sent free of charge, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enumerated cards to the pack. Eagle, Shields, Stars, and Stripes on the backs, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

496 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers discharged for wounds, entitled to bounty, so send our Hand-Book of Information and Blanks, with Lists of Prizes, by enclosing address, with stamp to pay return postage. SOMES, BROWN & CO., 5 Park Place, New York, and 476 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

$75 PER MONTH guaranteed. Testimonials of $20 forwarded, or stamp and stencil free. ISAAC HALE, Jr. & CO., Mewburyport, Mass.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of badge furnished. It can be forwarded to any garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

In sold 18 k. gold, $3 50.

J. A. MILLER C.D. 5TH N.Y.V.

Just Ready. Price, $1 25 Paper; $1 50 Cloth.

Romola. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," &c. With Numerous Illustrations.

"Romola" is a performance of which no other woman of genius among us would have been capable than precisely George Eliot.—The Examiner (London).

There are noble things to be found in "Romola," which will make the reader's heart burn within him. It will be scarcely possible to rise from the perusal without being penetrated by the "joy of elevated thought," without feeling a desire to cease from a time of self-pleasing, and to embody in action that sense of obligation, of obedience to duty, which is, indeed, the strong conviction that has been conferred on man, the high gift in which all others are conclusive. This is high praise; and a work that can produce this effect, if only on a single reader, has not been written in vain.—The Athenæum, London.

Such an intellectual study, to use an artist's phrase, as "The Mulema," has not been placed before the world in this generation; and we know not which to wonder at most, the ingenuity of the sustained knowledge displayed, or the art with which that knowledge is infused—there is no other fitting word—into the reader's mind. Shakespeare might have exulted in The.—Spectator (London).

George Eliot has Sir Walter Scott's art for revivifying the past, but not Scott's dynamical force in making you plunge into it with as breathing an interest as into the present. For this she compensates by a deeper and wider intellectual grasp. * * It is marvelous that the wide and calm imaginative power of the writer should have produced a work which is likely to be permanently identified with English literature, in which Italy and England may feel a common pride. * * The great and concentrated int rest of the book—at least after the wonderful development of Tito's character—is the portion of Savonarola, which it is almost impossible not to feel as brilliantly historic as it is genuine as romance. * * His portrait evinces almost as great a graphic power, and far greater dramatic care, than Sir Walter Scott used in those pictures of the various Stewarts.—Spectator (London).

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of the Price.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY,

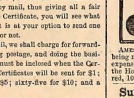
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614

NEW YORK CITY.

Union Badge.

FEB HUNDRED, $10,00.

SINGLE BADGES.



$1 00.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

We will also forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), any article in the City, at the LOWEST PRICES: Photographs, Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Fancy Goods, Army Regulations, Music, Jewelry, Books, Fancy Goods, Army Corps Badges, or any other article procurable in the city.

We will forward, on receipt of 25 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, FREMONT, ROSECRANS, SIGEL, BANKS, BURNSIDE, HALLECK, SCHENCK, SEYMOUR, ANDERSON, PEMBERTON, BUTLER, DEPEYSTER, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PARLOR DOMINOES.—This excellent article, bound, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive kinds, will relieve the tedium of the Camp and Hospital. Price, 50 cents, 75 cents, per mail; per hundred, 16 cents. Address as above.

Surgeon-General Hammond,

By ordering colonel and destructive Minerals from the supply tables, has conferred a blessing on our sick soldiers. Let him step once more. Let him order the discontinuance of "bleeding," and the use of BRANDRETH'S PILLS in the place thereof. Then will commence a "new era" in the practice of medicine, which would then become emphatically

THE HEALING ART.

PURE BLOOD.

Would disease affect us if our blood were pure?

Then if BRANDRETH'S PILLS purify the blood, they restore our health, and OVER A HUNDRED YEAR'S use has proved they infallibly purify the blood.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

are purely Vegetable, and innocent as bread, but infallibly

CURE BILIOUS DIARRHŒA,

CHRONIC DIARRHŒA, CHRONIC DYSENTERY,

And all Fevers and Affections of the Bowels!

Also Rheumatism, Affection of the Kidneys and Spleen: their use has a general good effect upon every organ, because they purify the blood. Read following:

CASE OF ROSCOE R. WATSON.

Dr. B. BRANDRETH, New York:—

SIR—I was a private in Company F, Seventeenth Regiment New York Volunteers. While at Harrison's Landing and on the Rappahannock, near Falmouth, I and many of my fellow-soldiers were sick with fever and ague. The army surgeon did not cure us, and I was reduced to skin and bone. Among the company were quite a number of members who had worked in your laboratory at Sing Sing. They were not sick, because they used Brandreth's Pills. These men prevailed upon me and others to use the Pills, and we were all cured in from two to five days. After this our boys used Brandreth's Pills for the typhus fever, colds and rheumatism, and in no case did they fail to restore health.

Out of gratitude to you for my good health I send you this letter, which, if necessary, the entire company will sign.

I am, respectfully yours,

ROSCOE R. WATSON.

Late Sing Sing.

JUNE 23, 1863.

REMEMBER, NEW STYLE TRADE THE GENUINE.

Brandreth's Pills are sold at 25 cents per box, with full directions, by all respectable druggists throughout the country.

The same pills, sugar-coated, sixty in a box, price 50c., at No. 4 Union Square.

NEW STYLE AT NO. 4, DEPOT FROM LABORATORY.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE BRANDRETH HOUSE,

NEW YORK.

CLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Glass Signs and silver Cards, with name, business, or order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

MUSQUITO NETS.

MUSQUITO	NEW	NETS.
MUSQUITO	KINDS	NETS.
MUSQUITO	OF	NETS.
MUSQUITO	PATENT	SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO	CANOPIES	SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO		SHIELDS.

Lace At Kelty's Curtains.

LACE No. 209 Broadway. CURTAINS.
LACE CURTAINS.

Holland & Gold Window Shades

HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.
HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DRAWN & ENGRAVED FROM LIFE

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a stimulating oily extract of Roots, Barks, and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp, and fleshing of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff; prevents the hair from falling out, or turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. Sold by druggists everywhere. Put up in a box containing two bottles. Price $1.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 493 Broadway.

WEDDING CARDS

Those Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y. 12th Edition 1863. Five Specimens by Mail, sent free of charge.

ATTENTION!

THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.
4317 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $50. Trade list sent free. Address

J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

J. HAVES'S PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Citizens, Sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from $1 cents to $2. Send stamp for circular. The fine wholesome frame keeps it away from the face, and the shot elastic, or string, keeps it down all round. It don't affect the breathing or sleeping, and is worth three times its price. J. HAYES & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, as no Rights or Licenses have been sold. No 89 Nassau St., N. Y. Sent free. Agents wanted in all parts.

$ AGENTS WANTED.

3 MORE NEW ARTICLES NOW ready. For Catalogue and terms send stamp. RICE & CO., 37 Park Row, N. Y.

Tobacco Twine,

Carpet Warp,

Twine for Hop Vines.

H. A. HARVEY, Twine and Cordage Warehouse, established 1840, at 94 Maiden Lane, New York.

BLOOD'S HELIX-NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 329 Broadway, Up-stairs, entrance on 4th Street. Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for Circular.

WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet mailed, post-paid, for 25, containing exact copies of advertisements for persons entitled to property. Address or apply to HENRY HAYS, 649 Broadway, N. Y. Costs of arms found, painted and engraved.

To Conscripts.—BUY the New Song, "How are You, Conscripts?" Price 25 cents. For sale at all Music Stores, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by HENRY TOLMAN & CO., 291 Washington St., Boston.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HUBBARD BROS.

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! The article eminently deserving public attention at this time is their celebrated

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movements, and are warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $69. By mail, $1 65 for postage: if registered, 20 cents additional. A sole delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the case.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has every part and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved rubyaction movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. Price, in a handsome morocco case, with key, only $35. By mail, postage 30 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Our Watches are novelties, such as are produced by no other house. Wherever offered they meet the most flattering approval, and are now generally used in nearly every department of the country. The Press of this and neighboring cities voluntarily contribute to our success.

"Unrivaled watches for officers, civilians, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 28.

"The prettiest and most reliable Watches in the market."—Tribune, June 20.

"Favored other manufacturers in point of accuracy and elegance."—Philadelphia Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"Hubbard Bros.' Watches keep accurate time in all climates."—N. Y. Weekly, July 23.

"Hubbard Bros. are artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish Americ n.

"Precise, neat, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Combine luxury and timekeepers."—Pittsburg Chronicle, July 27.

☞ TERMS CASH IN ADVANCE! Money can be sent by mail or Express. If by Express or mail, in a registered letter or risk. Orders will meet with prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST. 25 cents.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain GEORGE F. NORTON. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

FANNY BURNEY'S COURTSHIP, A NARRATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York; Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The best Popular Fairy Stories selected and rendered anew. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "Agatha Orphan," &c., &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

ST. CLAVE'S. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50. Just ready. Price $2 50.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK. A Novel. By MRS. GASKELL, Author of "Sylvia's Lovers," "Mary Barton," "North and South," "Cranford," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST; being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Turkey, Syria, Switzerland, Tyrol, Greece, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. Large 12mo, Leather Binding, Pocket-Book Form, $3 50.

HOOKER'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. Science for the School and Family. Part I. Natural Philosophy. By WORTHINGTON HOOKER, M.D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Yale College, Author of "The Child's Book of Nature," "Natural History," "First Book in Physiology," &c. Illustrated by nearly 300 Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE AND HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER No. 252.

MR. LINCOLN. "Look here, JEFF. DAVIS! if you lay a finger on that boy, to hurt him, I'll lick this Ugly Cub of yours within an inch of his life!"

Attention, Army and Navy!
50,000 Agents Wanted.
Army Corps and Division Pins.

American Watch Chains, Engraved Spring Lockets, Enamel and Neck Chains, Brecciola, Coal Stone, Mosaics, California Diamond, Plain and Chased Rings, Fine Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, Gents' Fine Gold California Diamond Pin and Cluster Pins with Chain attached, Coral, Opal, Lava, Mosaic, and Jet Enamelled Brooches and Ear Rings, Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, a Solid Silver Shield or other Corps or Division Pin, with your Name, Co., and Regiment handsomely engraved upon it. I will send to any one, on the receipt of $1, either of the above articles, together with my wholesale circular to Agents.

B. F. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a genial stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE & CO.,
202 Broadway, New York.

National Union League.

League Pins in Silver Plate, Fine Gold Plate, and Solid Silver, price from $2 50 to $15 per doz. Sample doz. sent by mail pre-paid, upon receipt of $6 00, or a single pin in fine gold plate upon receipt of $1 00. Our assortment is very fine. Many of our designs have been adopted by different organizations throughout the country. Also a complete assortment of Army Corps Badges.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,
Manufacturers Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

GREAT TRIUMPH.

STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. They were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.

The special correspondent of the New York Times says:
"Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by the Juries is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlements. Rich soil. Mild climate. For advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

A Bad Breath—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is so delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a deodorizer, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

Colorific Colors Hair Beautiful
Brown or Black without wash or preparation. Warranted best and cheapest. Try it, you will use no other. Sold by druggists.
General Depot, 62 John Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT.

Agents, Male and Female, wanted everywhere, at $15 per day, to sell $1.75 worth of staple goods for 25 cents. 65 cents profit out of every dollar's worth sold. We guarantee you the largest Yankee Notion Fancy Goods and Stationery Prize Package in the World. 59 sheets fine quality Writing Paper, 30 Envelopes, over one father's worth of Fancy Goods and Yankee Notions; also one elegant Gift of new and fashionable Jewelry, valued from 50 cents to $5. Retail price of this package 25 cents. Agents, you can double the money you invest every day. We give every Agent one superb Watch, correct timekeeper, free as an new address.
RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y.
N. B. No connection with parties assuming similar names.

Gold Pens and Cases,
Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' Pens	$ 75	Engraving Pens	$2 00
Med. "	1 25	Union "	2 50
Large "	1 50	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Commercial Eureka	2 25
Large Eureka "	1 50	Mammoth Eureka	3 50

The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last (8) Ten years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen now in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, before purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact class and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.

Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.
L. D. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 15 Maiden Lane,
New York City.

GUNS, PISTOLS,
Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE
For 50 cts., with Pocket Compass, showing objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address T. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

[First published August 1, 1863.]
Lloyd's Great County Map
OF THE
Whole United States,
INCLUDING
CALIFORNIA, OREGON, WASHINGTON, IDAHO, UTAH, COLORADO, WITH ALL THE OTHER TERRITORIES,
AND ABOVE THE
NEW STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
IN THE LARGEST, LATEST, AND CHEAPEST
MAP OF THE UNITED STATES
Ever Issued to Illustrate
Our Whole Country and the War.
IT IS COLORED BY COUNTIES.

It is superior to all other Maps, because it has just been engraved, and contains all the Towns, Rivers, Mountains, &c., made noted by the War; because its Topography is accurate; because while it has an immense number of names, it does not confuse the eye with a great mass of unimportant matter; because it exhibits our whole country, including West Virginia, and all the Pacific States and Territories.

AGENTS MUST SEE FOR THEMSELVES.

OUR NEW AGENTS' LIST IS READY.
Price in Sheets 50 cents, postage free.
Heavy Bound, Pocketboard Edition, $1 25.
We have Ten Kinds of WAR MAPS and CHARTS. Three Kinds of SCRIPTURE CHARTS, and a variety of miscellaneous works. Address
H. H. Lloyd & Co.,
No. 81 John Street, N. Y.

Dr. B. C. Perry,
49 Bond Street, takes this occasion to inform the Public that he will be absent from New York during the month of August. He will return, the first of September, to the city, and resume his practice. During his absence, all communications should be addressed No. 13 Avon Place, Boston, Mass.

Soldiers and Everybody!
A Great Book for you.
"The Road to Beauty, Health, and Fortune!"
Over 1000 Things worth Knowing!
Mailed free for 25 cents.
Address "Union Book Association."
Box 363 Syracuse, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted.

WATCHES FREE.
Agents in Town, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing All New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c., and they are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Prize Packages, also quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. See "He got the Key" on inside page.
S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 192 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for soldiers, and to supply a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the cheap worthless, Swiss British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being rather manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at such price as will be asked for the fancy-named Americus and Legiros of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
192 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Important to Soldiers.
Patent "EYELET HOOK" for fastening the soldier's rubber blanket. By their use a double-breasted overcoat, with strong eyelets made by the maker, completely defying wind and rain. In forming Shelter Tents, the hook remains inside, for the convenience of the soldier in hanging his trappings.
We have numberless testimonials from the Army to prove that the value of the soldier's blanket is more than doubled by their use. Send a stamp for circular, and every soldier should possess a set.
One set of hooks sent by mail, postage free on receipt of One Dollar. A discount of 50 per cent. to parties ordering one dozen sets and upwards.
Address FERGUSON & BALCH,
Importers of Watches, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

The AmericanParlor
Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles,
Celebrated Stevens,
315 Pearl Street, New York.
60 Kilby Street, Boston.

$22. WATCHES. $22.
A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.
$22. Genuine. $22.
Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.
Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates.
All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.
J. L. FERGUSON, IMPORTER OF WATCHES,
208 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Eureka Prize Package. 100 per cent. profit. Sample Watch free to Agents. $15 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 40 Ann St., N.Y.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY
REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.
Address
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Selpho's Patent, 656 Broadway, N. Y., are the best substitutes for lost limbs the World of Science has ever invented. (Established 24 years.) Send for Pamphlet. Mention paper.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER UNRIVALED
In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material.
AT UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.
10 COLLARS FOR 40 CENTS.

6 for	$12
12 for	24
1 dozen	48
2 dozen	96

Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.

THE GENUINE
PAPER COLLAR,
At Wholesale and Retail.
Gents Furnishing Goods.
I have the largest and best selected stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars and Cuffs.
SHIRTS
MADE TO ORDER.
The pride of my establishment. In this department—I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always enabled to give work that will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.
NO FIT! NO SALE!
Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on
CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
675 Broadway, N. Y.
Largege block.

A RICH NUMBER.
The Phrenological Journal for August now ready, contains: George Gordon Meade, Phrenological Character and Biography; Estimates of Character; The Law of Development; The Unity of Man; The American Man; Physiognomy—Nasal Peculiarities; Do Fishes Think; Something about Lions; Republican Manners; The Secret of Longevity; Admiral Foote, Phrenological Character and Biography; Piety and Physiology; The Circulation of the Blood; Shall we Flog our Children? Phrenological Exposition when Sleeping; Stammering; Clergymen's Sons; Dr. Nahum Capen; No. 1; Christ and Christmas; To the Princess Alexandra; The Question of Crinoline; A Ballad for the Times; Drowning; The Fiery—15 cents, or $1 50 a year. FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS
Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42
PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and directions of different styles of shirts sent free everywhere.
S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to dealers.
Agents wanted throughout the country.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. Adee, 181 Fort St., N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—Rhine cured thousands.

Wanted, at $15 per Day.
We want energetic Agents and reliable Canvassers for a newly invented article, at a commission of $15 per day. No humbug! Address C. M. DUNN & CO., Publishers, at Cincinnati, O., Chicago, Ill., or 167 Reade St., N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 347.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE STOLEN STARS.

[Not many weeks ago, at a dinner, at which were present Major-General LEWIS WALLACE, THOMAS BUCHANAN READ, and JAMES E. MURDOCH, a conversation sprung up respecting ballads for soldiers. The General maintained that hardly one had been written suited for the camp. It was agreed that each of them should write one. The following is that by General WALLACE.]

WHEN good old Father Washington
Was just about to die
He called our Uncle Samuel
Unto his bedside nigh:
"This flag I give you, Sammy dear,"
Said Washington, said he;
"Where'er it floats, on land or wave,
My children shall be free."

And fine old Uncle Samuel
He took the flag from him,
And spread it on a long pine pole,
And prayed and sung a hymn.
A pious man was Uncle Sam
Back fifty years and more:
The flag should fly till Judgment-Day,
So, by the Lord, he swore!

And well he kept that solemn oath;
He kept it well, and more:
The thirteen stars first on the flag
Soon grew to thirty-four;
And every star bespoke a State,
Each State an empire won:
No brighter were the stars of night
Than those of Washington.

Beneath that flag two brothers dwelt;
To both 'twas very dear;
The name of one was Puritan,
The other Cavalier.
"Go build ye towns," said Uncle Sam
Unto those brothers dear;
"Build any where, for in the world
You've none but God to fear."

JOHN BURNS, THE ONLY MAN IN GETTYSBURG, PA., WHO FOUGHT AT THE BATTLE.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 534.]

"I'll to the South," said Cavalier,
"I'll to the South," said he;
"And I'll to the North," said Puritan—
"The North's the land for me."
Each took a flag, each left a tear
To good old Uncle Sam;
He kissed the boys, he kissed the flags,
And, doleful, sung a psalm.

And in a go-cart Puritan
His worldly goods did lay;
With wife, and gun, and dog, and axe,
He, singing, went his way.
Of buckskin was his Sunday suit,
His wife wore linsey-jeans;
And fat they grew, like porpoises,
On hoe-cake, pork, and beans.

But Cavalier a cockney was;
He talked French and Latin;
Every day he wore broadcloth,
While his wife wore satin.
He went off in a painted ship—
In glory he did go;
A thousand niggers up aloft,
A thousand down below.

The towns were built, as I've heard said;
Their likes were never seen:
They filled the North, they filled the South,
They filled the land between.
"The Lord be praised!" said Puritan;
"Bully!" said Cavalier;
"There's room and town-lots in the West,
If there isn't any here."

Out to the West they journeyed than,
And in a quarrel got;
One said 'twas his, he knew it was;
The other said 'twas not.
One drew a knife, a pistol t'other,
And deadfully they swore:
From Northern Lake to Southern Gulf
Wild rang the wordy roar.

RESIDENCE OF JOHN BURNS, AT GETTYSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 534.]

And all the time good Uncle Sam
Sat by his fireside near,
Smokin' of his kinnikinick,
And drinkin' lager-beer.
He laughed and quaffed, and quaffed and laughed,
Nor thought it worth his while,
Until the storm in fury burst
On Sumter's sea-girt isle.

O'er the waves to the smoking fort,
When came the dewy dawn,
To see the flag he looked—and lo
Eleven stars were gone!
"My pretty, pretty stars!" he cried,
And down fell a tear.
"I've got your stars, Old Fogy Sam;"
"Ha, ha!" laughed Cavalier.

"I've got your stars in my watch-fob;
Come take them, if you dare!"
And Uncle Sam he turned away,
Too full of wrath to swear.
"Let thunder all the drums!" he cried,
While swelled his soul, like Mars'
"A million Northern boys I'll get
To bring me home my stars."

And on his mare, stout Betsey Jane,
To Scottish town he flew;
The dogs they barked, the bells did ring,
And countless bugles blew.
"Hi! stolen stars!" cried Uncle Sam—
"My stolen stars!" cried he.
"A million soldiers I must have
To bring them home to me."

"Dry up your tears, good Uncle Sam;
Dry up!" said Puritan.
"We'll bring you home your stolen stars,
Or perish every man!"
And at the words a million rose,
All ready for the fray;
And columns filled, like rivers deep,
And Southward marched away.

* * * * * *

And still old Uncle Samuel
Sits by his fireside near,
Smokin' of his kinnikinick
And drinkin' lager-beer;
While there's a female in the earth,
A gleaming of the sky,
And the rivers stop to listen
As the million marches by.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1863.

THE LATE RIOT.

THE New York Riots are passing into history, and public opinion is crystallizing on the subject. It is extremely difficult to find an apologist, anywhere, for the scandals which overcast black men because they were black, and burned an orphan asylum because the orphans were not born—poor little creatures!—with white skins. The newspapers which fomented the riot now feebly and sneakingly squirm out of the scrape; and those which called the most raffishly mob of the century a "procession of the people" are vigorously endeavoring to divert attention from themselves by calling their neighbors hare names. There is no one left to put forth even the faintest shadow of an excuse for the rioters but Governor Horatio Seymour.

And he does not amount to much. Blinded, like so many better men, by the dazzling vision of the White House in the distance, he has made a bid for the blackguards' vote in the shape of a couple or letters to the President, urging him to follow the example of the New York Common Council, and yield the point at issue to the thieves and murderers of New York. In several cold-blooded and nonparesi type does the Governor of the State strive to extenuate arson, robbery, and murder, and to nullify a statute of Congress. Of all this trash and pettifogery the President has made short work. He declines to follow the Governor into his petty argument about the distribution of quotas, and the party political question, but settles the controversy in the clean, crushing words:

"We are contending with an enemy who, as I understand, drives every able-bodied man he can reach into his ranks, every man he can subdue drives bodies into a slaughter-pen. No time is wasted, no argument is used. This profound army which will soon turn upon our own victorious soldiers already in the field, if they shall not be sustained by recruits as they should be. It produces an army with a rapidity not to be matched on our side, if we first wait the time to reason with the volunteer system, already deemed by Congress, and palpably, in fact, to be exhausted as to be inadequate, and then more time to obtain a court decision as to whether a law in constitutional which requires a part of those not now in the service to go to the aid of those who are already in it; and still more time to determine with absolute certainty that we got those who are to go in the precisely legal proportion in those who are not to go. My purpose is to be in my action just and constitutional, and yet practical, in performing the important duty with which I am charged, of maintaining the unity and the free principles of our common country."

We do not envy the feelings that will fill the breast of the descendants of Horatio Seymour when the time comes for the impartial historian of the war to record the part their ancestor took at its most vital crisis. It will be his duty—a duty inevitable and clear—to point out that, just as victory seemed assured to the National cause, the term of service of a large proportion of the Union troops expired, and there was no means of filling the depleted ranks of the army except by draft; that, in view of this emergency, a Conscription Act, framed with the utmost care, based upon the experience of foreign nations, and more tenderly careful of the interests of the widow, the orphan, and the helpless, than any other similar statute in existence, had been duly passed and made a law; that when the emergency arose for its execution, it was peacefully submitted to every where except in the city of New York, where it was resisted by men who testified their sense of civic duty and constitutional obligation by burning an orphan asylum, murdering negroes, robbing private individuals, and sacking private houses; and that, at this vital crisis, the Governor of New York addressed the miscreants who had done these deeds as his "friends," and actually advised the National Executive to defer to their views, and to suspend the execution of the law until the emergency had gone by, and the South had recovered from its losses and raised a new army to destroy the nation. We are not of those who regard Governor Seymour as a secret accomplice of the rebels. But we can not help thinking that the historian will have some difficulty in reconciling, on ordinary principles of human conduct, his letters to the President with his oft-repeated and mellifluous professions of loyalty.

It will be to him a satisfactory change to turn to the reports of our Navy Yards. No man who entertains a proper sense of pride in his country can calmly brook the idea that the great Democratic party has not still that country for so many years, had, at so fatal a moment, covered itself with infamy. And the historian will perceive with joy that no such stain has contained by the Navy. For he will find that within a month of the time when the Governor was calling the rioters his friends, and begging the President to consult with what they asked, a Democratic Recorder and a Democratic District Attorney were administering the law with inexorable severity, and securing the punishment of the ruffians who disgraced us in a most exemplary manner. Ten and fifteen years of State prison have been awarded to minor culprits; the trials have in every case been thorough, impartial, and swift; there is every reason to hope that by the time these lines are read some of the greater scoundrels—the brutal Irishmen who battered in negroes' skulls with paving-stones—may be brought up for sentence, and condemned to suffer the highest penalty known to the law.

The Recorder and District Attorney are redeeming the fair fame of the city. If they continue to do their duty—and they may feel assured that they are supported in the present course by every citizen who earns an honest living—they will command the highest station in the gift of the people of the city. Even the clients of the Archbishop are at bottom in favor of law and order, for they, too, have something to lose. In every large community scoundrels are a minority and human nature is weak. Governor Seymour has seemingly cast his lot with the former, Recorder Hoffman with the latter. The next election will tell which has made the better choice.

FINANCE.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has announced that he will continue for the present to sell six per cent. five-year bonds at par to all who apply for them. For the past four or five months the sales of these bonds have been very large, to defray the entire cost of the war; in all, about $250,000,000 have been sold—mostly through the houses of Jay, Cooke, & Co., of Philadelphia, and Fisk & Hatch, of New York.

This is, we believe, the first instance in history in which the cost of a great war has been defrayed by the voluntary contributions of the people, carried by them from day to day to the fiscal agents of Government.

Mr. Chase's administration of the finances has been successful beyond all precedent, and probably beyond his own expectations. Our national credit now stands so high that he was able, the other day, to float a new loan, made by European agents, of par for $100,000,000 of thirty-year fives. He told the applicants that he would let them have a four per cent. loan at the price, or a six per cent. five per cent. loan. This was the best he would do.

The English, who would not buy our bonds when they were at par, and exchange at 180 or 190, thus reducing the cost of the bonds in sterling to 55 or 60, are now purchasing them freely at 106, with exchange at 138 or 139. This, indeed, is a very expensive operation than their venture in Confederate scrip. That they bought at 101 or 104, and thought they were doing well; now they are trying to get rid of at 85, and find it hard work. A smart people!

MR. LAIRD.

THE papers are publishing a correspondence between somebody whose name is not given and Laird, the private ship-builder of Liverpool, from which it would appear that Laird had been requested by the Navy Department to build vessels for the United States navy.

Secretary Welles has distinctly stated that he made no such request, and authorized no one to make it to him or for the Department.

Under the circumstances we fail to see the object of publishing the correspondence. An anonymous letter can not for a moment stand against the authoritative denial of the Secretary of the Navy. And even if Laird had given his agent's name, or stated that he personally was privy to the alleged proposal, there is no reason why he should be believed. A man who will build pirate craft, in violation of the law of his own country, to prey upon the commerce of a friendly and allied nation, surely belongs to that class of persons whose evidence is inadmissible in courts of justice, except in confession of guilt for the conviction of accomplices.

THE LOUNGER.

THE LAST CRY OF CATILINE.

WHEN, before the battle of Manassas, Beauregard issued his "beauty and booty" proclamation, the derision of the country at once perceived the unmitigated Manchausen who has been ridiculous ever since. It was the cold shift of the imbecile who can not plead the ardor of Creole blood, and who, when a student at West Point, declared that he had no association with Yankees, has recently surpassed his subordinate in shameless falsehood. Davis's proclamation of the 1st August sounds like a cry wrung from a man who "rises and waits at the tips of your fingers," he cries to the men he has so long and terribly deceived; "why not stretch out your hands and help them?" But if success were so imminent could it be necessary, in such a tone of anguish, to exhort his men to grasp it? After Bull Run, Davis, by the rebel Congress, after the earlier repulses at Vicksburg and Charleston, did he summon his followers in so frantic a voice to return to their ranks and to the golden triumph that wooed their swords? Did he enjoin fasting and prayer to avert the inevitable success of which he now speaks, or did he ordain thanksgiving and joy? Does Jefferson Davis suppose that any body is so silly as to believe that if, as he says, "victory is within your reach," the men he appeals to would desert and stand sternly aloof?

But the assertion which manifest are more atrocious than the implications are encouraging. He says that our malignant rage aims at the extermination of the rebels' wives, and children; that we wish to destroy what we can not plunder; and that we propose to partition their homes among ourselves. All this is such utter rubbish that it may be at once dismissed to the category of "beauty and booty." But when Catiline Davis proceeds to say that the Government of his country debauches an inferior race, heretofore docile and contented, by promising them the indulgence of the vilest passions as the price of their treachery, he is no longer to be mistaken for a mere fool. Does he think the people of the State of New York, of the Northwest, or of New England, can be "excited to servile insurrection" by Davis?—because they are docile and contented; and if slaves can be so excited, is it possible that Davis does not see that he says they are. A servile people which by the sudden prospect of personal freedom can be roused to insurrection against the most pernicious quiet is not content but hopeless subjugation. To call that hopeful prospect of personal freedom under the malignant auspices of the rebel Government "a promise of the indulgence of the vilest passions," merely illustrates the character of the system to which it has been subjected.

It is unnecessary to follow this document into other details. It is the most piercing wail that has yet risen from the heart of the rebellion; and when he says that the absentees from the rebel army are enough to secure the victory he predicts, it is a frank confession that he regards the fire-eaters in which he finds himself. If they would not rally before the late disasters of the rebel cause, are they likely to rally when such a result might be expected in the case of a people heroically struggling against oppression. But when a band of conspirators who set out to destroy their Government because it does not oppress, but enlarges liberty under law —who aim to dishonor and ruin their native land, to pervert the course of civilization, and to prevent the increase of human happiness—find that their plots miscarry, that their hopes are defeated and disrupted, and that their crimes are likely to come soon to awful judgment, there is nothing left in the human heart except remorse and despair upon which they can rely. Behind them is desolation, and before them despair. If any man doubts it, let him read Davis's last appeal, which, with the urgent order of Lee, betrays how vast is the rebel military defection.

REBEL LOGIC.

MR. "VICE-PRESIDENT" STEPHENS has a happy gift of making himself under difficulties. He lately taken advantage of the fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, of the opening of the Mississippi, of the advance of Rosecrans, and the defeat of Lee to declare his entire confidence in the ability of "the Confederacy" to maintain its cause. With the most airy humor the "Vice-President" told of Lee that that "great captain" had beaten the enemy upon their own soil, and was now ready to meet them "on a new field." The harder we are hit, says this encouraging leader, the more we shall succeed. And according to the gay logic of the "Vice-President," when every rebel port and city is in our hands, when the rebel armies are annihilated, and the rebel Government driven into obscurity to another, the rebellion will triumph and "our independence" be finally secured.

Every man who wishes well to his country will hope that the Stephens view of the situation may prevail. The interest of permanent peace demands that the rebellion shall not abate a solitary pretense, for it is always easy to deal with gentlemen who will have the whole cake or none, and who are for the last ditch upon every opportunity. If the rebel leaders were less in earnest, if they despised their Northern tools less than they do, if they were not fanatics for slavery and enthusiasts for national degradation, there might be serious fear of political complications. The first rebel who cries "Let's surrender!" and can persuade his followers to listen, is the wisest man among them. But the chiefs are too vitally interested. Success has become a personal question with them; and even if they saw that in the exigency their best chance lay in submission and the demand of an amnesty, they know also that they must settle with their followers whom they have dragged through all the misery of the war.

Even if the original secession movement were intended as a coup d'état, as much of its leaders believed it to be, it has long ago developed into a radical revolution. The Southern politicians, who have always prided themselves upon their superior sagacity, with which also they have been fully credited at the North, began by a stupendous and fatal blunder. They counted upon the indifference or actual co-operation of the majority at the North. But they found that there was no majority at the North anywhere, for all were practically united upon the question of union. War was the necessary consequence; and the match that was intended to light a plot was found to have kindled a city.

The rebellion is now beyond the hands of what are called its leaders. Davis and his body-guard of conspirators are as sternly criticised by the rebels as the President and his advisers. And even if Davis and his friends could come to an understanding with Seymour and Vogler and Vallandigham to submit in order to save the party organization, Seymour, Vogler, and the rest would intrigue the result at which the rebellion has been aiming by forces, they could treat only for themselves. For although they seek to control their henchmen absolutely, they have now taught them how to disobey, and have put arms into their hands. So long as the rebel leaders and Democrats stand together upon Mr. Stephens's platform of "final and complete separation," we shall escape the disasters of political intrigue, which are infinitely greater than those of war, while a peace will be secured which will save years of battle and rivers of blood.

YANCEY.

WILLIAM L. YANCEY is a man who will be known in our history as one of the most virulent but not one of the most able of the traitors who have conspired for the ruin of their country. He was born in South Carolina, but lived subsequently in Alabama and Georgia before entering politics in that State. He was in Congress for several terms, and he put himself forward constantly as a leader, but he was not able to rise above the level of the typical pro-slavery politician, denouncing the "Yankees" as the source of all evils, and extolling the South" as the garden of all excellence.

Mr. Yancey himself furnished an illustration of the absurdity of his own dogmas. Every society in Alabama and elsewhere was ready to agree that it allows the most liberal discussion. In any truly free community whatever can not be debated openly to be debated, because such a community is governed by public opinion, and without discussion public opinion is unenlightened. During the last Presidential canvass Mr. Yancey made a tour of the free States for the purpose of persuading the people that the most bitter vote against the slaveholders upon pain of summary ruin. In States made prosperous and happy by a greater individual freedom than was ever known Mr. Yancey stood before the people to cajole and threaten them from the exercise of political rights. He was heard and answered, and argument stupplanted. But the fact that he was heard and was tolerated in free States while he advocated slavery, proved the inferiority of slaveholding to the labor of those States than that which Mr. Yancey advocated, and to which he was accustomed. To plead slavery in those States would have cost the orator his life.

The baseness of his position was that, as the very moment he was speaking in the free, called the interest of the Union, he was already a secret conspirator against it. Trained by slavery, political horror was familiar to him. In the autumn, two years before, written the letter in which he declared the plan by which he thought the cotton States could be precipitated into revolution."

But although the "revolution" is in its third year, Mr. Yancey had achieved no more renown in it than he did before it began. He went to Europe as an emissary to make the thing look respectable, but his political dishonesty was known there he has been ex officio, as a "Senator," one of the ringleaders of the rebellion. But his name was never heard. His influence has never appeared. Like Toombs, Wigfall, Rhett, Spratt, Keitt, and Orr, his sole distinction is that he hated his country, because his country loved liberty.

INTELLIGENT PATIENCE.

THE general feeling of final success at Charleston is a direct illustration of the progress of our education in war. When hostilities began what could not be done at once, and decisively, seemed to us unlikely to be done at all; and when the first effort failed, we were inclined to despond and to believe all efforts useless. But we have learned that war is a slow process, and General Grant has taught us that a sagacious soldier is helped by his failures. He tried Vicksburg in every way. His operations had lasted so long that the natural question was, how then can he do it? And his masterly method of success, although obvious in retrospect, did not even seemed to be possible until it was proved.

Charleston has been an equally hard nut to crack. There have been two distinct movements upon that city, one by land and one by water. Both failed; and now, combining the two forces, it is clearly with General Gilmore but a question of time. The brilliant and heroic assault of the 18th July, in which we were foiled, although desperate and sadly fatal, has been to the Commanding General and to the rest of us a lesson. But it has not in the least impaired the courage of the soldiers, nor affected public confidence in the result. The general conviction that we have learned how to make war, and mean to make it, so fully satisfies the national mind, that even a repulse so serious as that at Fort Wagner does not seriously affect the most sensitive of meters, the stock list. With Banks in Louisiana, and Grant upon the Mississippi, with Rosecrans in Tennessee, Gilmore at Charleston, and Meade in Virginia, we know that our armies are in the hands of the most competent and resolute commanders; men who have proved that they know how to fight and how to use victory; men who have shown the earnestness of their convictions as well as the fidelity of their patriotism; men who wish to conquer not only peace, but one that shall secure the national honor, and compensate America and the world for this fearful but holy war.

PEACE-MAKERS.

WHENEVER, as at this moment, the prospects of the rebellion are profoundly gloomy, we must expect that the tone of the Copperheads will be correspondingly defiant. For, discomfited within its own lines, the only hope of the conspiracy will be the progress of a serious division within ours.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the rebels at the South should be told by those at the North that Governor Seymour has been, by his sacred right and honor, that no citizen shall be "kidnapped" by "Abolition hewhers" until the constitutionality of the Conscription Act shall have been tested by the New York courts. If Mr. Horatio Seymour has made any such pledge, he has plainted himself squarely with the South Carolina nullification platform of thirty years ago—that the State authorities are competent to annul the National legislation, and that a draft upon a citizen of the United States from his allegiance. But as the United States is engaged in a formidable war to enforce that theory of State Rights, it is hardly likely to assent to it in others. If Mr. Seymour has made any such pledge, he means to try to redeem it. He is going to try to plunge the State of New York into Jefferson Davis's rebellion.

That is precisely what the rebels wish; and it is to cheer them with the hope that it is so, or that there is a large faction which wishes it were so, that the same statement is made in the Copperhead journals. Of course, the amiable papers that thus seek to begin the battle in all the towns and cities of the North do not base their lament over freely over this "wicked," "cruel," "fratricidal" war, and who assiduously proclaim their desire of "peace." By their fruits ye shall know them.

ABOUT "AN OPEN LETTER."

The Jewish Messenger of this city, "A Jew," who writes to us from Cincinnati, and "S. A. Jew," a gentleman of correspondent in Philadelphia, complain that "an open letter" in our issue for Aug. 1 is an insult to the Jewish citizens of this country.

But how can a charge against an individual and those who are like him be construed into an attack upon those who are not like him? Why should the person to whom the Lounger speaks be erected into a representative of other persons, who are neither mentioned nor implied? The fact of a different religion in the disloyal citizen to whom the letter was written, like that of his foreign birth, is mentioned to show his entire divergence from the stream of civilization in this country.

The editor of the Messenger, and "A Jew," and "S. A. Jew" are informed that the letter was not addressed to an imaginary person; that it tells the truth of the individual to whom it was written, and of "the individuals like him," which is a form of expression for the very many like him who are known to the Lounger. If they are unknown to his correspondent, and to the Messenger, that ignorance does not authorize them to charge the letter upon the Lounger as an insult to loyal citizens of the Jewish faith, who are known to the Lounger quite as well as they are to any one.

Unless, indeed, the Jewish Messenger can establish that the statements made of his own knowledge by the Lounger in "an open letter" are, as the paper says, false, "unparliamentary and shameful," and unless "A Jew" can substantiate his assumption that a letter speaking of mercenary, and selfish, and alleged citizens of the Jewish faith is an insult to all of that religion, the Lounger requires of them both a frank acknowledgment of their haste and injustice.

FROM NEW ORLEANS.

A WAG in New Orleans deals a letter to this paper: "From a friend of the one glorious American Union is fast hastening to decay; and soon will the prophetic words of Daniel Webster, of Henry Clay, of Calhoun be verified; and verify to us that the destruction of this once great Republic will be as complete as was the Destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem by Titus the Roman Emperor. Methinks I see it now, and when it shall come, woe shall befall the authors of the Destruction of the ship of state.

"Old Gube's career is coming to a close, but methinks he shall never sink the spot of domestic life. When his time comes, as it surely will come, his long fingerbread containing those patriotical brains which are unfit to drive a baker's cart, instead of piddling the helm of the nation will be deserted from his body, then there shall be real disunion. There will be a storm brewing, and woe to the forth It shall blow a mighty Hurricane. The Depths at Washington may well tremble with fear, for they shall be hurled to H—ll, where Old Nick is only fit to take charge of them."

This is the kind of "Union man" that our loyal friends, the Copperheads, wish to send representatives to Congress. And it is for his strict and faithful dealings with such men that the same authorities call General Butler "a beast."

BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

THE real sympathy of the Copperhead journals is occasionally betrayed in the most amusing and unexpected manner. When the late riots, arsons, and massacres took place in the city of New York, these papers gravely called them "movements of the people," "popular uprisings," etc., with the intention of thus making the rebels think the hope of a counter-insurrection at the North, and of sustaining the faith of foreigners that our country was ruined. But the late arrivals bring the documents of the London press upon the mobs. The London Times, the most venomous and furious of all our English enemies, speaks in the exact strain of the Copperheads. That open, notorious, and desperate foe of our Government and of free institutions uses the same terms which the more stealthy abettors of the rebellion use in New York and elsewhere, and says that "the people are expressing their dislike of the draft," etc.

The Times has learned by this time—what its allies, the Copperheads, learn by the month's growth of the murderous, incendiaries, and ruffians of the city of New York are not "the people;" while the identity of sentiment and of tactics reveals the perfect sympathy between the critics.

"OUR BLACK ARMY."

A CALM, elaborate, and careful paper upon "Our Black Army," in the Philadelphia North American, signed "Kent," is unquestionably written by Sidney George Fisher, Esq., whose work "The Trial of the Constitution" has been already discussed in these columns. The paper is the more important as coming from one who has not been known as an Abolitionist, but whose views upon the subject of race would certainly provoke the hearty disapproval of the whole body of the Democracy.

But the cause of civil liberty and order is the cause of man. Dealing, therefore, with the facts of the war, Mr. Fisher says that because the shining sophistries of those who profess to be loyal to the Government but a little more loyal to Slavery; and because conclusively that we are but a secessionized, enveloped into a war on the part of the white race for the guarantees of our society, and that we must carry the war in one hand and slavery and conciliation in the other," by the simple truth. "These words have a terrible meaning. It is war on the negroes or you will destroy slavery. What hope, then, will there be of restoring the old alliance between Blue and the Gray, between those who are storing the Union as it was?" Common sense answers, None at all.

"Kent" says truly of the slaves, "They have no hope or interest in this war that should induce them to wish success to the North, except deliverance from bondage. That, then, must be the incentive to which we appeal. Freedom must be the black soldier's bounty. Do we hope for their aid by compelling them to fight for a cause which would hopelessly enslave them forever? Do we expect men to fight valorously to bind chains upon themselves?

"We are fighting," says our author, "for an empire; they wish to fight the same battle for freedom. We are fighting for the right to rule a government worthy of the name, able to protect us in our civil and political rights; they ask to be permitted to fight in the same cause, in order that they may be regarded as men, and not as merchandise; that they may henceforth belong to themselves, and not be bred and sold and bought and sold like the beasts of the field. Is not their purpose and hope as lofty as ours? Is it not as noble on their side in this war? That is what every loyal man should tear in mind. If our Government has any right, it is in its personal and political rights. And if, for the purposes of establishing that guarantee for the many, the rights of some persons were not secured, why will not Almighty God take the side of the perpetuity of the Government is the protection of the rights of every man subject to it? The right, the conscience, and the brain of the country no longer differ upon this point."

A JEST.

THERE is something charmingly naïve in the proposition that after the battle of Yorktown General Washington ought to have called Benedict Arnold into his council and followed his advice. But we have been lately entertained with something quite as good. For now that Mr. Mississippi is rejected—that Lee is defeated—that Rosecrans is looking for Bragg—that the interior lines are cut off—that the treasury of the Confederacy is destroyed—and that the military reduction of the rebellion begins to appear—a feeler is put forth to the effect that our foreign relations are becoming critical—that the Government is about to abandon the policy and the advice under which it has been successful, and intends to ask the friends and allies of the rebellion to direct public affairs!

Papers and people who have persistently published their faith that the Administration at Washington actually print and solemnly believe this waggery. Loyal citizens who believe their Government to be both sensible and earnest smile and wait.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL BURNSIDE has ordered that no permits visit, ever shall be granted to visit the prisoners confined at Camp Morton and Camp Chase, Ohio, whether officers or privates.

The United States steam frigate Hartford, from New Orleans, with the gallant Admiral FARRAGUT in command, arrived at this port on the 19th inst.

The report of General HUMPHREY'S resignation is premature. General HALLECK declines to accept, and General HUMPHREY therefore remains in command of the Sixteenth Army Corps.

General GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN and family pass the flag Harbor (Long Island) Corrector of the 8th instant arrived in Newport, Saturday, en route for Easthampton, where the general proposes passing a few days, seeking the quietude and retirement of our island home.

Acting- Master ROBERT TAW has been detached from the receiving ship Ohio at Boston, and ordered to the command of the gun-boat Ossco, at Boston. Mr. TAW was taken prisoner on board the J. P. Smith, of Boston, in the early part of the war. After a short confinement at Richmond he was exchanged.

Herald Special Correspondence.—Lieutenant REYNOLDS selected in the Aroga on list to join the Wabash in the South Atlantic Squadron.

Captain WILLIAM L. SHUTTERWORTH, First Lieutenant GEORGE P. MORRIS, Second Lieutenant EDWARD C. SALTZBURN, and Second Lieutenant KINGMAN FLINT sailed on the 13th inst. in the steamer Ericsson to relieve the officers of the Pensacola Navy-yard.

The steamer Ericsson is ordered to command the guard of the United States ship Vermont at Fort Royal. He sailed in the steamer.

Captain P. R. FRADDAD has been ordered to the Portsmouth Navy-yard.

First Lieutenant WILLIAM H. CARTER has been ordered to report for duty at the Portsmouth Navy-yard.

First Lieutenant FRANK MUNROE has been ordered to join the Keystone.

First Lieutenant RICHARD S. COOLIDGE has been ordered to the navy-yard, Portsmouth.

Commander WOODSWORTH has been ordered to the command of the Narragansett.

Brigadier-General WM. SCOTT ORME, of General HEINTZELMAN'S command, had arrived in Boston.

It will interest the loyal to learn that Brigadier-General GEORGE C. STRONG to know that President LINCOLN has forwarded to the Senate the nominal officer of a Major-General's commission, bearing the date of the battle on Morris Island in which he received his mortal wound.

General BLAIR left St. Louis for Washington on 6th. General TRAVER with his Staff reached St. Louis on 7th. General SHERMAN left St. Louis on the 8th for Memphis. On 3d, General A. P. HOVEY was in Cleveland, Ohio, on 3d.

General BANKS has ordered to be tried by a military general court-martial for an offence specified in an order of the General-in-Chief, General HALLECK has detailed officers to constitute the court.

Major-General JOHN M. SCHOFIELD, of General HEINTZELMAN'S Staff, has been appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the Thirty-third New Jersey regiment, now being organized.

The rumor of the appointment of General MEADE has been the subject of much comment at Washington, and speculation is rife as to who will be his successor. It is said that the general choice of all officers is General GOVERNOR K. WARREN, of Pennsylvania, recommended by General MCCLELLAN can not be reinstated to the position. It is to General WARREN and General WILLIAM F. SMITH the choice of the army would be General N. P. BANKS.

Jeff Davis has issued a proclamation, dated Wilson, of Rosecrans's army, has been twenty-eight times through the rebel lines, captured, escaped, recaptured, undergone fevers, and a small army of slaves. In the last expedition he had with him 1,000 horses, 600 horses, and 400 mules, two gunboats, two guerillas, and mortally wounded Colonel STREIGHT, of the Seventy-first Indiana, and Major TAYLOR, of the Indiana. He has hung five and shot fifteen rebels, including a second lieutenant, with his own authority, as he says, in accordance with the orders of General ROSECRANS. WILSON is chief of the famous mounted scouts.

Major-General HOOKER and Staff arrived at Saratoga on 17th.

A Cincinnati dispatch announces that General BURNSIDE arrived in Lexington, Kentucky, on 16th, and that he surveyed the field of military direction in very active.

Lieutenant Commander CILLEY has been ordered to the command of the Unadilla.

Admiral FARRAGUT PORTER has been granted a two months' leave of absence, after his protracted labors, and will visit the North. He has been one of the most efficient co-operants for the management of the Mississippi fleet with General GRANT.

The appointment of Colonel LEE, of the Twenty-seventh Massachusetts regiment, to be Provost Marshal of the Department of North Carolina, and of Captain CHAS. D. SANborn, of the same regiment, to be Provost Marshal of Beaufort, gives universal satisfaction, and secures justice and tranquillity to all.

Colonel BIDDLE, the chief Quarter-master of North Carolina, leaves in a day or two for Fortress Monroe, where he will join the Virginia Department.

Vincent MICHALOWSKI, formerly of Battery K, First Regiment United States Artillery, has been placed in command of Battery F of the same regiment. The Vincent has distinguished himself on several occasions by his gallantry, and will doubtless raise for his new command the standard of the Regular Service.

General BUFORD, the popular cavalry commander, left Washington for Kentucky on 13th on a short furlough, after which he has been ordered to report. A portion of his staff have also been granted a furlough.

Captain JOSEPH SMITH, U.S.A., died in Providence, Rhode Island, on the 27th ult. He entered the navy in 1813 as a midshipman. He first 54 years of his service life he was 14 years at sea. When the law of 1855 established the present list Commander SMITH was one of the officers of high merit, was placed upon it, on the ground, apparently, of his having temporarily inquired, but he was subsequently promoted to Captaincy, and at the commencement of the present rebellion died on duty ashore.

Surgeon J. L. TYLER is ordered to report to General ROSECRANS.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THE advices from the Army of the Potomac army do not indicate any operations at present. Our line extend at one or two Stafford Court House to Warrenton. The enemy's pickets still extend along the south side of the Rappahannock. A portion of General Longstreet's army is undoubtedly in Fredericksburg. The railroad between that point and Richmond has been torn up in a considerable extent, and the whole country between the Rappahannock and the Rapidan has been desolated. Droves from the rebel army are coming into our lines in large numbers, and it is said that the mountains are filled with men in open rebellion against the conscription of Jeff Davis.

RECONNOISSANCE ON THE JAMES RIVER.

Correspondents with the James River fleet report an important reconnoissance by General FOSTER on the 6th inst. up the James River, for the purpose of ascertaining the position of the enemy's batteries. The fleet went within six miles of Fort Darling. The boats were fired upon from the high and commanding points where the enemy had batteries planted. The Commodore Barney came into collision with a torpedo, which lifted her out of the water and started her guards ten inches, but did little permanent damage.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

According to the St. Louis Union, the position of the Army of the Cumberland is at PUCKER, at Tullahoma and Winchester—places about seventeen miles apart. Tullahoma is held by General THOMAS'S division; General ROSECRANS'S head-quarters are in Mary Sharp College, at Winchester; General WILCOX'S corps is at the front; General Jeff C. DAVIS is in command of the post. General Thomas's corps is at Decherd, four miles from Winchester. General Critchendon's occupies Manchester, Hillsboro, M'Minnville, and Stephenson. The position of Bragg's army is not, and can not be given. The larger part is probably at Chattanooga, fortifying that place, with the design of holding that position until he is driven out. Bragg's is, perhaps, the worst scattered and demoralized army in the field. Desertions, discuss, retreats, and hardships have made it but the wreck of its former self, and there is little probability of its offering any considerable resistance to Rosecrans, if he were to attempt to march through Georgia to Savannah.

AFFAIRS AT CHARLESTON.

The latest news from Charleston is to the 15th inst. Every thing goes on heavily. The position of General Gilmore on Morris Island is stronger and safer every day. The mortar and confidence of the troops are unexampled. Although the rebel batteries on James Island, Fort Sumter, Sumter, and other fortifications, the protection to our troops is so complete that our casualties every day's gun are hardly worth noticing. On the night of the 8th Captain L. R. Pulsifer, of the Gun Brooklyn, of the New York Volunteers, with a detachment of his men, while on a boat near Light-House Creek, was engaged by the rebels, with all his men. The new Ironsides participated with Admiral DU PONT in the manœuvre on Fort Wagner on Sunday week, and finally silenced the rebel guns. The firing was terrific during the engagement. The day before, a Monitor, the Ironsides, our works on Morris Island, and the rebel forts Wagner, Johnson, Sumter, and Moultrie.

OUR ARMY IN ARKANSAS.

Advices from the Mississippi Valley, by the way of Cairo, inform us that measures are on foot to clear the entire territory west of the river of rebels. Gen. Davidson is said to be moving down the centre of Arkansas, having been entirely successful in several encounters with the enemy. The people of Jacksonport are also alarmed at his appearance, and flying before him. Another expedition is also hinted at, the results of which must be of much importance.

WHEREABOUTS OF JOE JOHNSTON.

General Joe Johnston's army is at Dalton and Resaca, under the direct command of General Hardee. Most of Bragg's army is at Chattanooga, and will be ready to move at a moment's notice. General Johnston himself is said to be at Rome on the 17th, and is reported to have turned to Mississippi again, after a thorough examination of the defences and resources of Middle.

STARVATION IN TENNESSEE.

Parties from Middle Tennessee represent the condition of the people as horrible. There is a state of absolute starvation.

RETALIATION.

The President is determined to carry into force his recent order relative to the retaliation upon prisoners of war. He has ordered that three prisoners from South Carolina shall be held in close confinement as hostages for those negroes enslaved by the rebels who may be sold, tried, and who are now in prison at Charleston. All other prisoners, whether white or black, belonging to the enemy in a manner not applicable to prisoners of war, will be equally represented hereafter. Such is the order that has been transferred to. Mr. Lincoln is determined that negroes in the military and naval service shall be regarded on the same terms as white men.

AN APPEAL FROM JEFF DAVIS.

Jeff Davis has issued an urgent appeal to Confederate officers and soldiers to return immediately to their various camps and colors. He declares that the very existence on the part of all Gasses in coming forward in this most dismal hour of the South.

SECESSIANT REBELS.

The Mobile News complains dismally of the want of patriotism in the citizens of Alabama generally. It calls them bastard Southerners and recreant Confederates; says that they have no stock and, and that the very prospect of their conduct are too terrible to be published.

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY.

Thomas E. Bramlette has been elected over the executive chair of Kentucky probably by twenty-five thousand majority.

He will take the seat to which Berah Magoffin was elected four years ago, by the following vote:

Berah Magoffin, democrat	64,137
Joshua F. Bell, Unionist opposition	39,167
Democratic majority	8,916

—And it is confidently expected that he will fill the place with more honor to the State and to himself than did his elected predecessor.

A DRAFT TO ENFORCE FOR KENTUCKY.

General Rosecrans is at Washington by authority of General Rosecrans, renewing his suggestion, made last fall, to raise a mounted force in Kentucky to operate against the guerrillas in Kentucky and Tennessee. It is proposed to raise the force by draft. Ordinarily, which force he thinks will be sufficient to rid those States of armed bands, is from 5,000 to 10,000 men.

A STATE ELECTION IN TENNESSEE.

The Nashville Union is officially authorized to state that Governor Johnson proposes having a vote of election for a Legislature at the very earliest practicable day; that is, when the military circumstances in such that loyal citizens can go to the polls in safety, and when sympathizers with the rebellion will no longer dare, backed by the presence of Confederate troops, and by guerrilla terrorism, to obstruct the policy of the State.

MORE VESSELS BURNED BY THE "ALABAMA."

The ships Patterson, from New York, bound for Shanghai, and the Nightingale, from Manilla to New York, were both destroyed by the pirate Alabama.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE following are the extracts which refer to our war: "The civil war between the Northern and Southern States of the American Union still unfortunately continued, and the contending parties, but also to nations which have taken no part in the struggle. Her Majesty, however, has seen no reason to depart from the strict neutrality which her Majesty has observed from the beginning of the contest.

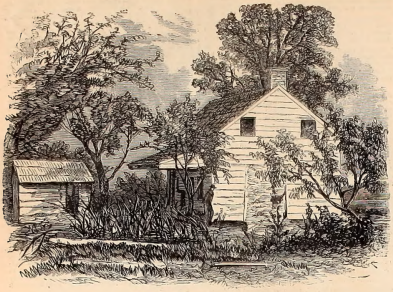
* * *

"LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,—The distress which the civil war in America has inflicted on a portion of Her Majesty's subjects in the manufacturing districts has called for the relief of Her Majesty's generous and munificent contributions have been made, but in some degree diminished. Her Majesty trusts that the measures adopted to measures calculated to have a beneficial influence upon that unfortunate country.

* * *

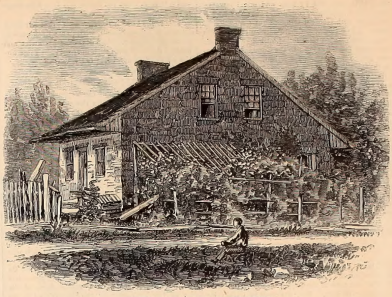
POLAND

THE REBELLION.



In a late encounter with the Russian troops the Poles were successful. The preliminaries for the Polish Conference at Copenhagen have been arranged. The Russian Government rejects all compromise as to the kingdom. Prince Gortschakoff, in replying to the note of Austria, expresses surprise, and points out the position assumed by that Government, and thinks that Russia, Austria, and Prussia should act in accord.

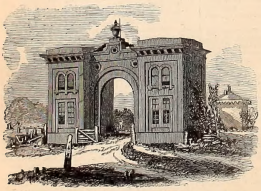
MEXICO.



GENERAL FOREY'S PLANS.

Marshal Forey, in an official report, says that he is occupied in forming a Mexican army, and that the Mexican troops of moderate views belonging to all parties.

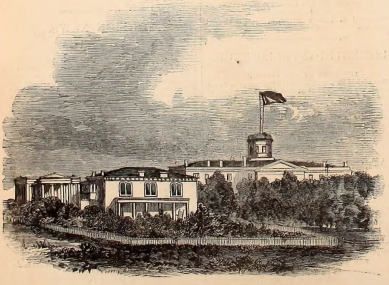
VIEWS OF THE GETTYSBURG BATTLE-FIELD.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 534.]



GENERAL MEADE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

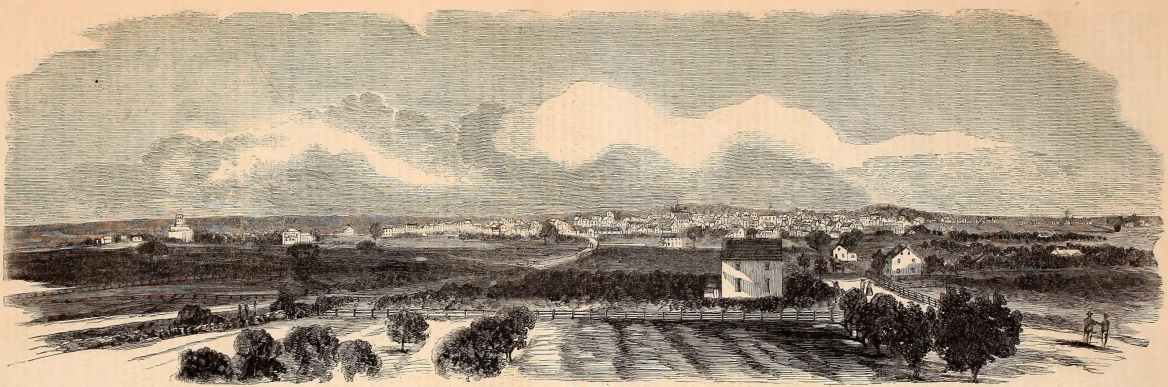
GENERAL LEE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

WHEAT-FIELD IN WHICH GENERAL REYNOLDS WAS SHOT.



ENTRANCE TO THE CEMETERY.

BARN IN WHICH REYNOLDS DIED.



WOODS ON THE RIGHT OF THE BATTLE-FIELD.

COLLEGE, USED AS A HOSPITAL FOR REBEL PRISONERS.

BREAST-WORKS IN THE WOODS.

GENERAL VIEW OF GETTYSBURG, FROM THE WEST.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 534.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE ADVANCE OF THE TWELFTH CORPS CROSSING THE APPAHANNOCK.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER.—[SEE PAGE 534.]

REMINISCENCES OF GETTYSBURG.

MR. BRADY, the photographer, to whose industry and energy we are indebted for many of the most reliable pictures of the war, has been to the Gettysburg battle-field, and executed a number of photographs of what he saw there. We reproduce some of these pictures on pages 529, 532, and 533.

One of them shows us the old man JOHN BURNS, the only citizen of Gettysburg who shouldered his rifle and went out to do battle in the Union ranks against the enemies of his country. The old man made his appearance in a uniform which he had worn in the last war, but he fought as stoutly as any young man in the army. Honor to his name! Old BURNS's house is there too, a memorial in its way of the fight: in its condition it looks as though it would not be very likely to remain many years as an object of curiosity.

Other pictures are the HEAD-QUARTERS of General LEE and General MEADE near the battle-field; modest, unpretending farm-houses in themselves, but destined hereafter to be as famous and as great an object of curiosity to travelers as the barn and mill at Waterloo. Elsewhere we see the open breast-works thrown up in the woods behind which the troops crouched to repel the enemy's charges, with the trees above and around them scarred and furrowed every where by round shot, shell, and rifle-ball.

The HIGH VIEW OF GETTYSBURG FROM THE WEST will give the beholder a general idea of the field of battle—a great valley well adapted for the movements of infantry and artillery. Mountains in the back-ground explain why the cavalry could not pursue very far. We have details as well. There is the CAVE OF THE CEMETERY, which was the scene of more than one fierce conflict, and where hundreds of Union men and rebels fell side by side; THE CEMETERY, which our troops used as a hospital after the battle; THE WHEAT-FIELD IN WHICH GENERAL REYNOLDS WAS SHOT, and THE BARN to which he was carried, and where he breathed his last moments, etc.

Coupled with these interesting pictures we give, on page 533, an illustration of THE CROSSING OF THE RAPPAHANNOCK BY THE ADVANCE OF THE TWELFTH ARMY CORPS IN PURSUIT OF LEE. The intelligence of this movement is contraband, and the author of our sketch warns us to be careful to disclose no facts which may be useful to the enemy. We therefore let the picture speak for itself.

VERY HARD CASH

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

LONG before this open rupture Jane Hardie had asked her father, sorrowfully, whether she was to discontinue her intimacy with the Dodds. She thought of course he would say "Yes," and it cost her a hard struggle between inclination and filial duty to raise the question. But Mr. Hardie was anxious her friendship with that family should continue; it furnished a channel of news, and in case of detection might be useful to avert or soften hostilities; so he answered rather sharply, "On no account: the Dodds are an estimable family: pray be as friendly with them as ever you can." Jane colored with pleasure at this most unexpected reply: but her wakeful conscience reminded her that she must was given in ignorance of her attachment to Edward Dodd; and urged her to confession. But at that Nature receded: Edward had been openly declared his love to her; so modest pride, as well as modest shame, combined with female cowardice to hold back the avowal.

So then Miss Tender Conscience tormented herself; and recorded the struggle in her diary; but briefly, as the terms vague and typical: for a word about "a young man"—or "crossed in love"—but one obscure and hasty slop at the carnal strife, and a good deal about "the holy saints in prison," and "the battle of Armageddon."

Yet, to do her justice, laxity of expression did not act upon her conduct and warp that, as it does most myself speakers.

To obey her father to the letter, she maintained a friendly correspondence with Julia Dodd, exchanging letters daily: but, not to deceive him in the spirit, she ceased to visit Albion Villa. Thus she avoided Edward, and extracted from the situation the utmost self-denial, and the least possible amount of "carnal pleasure," as she naively denominated an interchange of worldly affection, however distant and respectful.

One day she happened to mention her diary, and say it was the present confidant to her, and instructive to review. Julia, catching at every straw of consolation, said she would keep one too, and asked a sight of Jane's for a model. "No, dear friend," said Jane: "a diary should be one's self on paper."

This was fortunate: it precluded that servile imitation, in which her sex excels even mine; and consequently the two records reflect in two good girls, instead of one in two skins; and may be trusted to conduct this narrative forward, and relieve the author a little: only of course the reader must not expect to see the plot of a story carried minutely out, in two crude compositions written with an object so distinct: he must watch for glimpses and make the most of indications. Nor is this an excessive demand upon his intelligence; for, if he can not do this with a book, how will he do it in real life, where male and female characters reveal their true selves by glimpses only, and the gravest and most dramatic events give the diviner so few and faint signs of their coming?

Extracts from Julia Dodd's Diary:

"Dec. 5th. I am all over: they have taken papa away to an asylum: and the house is like a grave, but for our sufferers in the south. Just before he went away the medical came—oh no, I can not. Poor, poor mamma!

8 P.M. In the midst of our affliction Heaven sent us a ray of comfort. The kindest letter from a lady, a perfect stranger. It came yesterday: but now I have got it to copy: oh, bless it; and be good, kind ladies.

DEAR MADAM,—I scarcely know whether to hope or to fear that your good husband may have mentioned my name to you. However, he is just the man to pass over both my misbehavior and his own gallantry; so I beg permission to introduce myself. I am one of the fifty-two passengers by the Agra; I was spoiled by a long residence in India, and gave your husband sore trouble by resisting discipline, refusing to rise out my light at nine o'clock, and in short by being an unreasonable woman, or rather a spoiled child. Well, all my little attempts at a feud failed; Captain Dodd did his duty, and kept his temper provokingly. The only revenge he took was a noble one; he jumped into the sea after my darling Freddy, and saved him from a watery grave, and his mother from madness or death; and he was himself hardly recovered from a wound he had received in defending us all against pirates. Need I say more to one who is herself a mother? You will know how our little misunderstanding ended after that. As soon as we were friends, I took him into my confidence myself, Edward, Julia, I seem to know you all.

When the ruffian, who succeeded our good captain, had wrecked poor us, and then deserted us, your husband resumed the command, and saved Freddy and me a second time by his courage, his wonderful coolness, and his skill. Since then the mouse has been at work for the lion: I despair of ever repaying him; but try it to a character so elevated as Captain Dodd; his reward must be his own conscience; but we poor little women have a right to feel and say it, and so I thought a medal of the Humane Society might give some pleasure to you and Miss Dodd. Never did medal more thoroughly earn its ornament. The case was so strong, and so well supported, that the society did not hesitate: and you will receive it in a week or two from now.

You will be surprised, dear Madam, at all this from a stranger to yourself, and will perhaps set it down to a wish to intrude upon acquaintance. Well then, dear Madam, you will not be far wrong. I should like much to know you, whose character I already own acquainted with; and to convey personally my gratitude and admiration of your husband. I could pour it out more freely to you, you know, than to him.

I am,

Dear Madam,

Yours very faithfully,

LOUISA BERESFORD.

And the medal came about an hour before the fly to take him away. His dear name was on it, and his brave courageous face.

Oh, shall I ever be old enough and hard enough to speak of this without stopping to cry?

We fastened it round his dear neck with a ribbon. Mamma would put it inside his clothes for fear the silver should tempt some one: as if I should never have thought of that: is there a creature so base? And we told the men how he was pained (they were very kind to papa), and we showed them how brave and good he was, and would be again if they would be kind to him and cure him. Mamma pressed them with money to use him kindly: I thought they would be offended and refuse it: but they took it and their faces altered, and we saw that I am. He keeps away from us too. It is nearly a fortnight now.

"Dec. 7th. Aunt Eve left to-day. Mamma kept her room and could not speak to her: can not forgive her interfering between papa and her. She has been strong in her way, and mamma should be able to send papa out of the house, but in such a place! it is the law: and Dodd says, what is all good sense, says it was necessary; he says mamma is unjust: grief makes her unreasonable. Well, I dare say he is in the right: and I don't much care: but I know I am sorry for Aunt Eve, and very, very sorry for mamma."

"Dec. 8th. I am an egotist: found myself out this morning; and it is a good thing to keep a diary. We are unreasonable and hard to excuse for mamma: but now the house is sad and quiet I am always thinking of him; and that is egotism.

Why does he stay away so? I almost wish I could think it was coldness or diminished affection; for I fear sometimes to come to myself, and make him wretched. Those dreadful words papa spoke before he was afflicted! words I will never call on paper: but they are graven in my heart as they appall me; and then found at their very door! Ah, and I knew I should find him near that house. And now he keeps away."

Dec. 9th. All day trying to comfort mamma. She made a great effort and wrote to Mrs. Beresford."

POOR MAMMA'S LETTER.

"DEAR MADAM,—Your kind and valued letter reached us in deep affliction: and I am little able to reply to you as you deserve. My poor husband is very ill; so ill that he no longer remembers the past, neither the brave acts that have won him your esteem, nor even the face of his loving and unhappy wife, who now thanks you with many tears for your sweet letter. Heart-broken as my children and I are, we yet derive some consolation from it. We have tied the medal round his neck, Madam, and thank you far more than we can find words to express.

"In conclusion, I pray Heaven that, in your bitterest hour, you may find the consolation you have administered to us: no, no, I pray you may never, never stand in such need of comfort.

I am,

Dear Madam,

Yours gratefully and sincerely,

LUCY DODD."

"Dec. 10th, Sunday. At St. Anne's in the morning. Tried hard to apply the sermon. He spoke of griefs, but so coldly; surely he never felt one: he and I are as Martha and Mary pray against wandering thoughts on entering church."

"Dec. 11th. A diary is a dreadful thing. Every thing must go down now, and, among the rest, that the poor are selfish. I could not interest one of mine in mamma's sorrows; no, they must run back to their own little sordid troubles, about money and things. I was so provoked with Mrs. Jackson (she owes mamma so much) that I left her hastily: and that was Impatience. I had a mind to go back to her; but would not; and that was Pride. Where is my Christianity?

A kind letter from Jane Hardie. But no word of him."

"Dec. 12th. To-day Edward told me plump I must not go on taking things out of the house for the poor: mamma knows the reason. 'We are poor ourselves, thanks to——' And then she stopped. Does she suspect? How can she? She did not know of those dreadful words of papa's? They are like two arrows in my heart. And so we are poor: she says we have scarcely any thing to live upon after paying the two hundred and fifty pounds a year for papa."

"Dec. 13th. A comforting letter from Jane. She sends me WILLIAM'S LAY, and says, 'Let us take a part of the Bible, and read two chapters prayerfully, at the same hour of the day: will you o'clock to-night? I will say it, and, if so, will you choose where to begin?' I will, sweet friend, I will: and then, though some cruel mystery keep us apart, our souls will be together over the sacred page, as I hope they will one day be together in heaven: yours will always rate. Jane, you are a thousand thanks, and should like to begin with the Psalms: they are sorrowful, and so are we. And I must not say not to think too much of him.

If every thing is to be put down one does, I should long and bitterly to find I had written that I must pray to God against him."

"Dec. 14th. It is plain he never means to come again. I am ashamed: I am sick that it is out of pity for me; I have not read her dear face all these years for nothing. She is beginning to think him unkind, and that is something in all. There is a mystery; a dreadful mystery: may he not be as mystified too, and perhaps tortured like me by doubts and suspicions? they say he is pale and dejected. Poor thing! But then oh why not come to me and say so? Shall I write to him? No, I will cut my hand off sooner."

"Dec. 16th. A blessed letter from Jane. She says 'Lecture upon any subjects is a sad waste of time and very unpardonable among His people.' And so it is; and my weak hope, daily disappointed, that there was something in her letter, only shows how inferior I am to my beloved friend. She says 'I should like to fix another hour (to read) to meet at the Throne together: will five o'clock suit you? we dine at six: but I can never more than half an hour in the evening.'

The friendship of this saint, and her bright example, is what Heaven sends me in infinite mercy and goodness, to keep my aching heart a little: for him I shall never see again.

I have seen him this very evening.

It was a beautiful day. I went to look at —the world to come I call it—for I believe the redeemed are to inhabit those very stars which look such a strong link between this world I now find is a world of sorrow and disappointment—. I went on the balcony to look at a better one: and oh it seemed so holy, so calm, so pure, that heavenly world: I gazed and stretched my hands toward it. Jane over so little of its holiness and purity; and, that moment, I heard a sigh. I looked, and there stood a gentleman just outside our gate, and looking at me. I nearly screamed, and my heart beat so. He did not see me: for I had come out softly, and his poor head was down, down, down in misery; and he used to carry it so high, a little, little while ago; too high some said; but not I. I looked, and my imagination got busy: it flashed on me as if one of those stars had written it with its own light in my heart—'There stands Grief; not Guilt.' And then I knew what it was about: I had whispered 'Alfred!' The poor boy started, and ran toward me: but stopped short and looked queer, as if he was scared: but it was not for me to make advances to him, after his unkindness: so I spoke to him as coldly as ever I could, and I said 'You are unhappy.'

He looked up to me, and then I saw even by that light that he is enduring a bitter, bitter struggle: as pale, as worn, so dragged! Now how many times have I cried, this last month? more than in all the rest of my life a great deal. 'I unhappy?' he said; 'I must be a contemptible thing if I was not unhappy.' And then he asked me should not I despise him if he was happy. I did not answer that: but I asked him why he was unhappy. And when I had, I was half frightened: for he never evades a question the least bit.

He held his head higher still, and said, 'I am unhappy because I can not see the path of honor!'

Then I babbled something, I forget what: then he went on like this—ah, I never forget what he says—he said Cicero says Æquitas ipsa hæret per se: something significat' something else: and he repeated it slowly for me, he knows I know a little Latin; and told me that was as much as to say 'Justice is so clear a thing, that whoever hesitates must be on the road of wrong. And yet,' he said, bitterly, 'I hesitate and doubt, in a matter of right and wrong, like an Academic philosopher weighing and balancing mere speculative terms.' Those were his very words. 'And so,' said he, 'I am miserable; deserving to be miserable.'

Then I ventured to remind him that he, and I, and all Christian souls, had a resource not known to heathen philosophers, however able. And I said, 'Dear Alfred, when I am in doubt and difficulty, I go and pray to Him to guide me aright: have you done so?' No, that had never occurred to him; but he would, if I made a point of it; and at any rate he could not go on in this way; I should soon see him again, and, once his mind was made up, he should bear little sordid troubles, about money and things. I was so provoked with Mrs. Jackson (she owes mamma so much) that I left her hastily: and that was Impatience. I had a mind to go back to her; but would not; and that was Pride. Where is my Christianity?

A kind letter from Jane Hardie. But no word of him."

"Dec. 12th. To-day Edward told me plump I must not go on taking things out of the house for the poor: mamma knows the reason. 'We are poor ourselves, thanks to——' And then she stopped. Does she suspect? How can she? She did not know of those dreadful words of papa's? They are like two arrows in my heart. And so we are poor: she says we have scarcely any thing to live upon after paying the two hundred and fifty pounds a year for papa."

"Dec. 13th. A comforting letter from Jane. She sends me WILLIAM'S LAY, and says, 'Let us take a part of the Bible, and read two chapters prayerfully, at the same hour of the day: will you o'clock to-night? I will say it, and, if so, will you choose where to begin?' I will, sweet friend, I will: and then, though some cruel mystery keep us apart, our souls will be together over the sacred page, as I hope they will one day be together in heaven: yours will always rate. Jane, you are a thousand thanks, and should like to begin with the Psalms: they are sorrowful, and so are we. And I must not say not to think too much of him.

If every thing is to be put down one does, I should long and bitterly to find I had written that I must pray to God against him."

"Dec. 14th. It is plain he never means to come again. I am ashamed: I am sick that it is out of pity for me; I have not read her dear face all these years for nothing. She is beginning to think him unkind, and that is something in all. There is a mystery; a dreadful mystery: may he not be as mystified too, and perhaps tortured like me by doubts and suspicions? they say he is pale and dejected. Poor thing! But then oh why not come to me and say so? Shall I write to him? No, I will cut my hand off sooner."

"Dec. 16th. A blessed letter from Jane. She says 'Lecture upon any subjects is a sad waste of time and very unpardonable among His people.' And so it is; and my weak hope, daily disappointed, that there was something in her letter, only shows how inferior I am to my beloved friend. She says 'I should like to fix another hour (to read) to meet at the Throne together: will five o'clock suit you? we dine at six: but I can never more than half an hour in the evening.'

The friendship of this saint, and her bright example, is what Heaven sends me in infinite mercy and goodness, to keep my aching heart a little: for him I shall never see again.

I have seen him this very evening.

It was a beautiful day. I went to look at —the world to come I call it—for I believe the redeemed are to inhabit those very stars which look such a strong link between this world I now find is a world of sorrow and disappointment—. I went on the balcony to look at a better one: and oh it seemed so holy, so calm, so pure, that heavenly world: I gazed and stretched my hands toward it. Jane over so little of its holiness and purity; and, that moment, I heard a sigh. I looked, and there stood a gentleman just outside our gate, and looking at me. I nearly screamed, and my heart beat so. He did not see me: for I had come out softly, and his poor head was down, down, down in misery; and he used to carry it so high, a little, little while ago; too high some said; but not I. I looked, and my imagination got busy: it flashed on me as if one of those stars had written it with its own light in my heart—'There stands Grief; not Guilt.' And then I knew what it was about: I had whispered 'Alfred!' The poor boy started, and ran toward me: but stopped short and looked queer, as if he was scared: but it was not for me to make advances to him, after his unkindness: so I spoke to him as coldly as ever I could, and I said 'You are unhappy.'

He looked up to me, and then I saw even by that light that he is enduring a bitter, bitter struggle: as pale, as worn, so dragged! Now how many times have I cried, this last month? more than in all the rest of my life a great deal. 'I unhappy?' he said; 'I must be a contemptible thing if I was not unhappy.' And then he asked me should not I despise him if he was happy. I did not answer that: but I asked him why he was unhappy. And when I had, I was half frightened: for he never evades a question the least bit.

He held his head higher still, and said, 'I am unhappy because I can not see the path of honor!'

Then I babbled something, I forget what:

---

[1] Agrippa. The abstract quality evolved from the concrete term applied by feminine art, without the aid from grammar.

---

* Dubitatio cogitationem significat injuriæ.

to-day, 'We are both tasting the same flesh-crucifying but soul-profiting experience.' Her every word is a rebuke to me: torn at this solemn season of the year with earthly passions. Went down after reading her letter and played and sang the Gloria in excelsis, of Pergolesi, with all my soul. And, on repeating it, burst out crying in the middle. Oh, shame! shame!"

"Dec. 24th. Edward started for London at five in the morning to take a place for us. The servants were next told, and received warning; the one we had the poorest opinion of, she is such a flirt, cried, and begged mamma to let her share our fallen fortunes, and said she could cook a little and would do her best. I kissed her violently, and quite forgot I was a young lady till she herself reminded me; and she looked frightened at mamma. But mamma only smiled through her tears, and said, 'Think of it quietly, Sarah, before you commit yourself.'"

I am now sitting in my own room, cold as a stone: for I have packed up some things: so the first step is actually taken. Oh if I but knew that he was happy! Then I could endure any thing. But how can I think so? Well, I will go, and never tell a soul what I suspect. And he can not tell, even if he knows: for it is his father. Jane, too, avoids all mention of her own father and brother more than is natural. Oh, if I could only be a child again!

Regrets are vain; I will cease even to record them; these diaries feed one's selfishness, and the unfortunate passion, that will make me a bad daughter and an ungrateful soldier of Him who was born as to-morrow: to your knees, false Christian! to your knees!

I am calmer now; and feel resigned to the will of Heaven; or benumbed; or something. I will pack this box and then go down and comfort my mother; and visit my poor people, perhaps for the last time: ah me!

A knock at the street door! His knock! I know every echo of his hand, and his foot. Where is my composure now? I flutter like a bird. I will not go down. He will think I love him so.

At least I will wait till he has nearly gone.

Elizabeth has come to say I am wanted in the drawing-room.

So I must go down whether I like or no.

Bedtime. Oh, that I had the pen of a writer to record the scene I have witnessed, worthily. When I came in, I found mamma and him both seated in dead silence. He rose and looked at me and I at him: and years seemed to have rolled over his face since last I saw it; I was obliged to turn my head away; I courtesied to him distantly, and may Heaven forgive me for that: and we sat down, and presently turned round and all looked at one another like the ghosts of the happy creatures we once were all together.

Then Alfred began, not in his old imperative voice, but scarce above a whisper; and oh the words such as none but himself in the wide world would have spoken—I love him better than ever; I pity him; I adore him; he is a scholar; he is a chevalier; he is the soul of honor; he is the most unfortunate and proudest gentleman beneath the sun; oh, my darling! my darling!!

He said: 'Mrs. Dodd, and you, Miss Dodd, whom I loved before I lost the right to ask you to be mine, and whom I shall love to the last hour of my miserable existence, I am come to explain my own conduct to you, and to do you an act of simple justice, too long delayed. To begin with myself, you must know that my understanding is of the Academic School; I incline to weigh proofs before I make up my mind. But then I differ from that school in this, that I can not think myself to an eternal stand-still (such an expression! but what does that matter, it was his); I am a man of action: in Hamlet's place I should have either turned my ghost into ridicule, or my uncle into a ghost; so I kept away from you while in doubt: but, now I doubt no longer, I take my line; ladies, you have been swindled out of a large sum of money.'

My blood ran cold at these words. Surely nothing on earth but a man could say this right out like that.

Mamma and I looked at one another; and what did I see in her face, for the first time? Why that she had her suspicions too, and had been keeping them from me. Pitying angel!

He went on: 'Captain Dodd brought home several thousand pounds?'

Mamma said 'Yes.' And I think she was going to say how much, but he stopped her and made her write the amount in an envelope, while he took another and wrote in it with his pencil; he took both envelopes to me, and asked me to read them out in turn: I did; and mamma's said fourteen thousand pounds: and his said fourteen thousand pounds. Mamma looked such a look at me.

Then he turned to me: 'Miss Dodd, do you remember that night you and I met at Richard Hardie's door? Well, scarce five minutes before that, your father was standing on our lawn and called to the man, who was my father, in a loud voice—it rings in my ears now—'Hardie! Villain! give me back my money, my fourteen thousand pounds! give me my children's money, or may your children die before your eyes.' Ah, you wince to hear me whisper these dreadful words: what, if you had been where I was, and heard them spoken, and in a terrible voice; the voice of Despair: the voice of Truth! Soon a window opened cautiously, and a voice whispered, 'Hush! I'll bring it you down.' And this voice was the voice of fear, of dishonesty, and of Richard Hardie.'

He turned deadly white when he said this, and I cried to mamma, 'Oh, stop him! stop him!' And she said, 'Alfred, think what you are saying. Why do you tell us what we had better never know?' He answered directly,

'Because it is the truth: and because I loathe injustice. Some time afterward I taxed Mr. Richard Hardie with this fourteen thousand pounds: and his face betrayed him. I taxed his clerk, Skinner: and Skinner's face betrayed him: and he fled the town that very night.'

My mother looked much distressed and said, 'To what end do you raise this pitiable subject? Your father is a bankrupt, and we but suffer with the rest.'

'No, no,' said he, 'I have looked through the bankrupt's books, and there is no mention of the sum. And then who brought Captain Dodd here? Skinner: and Skinner is his detected confederate. It is clear to me poor Captain Dodd trusted that sum to us, before he had the fit: beyond this all is conjecture.'

Mamma looked at me again and said, 'What am I to do; or say?'

I screamed, 'Do nothing, say nothing: oh pray, pray make him hold his tongue, and let the vile money go. It is not his fault.'

'Do?' said the obstinate creature: 'why, tell Edward, and let him employ a sharp attorney: you have a supple antagonist, and a daring one. Need I say I have tried persuasion, and even bribes: but he defies me. Set an attorney on him; or the police. Fiat Justitia, ruat cœlum.' I put both hands out to him and burst out, 'Oh, Alfred, why did you tell? A son expose his own father? For shame! for shame! I have suspected it all long ago: but I would never have told.'

He started a little; but said, 'Miss Dodd, you were very generous to me; but that is not exactly a reason why I should be a cur to you; and an accomplice in a theft, by which you suffer. I have no pretensions to religion like my sister: so I can't afford to tamper with plain right and wrong. What, look calmly on and see one man defraud another? I can't do it. See you defrauded? you, Mrs. Dodd, for whom I profess affection and friendship? You, Miss Dodd, for whom I profess love and constancy? Stand and see you swindled into poverty? No: I'll be damm'd if I do. Of what do you think I am made? My stomach rises against it, my blood boils against it, my flesh creeps at it, my soul loathes it:' then after this great burst he seemed to turn so feeble: 'oh,' said he, faltering, 'I know what I have done; I have signed the death-warrant of our love, dear to me as life. But I can't help it. Oh Julia, Julia, my lost love, you can never look on me again; you must not love a man you can not marry, Cheat Hardie's wretched son. But what could I do? Fate offers me but the miserable choice of desolation or cowardly rascality. I choose desolation. And I mean to stand by my choice like a man. So good-by, ladies.'

The poor proud creature rose from his seat, and bowed stiffly and haughtily to us both, and was going away without another word, and, I do believe, forever. But his soul had been too great for his body; his poor lips turned pale, and he staggered; and would have fallen, but mamma screamed to me, and she he loves so dearly, and abandons so cruelly, woke from a stupor of despair, and flew and caught him fainting in these arms."

STRATEGY.

THE night set in sullenly, almost without a twilight between it and the dismal day; and the clouds, all day long pressing close upon the dank earth as if to shut out all chance of sunshine, began to drop down in a raw shivering mist that would have done credit to November, and fully justified the fire burning in the library hearth of Courtenay House, even though the month did style itself July. By the window a still figure in black looked steadily out at dripping boughs and trickling eaves, and by the fire lounged a man of thirty, with a good head, handsome eyes, an excellent development of chest and shoulders, and the air of a gentleman: so much was apparent. Whether he was also possessed of heart and brains seemed not so easy to determine, as he lay there looking into the fire.

Neither of these thinkers by any chance looked at the other, and you could plainly hear the tick of the bronze clock in the drawing-room, and the tap of a little slipper on the polished stairs, as some one came, singing,

"Mais tout se tait dans la demeure,
La brise seule—"

And one might have thought that the singer herself was the breeze from the rush and rustle with which she came over the flags of the hall to the library.

"Come, Victor."

"Where?"

"La belle idée! to Sophie Marvin's reception."

"I told you that I should not go."

"But you must. There is such a dearth of gentlemen here. I promised Sophie that you should come."

"Then my fair cousin exceeded her powers, and must pay the penalty. I shall spend the evening with Mrs. Courtenay"—glancing shyly toward the still figure at the window.

Edith shrugged her shoulders.

"Please don't be absurd."

"One can't help one's nature."

Miss Courtenay might as well have spared her arguments from the first; for under all this idle seeming lurked a purpose, and from his boyhood up Victor Brittan had never yet wavered in a purpose.

Six weeks before he had showed himself at Courtenay House, worn, wan, and still on crutches, scarce yet safe out of the jaws of Death, who had been hard after him, first in the battle, and then through weeks of delirium in the hospital wards. Some blunderer had returned his name in the list of killed, and his aunt, Mrs. Courtenay, and cousin, Edith, met him in their mourning-dresses. Imagine the joyful stir and tumult. The old house went beside itself. The children, the servants even, crowded about him. The only thing outside of all this rejoicing was a frozen figure in widow's weeds—Mrs. Lois Courtenay, widow of Edith's elder brother, Herbert.

Herbert Courtenay had sowed his wild oats, contracted a mésalliance (that is, married the daughter of a poor clergyman), and died early. This was his widow, whom Victor might scarcely have remembered again had he not chanced to see her transfigured, lips parted, eyes all aglow, and at their deepest blue, every feature lighted, she all the while fancying herself unseen in her shadowy corner as she listened to his eager talk. His eyes met hers, held them for a moment, still brimming with soft light; then down came the white eyelids, the ripe lips closed firmly, color, meaning, glow, died away into her usual stony quiet.

Since then Victor had watched and waited patiently for another apotheosis of this stone into a beautiful woman, and, as destiny thus far had not seen fit to gratify him, resolved that evening to take destiny into his own hands.

The night closed in fairly. Every scrap of twilight was gone, yet still Lois Courtenay sat at the window. Edith and her mother had driven off some moments since; for the way was long, and at M—— they kept early hours. Victor rose and took a turn or two across the room; then stopped near the window.

"Mrs. Courtenay, I have a whim. Let us sup here in cozy home-fashion. That huge dining-room is uncanny on a night like this."

As if receiving an order, Lois got up and, without answering, touched the bell. By her direction the servants brought in a table—an old-fashioned thing, round and claw-legged; the very one in his mind. She herself laid the cloth, set out china and silver, with soft sweeping movements, deft firm fingers; and it was a marvel how, while divining and executing the very spirit of his thought, she yet contrived to exclude from it all seeming of spontaneity.

Victor sat watching her, biting his lips and raging inwardly; but on a sudden was heard a voice of lamentation — Madge Courtenay mourning for Aunty Lois, and refusing to be comforted. She had gotten out of her bed and toddled down stairs, and would listen neither to reason nor the nurse. Lois put out the nurse, shut the door, and, taking the little puss on her lap, administered tea-spoonfuls of tea and noiseless kisses. Victor, seeing that, closed his eyes, and after a while drew one or two labored sleeping breaths. Seeing that, Lois began to coo and murmur to the child, and straightway Madge grew riotous for a story.

"Tell you a story? Not I," quoth Lois, merrily. "I am going to play Wolf and eat you. You are the daintiest morsel that Wolf Lois ever tasted." And with a premonitory gnashing of teeth, and three or four ferocious growls in feminine bass, the full red lips seized on Madge's white cheeks, then on her rounded shoulders, under her chin, even on the little blue-veined feet kicking in the air, amidst giggles and wild clawing of fat fingers; these presently got entangled in the widow's cap, broke the strings, and pulled it off. At that Madge shrieked with glee, and Victor took occasion to open his eyes. Lois drew herself up, half terrified, half vexed, and stretched out her hand for the cap that Madge had tossed on the table. Victor seized it.

"Please don't."

"What?"

"Freeze up again. Don't you know we are cousins?"

"In law."

"Herbert and I were school-mates," went on Victor, coaxingly. "For the sake of old times I should be glad to show some little kindness to his widow."

"You are very good."

"No, I am selfish. I think we should like each other."

"Won't you give me my cap?"

"Why should you wear that ugly thing?"

"Please give it me."

She was half-wrathful half-amused. Victor took Madge, gave her to nurse vi et armis, closed the door, and came back and sat down by Mrs. Courtenay.

"I am serious. This cap is an emblem of your moral state. You perversely keep it on; you perversely make a sort of moral Simeon Stylites of yourself, and hurt yourself and others. If you ask by what right I dare say this, I answer by the right given every man to wage war against an evil or an error, wherever he may find it."

"You do not know."

"I do. Your mother and sister-in-law don't love you. They can't forgive you Herbert's love, and your poverty. Is that a reason for shutting out all good and genial things from your life?"

Suddenly Victor spied something sparkling in the light. A bright tear rolling down either cheek.

"I have been a brute," he said, penitently.

"No, you are only too kind."

"When I have made you cry with my lecturing?"

"Because you cared enough to lecture. Every one else has been content to take me as a petrifaction."

"It is understood then?"

"What is understood?"

"That on Wednesday you go with me to drive."

"I have said nothing of the sort."

"You will go?"

"It is quite impossible."

"Why?"

"Because—" she hesitated. Reasons were abundant, but not easily expressed.

"Why?" repeated Victor.

"It will not be best."

"What audacity! I am your physician, and expect to be obeyed. I consider that you have said Yes."

Lois Courtenay was a woman of a strong will, and though Victor confounded her by his audacity he did not conquer her.

"I am not a child, or to be treated as one," she answered. "What should I do driving out with you?"

"Then you are really in dread? Tyranny has broken your spirit?"

"Do I look timid?"

"Or you dislike to go with me? Even sea-breeze and bright sky can't make me tolerable."

"That is unkind."

"I profess I can see no other reason. There has been no special commandment that Lois Courtenay shall never drive on the beach? You are your own mistress; I control my own fortunes. You must find me utterly detestable?"

"If you think that I will go."

"Say I will go, Victor. You observe that I call you Lois?"

"Good-night."

"Here is your cap," and Victor took the hand put out to receive it into his own a moment, then went to bed triumphant.

Lois professed courage, but if truth must be told she quaked inwardly. Edith's sneer was not more endurable because familiar; and had not Victor been inexorable she would after all have relinquished the ride. Once out of the house, however, and its shadow off her heart, she bloomed out into genial enjoyment of the rare pleasure, into pleasant laughter, wise and sweet sayings, and a hundred arch and winning ways, not a little charming to Victor who had hardly expected so complete a metamorphosis. This was her humor on the way out. Coming back she began to sadden.

"Take care," said Victor, "you are beginning to petrify."

She answered him with a wan smile that troubled and haunted him. He could not translate it till later on, when he found that she glided past him like a ghost, evaded him like a shadow—avoided him not for one day or two, but persistently and at all times—he began to comprehend that this poor chilled nature had learned in frost and darkness to be afraid of sunshine. Then he came out openly; left his aunt and Edith to pout, and sought her at all times. Lois received him with coldness and monosyllables; they revenged themselves after the fashion of Pharaoh; gave her bricks to make without straw.

Grown desperate, he sent her a line by Madge.

"What is my offense?"

The answer came swiftly back,

"You have not offended; but have you never heard how the torture of one condemned to die of thirst is heightened by a highly seasoned banquet? My thirst is sufficiently intense. I prefer lenten diet."

Victor took the note out with him into quiet and cool air, read, re-read it, and decided. Coming back he found Edith and her mother red, ruffled, angry, and exclaiming. Edith had just added the last straw of provocation to the back of the camel Patience, and much-enduring Lois had turned at last, flashed out a few brief sentences, and was preparing to leave the house.

"She says that she can support herself by teaching," said Edith, bitterly, "as if we were not already sufficiently disgraced by her alliance!"

Victor's cheek burned at that, but he wisely held his peace, and contented himself with sending for Lois.

"I hear that you are a rebel," was Victor's salutation. "You know that I have a commission to arrest such wherever found."

"I don't acknowledge your authority, Captain Brittan."

"And you will really go out alone into the world?"

"No; I have been alone. I shall have hope with me now."

"What can one so weak as you do in the press and throng?"

"What other weak ones have done."

"That is, suffer and die, poor child! and you look joyous over it! You have no regrets?"

"None."

"None? you will miss no one here?"

Lois colored a little under the earnest look.

"Yes, little Madge."

"And that is all?"

"You, perhaps, a little."

"A little, and perhaps! You will remember a week or two and then—but I need not ask. You have shunned me carefully enough here."

Lois was silent.

"May I ever come and see you?"

"Victor!"

"Well, you hate me, do you not?"

"Now, you are hypocritical."

"Pardon. It is you. Why treat me with such coldness if you have any kindly feeling for me?"

"Are you so blind? Do you not see that now I lead a life of self-communion, self-dependence, and find in myself all my earthly hope and resource? If you had drawn me as you wished into your life, to find comfort, rest, sympathy, happiness there, made of me a thing, clinging and dependent, how much blacker had been the darkness, how much more utter the desolation, when, as must have been sooner or later, I was thrust back into the life I now lead!"

"Where is the need?"

"You see it now."

"No."

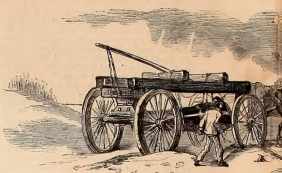
Lois cast a quick, startled look at Victor and began to tremble; perhaps at something that she saw in him.

"Why," he repeated, "Why not find rest with me now and forever? Be my wife, Lois. I love you very dearly."

Lois turned away her face, but did not withhold her hand. After a moment,

"That was why"—she began, and stopped.

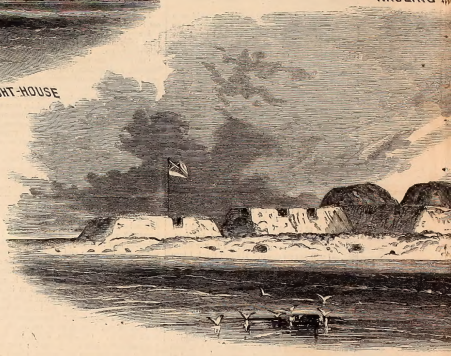
"Well."



"I shunned you."

"Because I loved you?"

"No; because I loved you."

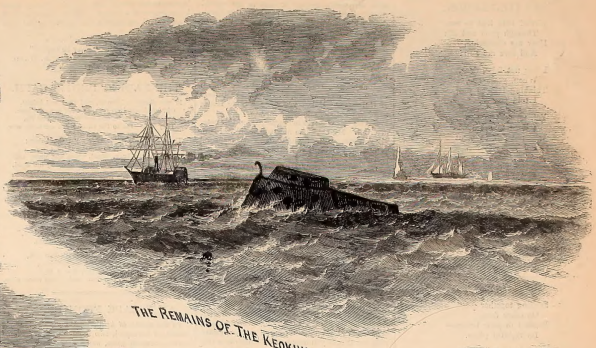


ADVANCED WORKS OF GEN. GILMORE AND OLD LIGHT-HOUSE

HAULING G

DIGGING TRENCHES AND MOUNTING GUNS

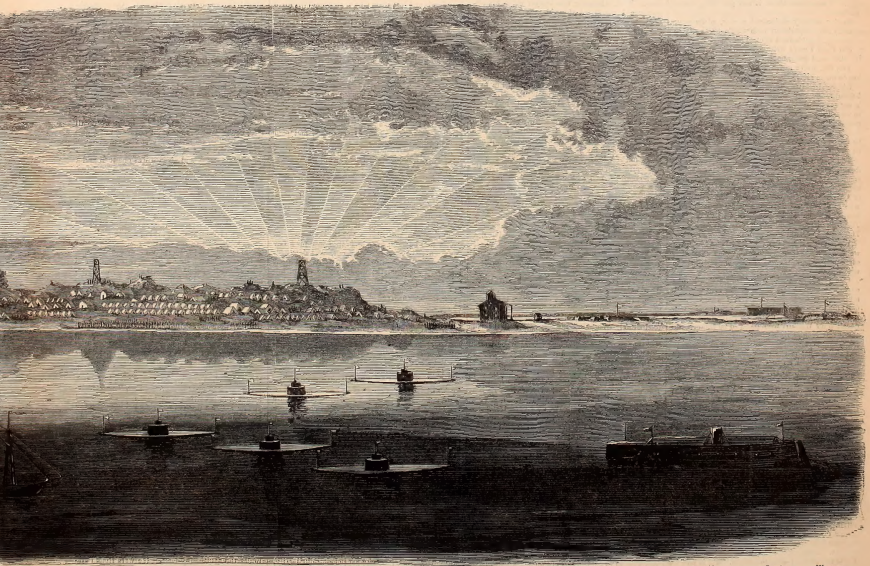
FORT WAGNER, FRO



Look-out on Folly Island.

GENERAL VIEW OF MORRIS ISLAND, HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, SOUT

EGE GUNS.



THE REMAINS OF THE KEOKUK.

M THE CHANNEL.

MORTAR BATTERY BEFORE WAGNER.

Encampment of Union Troops. Old Lighthouse. Gillmore's advanced Works. Ironsides. Sumter. Wagner.

TH CAROLINA.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF THE NAVY.—[SEE PAGE 542.]

MY CONFESSION.

WIFE! long true to me,
Through good and ill:
Hear my confession,
And love me still!

I was not false, dear,
When, years ago,
Thinking I loved you,
I told you so.

Yet, my gift to you
I feel is less
Was not fair payment
For yours to me.

You did not know it;
You guessed not how
I was your debtor—
As I am now.

I dare not own it,
This later day,
Were I not able
Some part to pay.

Watching together
Here, by this bed,
Where, softly pillowed,
Lies one bright head;

Smiling together
On other face,
Pressed to your bosom—
Its rightful place.

Thus, dear, I venture
To whisper this—
Now that I give you
A whole-heart kiss.

Now that—God helping—
I on you
Husband more worthy,
Lover more true.

ARTEMUS WARD TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.

FRIEND WALES,—You remember me. I saw you in Canady a few years ago. I remember you too. I seldum forget a person.

I hearn of your marriige to the Prin'ss Alexandry, & ment to writ you a congr'tulatory letter at the time, but I'm bizzi—sich a burn bizzi—summer, & hain't had no t'me to write letters to folks. Excoos me.

You ought to've ast me to take one since we met in the body politic. The body politic, in fack, is sick. I surtimes think it has got biles, friend Wales.

In y our country we've got a war, while your country, in conjunkshon with Csp'n Semis of the Alabama, remains a mostly quiet land.

I'm frail I can't write goaks when I sit about it. Oh no, I guess not!

Yes, Sir, we've got a war, and the troo Patrit has to make sacrifises, you bet.

I have already given two cousins to the war, & I stand ready to sacrifise my wife's brother rather'n not see the rebelyin krusht. And if wuss cums to wuss I'll shed ev'ry drop of blud my able-bodid relations has got to proshedure the war. I think somebody oughter be proskooted, & it may as well be the war as enny body else. When I git a goakin fit onto me it's no use to try ter stop me.

You hearn about the draft, friend Wales, no doubt. It went into squirmin', but it was fairly conducted, I think, for it hit all classes. It is troo that Wendill Phillips, who is a American citizen of African descent, urged, but so did Vallandigum, who is Conservative, and who was resantly sent South, tho' he would have bin sent to the Dry Tortoogas if the Sekkond perfode for a mimit that the Tortoogueses would keep him.

We hain't got any daily paper in our town, but we've got a purty wooman circle, which amuses the same purpus, and we wasn't long in suspents as to who was drafted.

One year man who was drawd claimed to be exemp be ause he was the only son of a widder'd mother who he supported Him. A few able-bodid dead men was drafted, but whether their heirs will have to pay 3 hundrid dollars a peace for 'em is a questi n for Whitin', who 'pears to be tinkerin' up this c'ash bizniss right smart. I hope he makes good wages.

I think most of the conscrips in this place will go. A few will go to Canady, stoppin' on their way at Concord, N. H., where I understan there is a Muslum of Harts.

You see I have a friend Wales, hittin' all sides; but no offense is ment. You know I ain't a politickin, and never was. I vote for Mr. Union—that's the only candidate I've got. I claim, however, to have a well-balanced mind; tho' my ideas of a well-balanced mind differ from the ideas of a partiser I once had, whose name is was Billson. Billson and me organized a strollin dramatic company, & called it The Drunkard, or the Fallen Sawed, with a real drunkard. The play didn't take particularly, and says Billson to me, Let's give 'em sum historical gramy. We had a large troop onto our hands, consistin' of eight tragedians and a bass drum, but I says, No, Billson; and then says I, Billson, you hain't got a well-balanced mind. Says he, Yes, I have, old hoss-fly (he was low cuss)—yes, I have. I have a mind, says he, that balances in any direction that the public relires. That's wot I calls a well-balanced mind. I sold out and bid adoo to Billson. He is now an outcast in the State of Vermont. The miser'ble man once played Hamlet. There wasn't any orchestry, and wishin' to expire to slow music, he died playin' on a clarionett himself, interspersed with hart-rendin' groans, & such is the world! Alars! alars! how onthankful we air to that Providence which kindly allows us to live and borrow money, and fail and do bizniss!

But to return to our subjeck. With our resunt grate tiumphs on the Mississippi, the Father of Waters (and them in waters no Father need feel 'shamed of—twig the writtikism?), and the cheerin' look of things in other places, I reckon we shan't want any Muslum of Harts. And what can girls do the people of Concord, N. H., want a Muslum of Harts for? Hain't you got the State House now? & what more do you want?

But all this is furrin to the purpuss of this note, arter all. My objeck in now addressin' you is to give you sum advice, friend Wales, about managin' your wife, a bizniss I've had over thirty years experience in.

You had a good weddin. The papers hav a good deal to say about "vikins" in connection therwith. Not knowings what that air and so I'm free ly tells you, my noble lord dock of the throne, I can't zackly say whether we had 'em or not. We was both wery much flustrated. But I never injoyed myself better in my life.

Dowtless, your supper was ahead of our'n. As regards wine, miss Baldinville was allers stingy. But you can git a good meal in New York, & cheap too. You can git half a mackrit at Delmonico's or Mr. Mason Dorr's for six dollars, and idlel potaters thrown'd in.

As I said, I manage my wife without any particler trouble. When I fust commenced trainin' her I institooted a series of experiments, and them as didn't work I abandon'd. You'd better do similler. Your wife may object to gittin' up and bilkin' the fire in the mornin', but if you commence with her at once you may be able to overkum this prejoodice. I regret to observe that I didn't commence arly enuff. I wouldn't have you s'pose I was ever kicked out of bed. Not at all. I simply say, in mayin' a bildin' fires, that I didn't commence arly enuff. It was a rather cold weather when I first propped the idee to Betsy. It wasn't a wall recent, and I found myself layin' on the floor putty sudden. I thought I'd git up and bild the fire myself.

Of course now you're marrid you can eat onions. I allus did, and if I know my own hart, I allus will. Some daughters don't like 'em, & I admit is frisky, says they's disgustin. And speakin of my daughter reminds me that quite a number of young men have suddenly discovered that I am a very entertainin' old feller, and they visit us frekently, specially on Sunday evenins. One young man—a base-ly cuss—brought some cigars as much as he did. My wife's father lives with us. His intelleck totters a little, and he saves the papers containin' the precious stuff for the fire-kindler. The old gen'l man likes to read out loud, and he reads to'lis well. He eats hash freely, which makes his voice clear. I'm in hopes Betsy has to spell the most of his words, I may say he reads slow. Well, whenever this lawyer made his appearance I would set in the back parlor with the Legislativ' reports. I kept the young lawyer up one n'ight till 12 o'clock, listenin to a lot of acts in regard to a harbor somewhere in the east part of the State, havin' sent my daughter to bed at half past 8. He hasn't im proved his time a bit, he's certain! he says I'm a pound swindlin' the Public.

I never attempted to reorganize my wife but once. I shall never attempt agin. I'd like to a double dinner, and had allowed myself to be betrayed into drinkin' several people's healths; and drinkin' to much makes me extremely self-confiding, nerd drinkin' their healths until my own became affected. Consekens was, I presented myself at Betsy's bedroom long after midnight in a state that concealed about my person. I had sumbow got persshon of a hosewhip on my way home, and remembered cumplaints I had received of Mrs. Ward in the mornin', I snapt the whip putty lively, and, in a very loud wolce, I said, "Betsy, you need reorganizin'! I'm the boy to reorganize! I soothin-corackin' the whip over the bed—"I have cum to reorganize you! Ha-ave you per-rayed to-nite?"

* * * * *

I dreamt that night that sumbody had laid howship over me sev'rl consekkootiv times; and when I woke up I found that my hair'd turned much of any thin' since, and if I ever have another reorganizin' job on hand I shell let it out.

My wife is a good wife, and has also sustained a good character. She's a good cook. Her mother lived to a vener'ble age, and died while in the act of frying doughnuts for the Sunday-school conserts. And may no rood hand pluk a flour from her toom-stun! We hain't got any pictur of the old lady, because she objected to it on her dawtership, and therefore I can't giv her likeness to the world through the mejium of the illustrated papers; but as she was a reg'lar orthoprickt, partickerly, I don't s'pose they'd publish it, any how.

It's best to giv a woman consid'rable lee-way. But not too much. Mrs. Ward's cousin, Mr. Rufus Minkins, was once very sick with the fever, but his wife moved his bed into the door-yard while she was cleanin' house, and he got well. That's the thing, specially as it was rainin' vilently; but he said he wanted to giv his wife all the lee-way. That was much. I told Mrs. Minkins that her Roofus would die if he staid out there into the rain much longer, and she said it wouldn't be my fault if he dies unprepared," at the same time tossin' him his mother's Bible. It was orful! I stood by, however, and saw that the lee-way's I could, but I was a putty wet-nuss, I tell you.

There's vavis ways of managin' a wife, friend Wales, but the best and only safe way is to let her do jist about as she wants to. I'dopted that there plan sum time ago, and it works like a charm.

Remember me kindly to Mrs. Wales, and good luck to you both! And as years roll by, and accidents begin to happen to you—among which I hope there'll be Twins—you will agree with me that family joys air the only ones a man can bet on with any certinty of winnin'.

It may interest you to know that I'm prosperin' in a pecooney pint of view. I make 'bout as much in the course of a year as a Cab'net offisser does, & I understan' my bizniss a good deal better than sum of 'em do.

Respecks to St. Gorge & the Dragon.

"Ever be happy."

A. WARD.

THE FADING PHOTOGRAPH.

IT was gloomy and brown, and clear and bright.
Oh, her large deep eyes, and her queenly brow,
Her torrent of curls, and her proud, proud lip,
They were true to the face—I can see them now.

Those great dark eyes were my magnet stars;
There was the lip, to sweet and red;
There was the brow, broad, white, and pure;
And that was the way that she hung her head.

Ten years ago, and now, like our love,
It has faded, as may be the better spring;
Though a dreary cloud I still see her face,
But day by day it is vanishing.

Alas! it was bleached by the cruel sun,
Blurred and spotted, and pale and dim,
Till it looks like the ghost of our by-gone love,
Or the unwritten face of some dying saint.

'Tis strange that love, that is God's own gift,
Should fade away like the summer rose,
And this poor frail thing be left on a type
Of that flower of the heart that should never close.

AN ESCAPE FROM PRISON.

In the month of April, 1803, my ship, the brig Rachel, of Liverpool, two hundred and forty tons burden, sixteen guns, and thirty-five men, was lying at anchor in the roads of Bordeaux, by the French frigate Valliant, commanded by one Captain Etienne.

On arriving at Bordeaux we were lodged in a filthy fort, and on the fifth day we commenced our march to Verdun, five or six hundred miles distant, each of us receiving fifteen sous a day for traveling expenses. On the thirty-sixth day we entered Verdun, having made an average march of eighteen miles a day. At the citadel the commandant took a careful description of our persons, we signed our parole, and were then billeted given us on the various inns, were turned loose into the town.

The détenus lodged at the different inns and shops in the town soon found themselves chiefly in gambling. A young man named J——, having just come into a large legacy, tried to break the bank, but was cleaned out all he had, besides a large sum he borrowed from the bankers. The governor, hearing of this, shut him up in the Tour d'Angoulême, but that his friends would come and discharge his debts; but they left him to his bread and water. Another poor young fellow, surgeon of a vessel, had had his allotes given us on his endorser, and all these too he lost. He then invited his friends to a grand supper, and next morning he was found in bed with his throat cut from ear to ear. Another lieutenant—both these men were the table, labeled, "The Cure for all Diseases;" scattered on the floor were scraps of paper on which the poor fellow had been practicing Captain B.'s signature.

A friend of mine was a constant speculator on the red and black, and got very much in debt. One night he made a great coup and won, he instantly counted out the money, put it in his pocket, ran out and knocked up his creditors, and paid every soul of them.

A parcel of dark lost a month's pay, and then tried to borrow a couple of crowns of the banker. He was asked for security; he instantly drew out a knife, and cut off the tail of his right ear; the money was given him.

There were but few deaths among the prisoners. Among those who died, however, were the Marquis and Marchioness of Tweedale. Permission to go to Paris was granted to them, their bodies to England. There was also a young Westmoreland doctor who had run over to France just for a few days, and, being found out, was detained. He died of a broken heart. One day, while out bathing, I came on the dead body of one of my countrymen, and saw that he had just been shot in a duel. He had been forced to the field against his will by a threat to deprive him of his rank if he had not gone.

Wearied at last of this idle and profitless life, I determined to make my escape with three friends. It was a bold undertaking, as we should not injure our bondsmen by breaking our parole; but before guarding against this we bought maps, gimlets, small files, and pistols, and obtained cash. We then collected a quantity of small rope, and bound it round our bodies under our clothes; the brigadier of gens d'armes let our hats. We then staid out beyond the prescribed time, and, as we had expected, were ordered up into the citadel (confined for several days in punishment.

About five o'clock I descended the stairs leading from the citadel and the adjoining church, and found a small hole with a grate all round the panels of the door, then with my knife cut it all through but one corner. I then filled the holes with tallow and spread some over it. This took me about half an hour. All this time one of my friends guarded the sentry. We went to bed at night, and as the gens d'armes visited the rooms, as they were compelled to do every two hours. As soon as they were gone, we called my friends and slid down. To my horror, the panel, instead of breaking quietly off, made a noise like a pistol, but it luckily caused no alarm. I, and King, and Innis were through in a moment, but Alison (a purser), a big man, stuck fast, and kept crying out lustily, "Pull, pull!" we eventually pulled him through. Then crossing the church we climbed up one of the windows by the iron bars, but found the tracery too small to let us through. Then groping about for another place, we upset a clothes-horse (the church had been turned into a store-room), and this made a fearful noise; the dogs barked and the guard turned out; but we were not discovered.

Soon after all was quiet. We mounted an altar on the left side of the choir, and finding a part of a window without glass or bars, dropped quietly some six feet into the convent garden. We had then a tiled wall to surmount. We got up by means of a rope, and uncoiled a place, unobserved by a neighboring sentinel. As the church clock struck one, the last of us descended and walked across the grass in the direction of the general's house, then unoccupied. To our astonishment, we almost ran against a sentinel, but he was probably a new recruit and frightened, for he challenged us, but gave no alarm. We darted into the general's garden, beyond foremost. He leaped over a wall three feet high, expecting the fall to be trifling, but he found that he had to drop twenty feet. He then called out to us softly, to ease ourselves down: which we did.

We soon came in sight of a sentry-box, with the sentinel asleep. We passed him, and I, foremost, got over the rampart and was standing on the cordon, when Innis, who had better eyes, came up and warned me of danger. Another moment and I should have been dashed to pieces; there was a fall of sixty feet. The night was dark, the sight of the sentinel had confused us, and we could not see the spot where we had intended to descend, and where the fall was only about thirty-five feet.

We had no time to lose. We stripped and unwound our rope, and tied one end to a stone. We had previously drawn lots which should be the last, and I drew it. When my turn came, I found the cord so stretched, so smoothed down, and so slimy, that it would not support my weight. I fell full on my back about twenty feet. I heard Alison say: "He is killed;" but I soon undeceived him by jumping on my feet. We then scrambled out of the moat and reached a wood where we had bid our stores. Just as I was stooping to open my knapsack, I felt a hand suddenly removed. Alison, too, had hurt his ankles in falling, and could scarcely stand. After having eaten and drunk, we again pushed on for some six or seven leagues, and then, completely exhausted, we lay down in the wood. About five we heard the gun, a signal for the peasants to hunt us. About ten o'clock we were roused and a rustling among the bushes, but no one came very near us. Innis, who was a doctor, as soon as all was quiet, bled Alison's ankle and examined my head.

Here we lay four days, the first two fine, the last two continual rain. The third night I was better, and, after having with Innis been able to fill our canteens at a rivulet. On the fifth night Alison's ankles grew stronger, and we left the wood, and pushed on for the Meuse.

In the middle of the river there was land, connected by bridges with an island on either side. We swam across, and then were very nearly seamed asleep; but as we stepped on the first bridge the church bell began to toll the vesche. On approaching the island we met with three or four pistol-shots. By this time all the villagers were up, sounding their horns and shouting. What was to be done? The enemy was before and behind, and none of us could swim. We turned off the road and ran along the bank; to our great joy, at the end of the island we found a boat, jumped into it, and in a moment were across and out of hearing. At daylight we found ourselves in a forest, where all the bushes had been cut down, and we had to hide ourselves behind the tree trunks, and keep a bright look-out all day.

We proceeded all night, and lay in the woods all day, suffering only from want of clear, refreshing water. We found a small plenty of water and bathed and washed. We had brought provisions for eighteen days. A day's allowance was one inch and a half of bologna sausage, a quarter pound of bread, and two mouthfuls of brandy, measured in a shaving-brush case. Our sleep by day was disturbed, first by the cold and then by the heat.

By the help of our maps we kept in a pretty direct course, never entering a house, nor speaking to more than three persons. Our object was to reach the town of Toul, without asking a question. The other invited us to his cottage, and guided us for seven miles, taking us for runaway conscripts.

On the eleventh day it rained incessantly, and we had to sit against the roots of trees, cold, wet, and miserable, fearful of falling every moment. Alison's ankles began to fail him again, and he had grown thin from pain and fatigue. That night we reached the town as usual, though it was still near dark. About half past ten we entered the small town of Charmes, thinking the rain would keep the inhabitants indoors. On coming to a corner a gendarme demanded our passports. Innis, who knew French perfectly, and had collected some letters from the villagers, and declared they were the new sort of passports issued at Paris. Just as we thought we had safely passed him, he came a thought we had safely passed him, he came a thought we had safely passed him, he came a thought and good-humoredly said, "Ah, gentlemen, I am glad to see you; I have been expecting you these two days, and I have received such a paper, read our names and descriptions. Finding ourselves caught, we made the best of it, and invited the kindly old gendarme to share some dinner. The gendarme told us that he had been in bed, but that, having been sent by his wife to see spectacles, he had been talking with some acquaintance, who kept him until we had happened to come up.

The next day we were sent back to Verdun, where all our friends were waiting to receive us. We were instantly put into the Tour d'Angoulême and searched. They cut open our buttons to search for money, and took away our knives, razors, and pocket-handkerchiefs. But they did not leave us so bare as they imagined, for I kept five double Louis sewn inside my flannel waistcoat, and one under the arm of my coat. We were ironed and shut up in the round tower.

A few days after we were sent to Bitche: ten leagues south-east of Strasbourg, and upon a rock in the midst of a valley. In the little sou-terrain we found twenty Englishmen, chiefly masters of merchant ships, and midshipmen, and, in the contiguous grand souterrain, about one hundred and seventy British seamen. My companions here were the sweepings of the sweepings—all the most violent and dissolute of the prisoners from Verdun—smugglers, gamblers, duelists, and thieves.

Few attempts to escape from Bitche had succeeded; the walls were so lofty, the guard so good. A ship's carpenter, who escaped and was taken trying to swim over the Rhine with his son, a little boy, on his back, was brought to the grand souterrain. He had not been in long before he again attempted to escape. He one night forced two wooden doors, and undermined one or two iron doors. On the awful night when the last door was to be passed a spy informed the commandant. Just as three prisoners had stepped through, the gens d'armes in waiting fired on them, and then cut them down with their sabres. The carpenter and a companion were killed; the third jumped back through the door and escaped. His son was afterward one of four daring boys who descended an angle of the citadel at Verdun without a rope, but were recaptured, brought back, and whipped.

On another occasion an Italian prisoner hid himself in the cavern well of the prison, three hundred feet deep; he escaped, but was recaptured and sent to the galleys.

Another time Lieutenant Essel and five sailors escaped through a grating which they had loosened, having previously made a rope out of their linen. Unfortunately, just as they were in the embrasure about to descend, the sergeant of the rounds came by and fell over the rope they had fastened. In their alarm they went down the rope too rapidly and too near together, and it snapped. The lieutenant was dead before he could reach the bottom, having struck against a jutting rock. Only one midshipman could move away, and he was recaptured in the morning. Yet, although the four had dropped ninety feet, only one man's leg was broken.

As the winter approached I, and Innis, and Alison commenced making preparations for a second attempt. We purchased coarse linen, and made it up during the night into rope. The barrack in which we were confined had two fronts, with a wall running lengthwise through the centre, the staircases on opposite sides communicating by doors which were locked. The one side was strongly guarded, but on the other no sentinels were placed till eight o'clock at night. As soon as it was dark (on the 20th of November) we forced open the inner lock, and then tried to cut out the clamp by which the outer clasp was secured; but our knives making little impression, we put a stiff piece of iron within and across the keyhole of the box-lock, to which we fastened the end of a strong cord. Twelve of us then got hold of it, and, pulling all together, open it flew. All this time we kept shouting, to prevent the five gens d'armes who lived in the room below hearing us. A working-party then ascended the stairs, while those in the room below kept up the noise. After a long and fruitless attempt we found the gimlet too small; we therefore went to bed brooding over our certain removal to the dungeon the next morning. Rising early, a thought struck me. I filled up the gimlet-holes with tallow and ashes; then, boring holes where the nails of the clamp had been, I tied the clamp on again and shut the door. It was a dark, foggy morning, and the gendarme never detected the state of the clamp. Next day we got a large gimlet from an English gentleman who was on parole in the town.

The night we chose was one to our mind. It blew hard, with sleet and snow. In the evening, directly after muster, we placed ourselves in a row along both stairs to pass the alarm if any thing happened. One of us, with an axe, started all the nails at the bottom of the door, and cut through the last plank. Once at the bottom of the stairs, we darted across, and fastened our rope to a stone in one of the embrasures. We descended with great rapidity a distance of about ninety feet, lacerating our hands with the rope, which we had bound with hard twine. The drawbridge was still down; we crossed it, and divided into three parties. We had scarcely cleared the town before the gun fired to give the alarm. We made for the first wood, and walked till five o'clock, when we sat down to rest, uncertain whether we were going right or wrong.

At daybreak I found I was the only man who had the full use of his hands. Some of the party had their fingers cut to the bone; others had scarcely any whole skin remaining on the palms of their hands. I was surgeon. I cut off strips from their shirts, and bound up their wounds. We had only half a loaf and a bladder of brandy. Alison had had a ham, which he had tried to bring down the wall in his teeth, but it fell and was lost. At night, cold, hungry, and benumbed, we reached the small town of Niederbrun, where one of our party was taken ill, and we had to venture into a lonely wine-house, where the heat of the stove made us all ill, and took away our appetites. We hired a guide, and went on till we came to a village, where we paid a crown to two men thrashing by candlelight, to conceal us under the straw for a few hours. We lay unmolested for an hour, when a man and woman discovered us, called us thieves, and roused the village; but we escaped.

Next day, as we were going along, cold, lame, and hungry, we met a douanier, and gave him fifteen Louis to take us across the Rhine. As we were crossing a bridge twenty or thirty armed men ran out at us. All of us were captured but Innis and myself, who were taken a few hours after, just as we were unchaining a boat to cross the Rhine. The surgeon who dressed our hands told us that they would have mortified if exposed much longer to the weather.

On our return the commandant accused us of ingratitude, and of breaking our parole. Then ordering us sternly down to the petit souterrain, he said:

"I have been hitherto a lamb, but you will now find me a tiger."

Our place of confinement was a room about twenty-five feet by ten, having a guard bed running the whole length. The passage to the room was guarded by two doors, and the entrance into it by other two, the wall being four feet thick. We soon found that the room above us was unoccupied, and had no bars to the window. Our difficulties were, however, now four-fold.

How to get to the window!

How to descend from the window by the tin spout which was in the roof, and projected two feet from the wall!

How to elude the sentinel who paced round the tower!

How to descend quietly, so as not to awaken the jailer, who slept under us, and whose window we should have to pass!

Our plans were soon made. We cut up sheets, blankets, shirts, trowsers, and towels. Our friends smuggled in needles, thread, and linen almost daily. My companions were now anxious to be off; but I, having the master-instrument (the gimlet), obliged them to wait my pleasure, and stay till I had raised twenty-one Louis in the town and paid my debts.

Our rope, reinforced by a last pair of new sheets, was now one hundred and forty feet long, and we were ready. We took the precaution, this time, of covering the upper end with strips of an old brown coat, as its whiteness had on the last occasion caught the sergeant's eye when he went round to post the sentinels.

The 12th of February being a good night, that is, squally and dark, we resolved to start. That morning we laid in a good store of beef-steaks and brandy, and wished our friends good-by. When all was quiet we began by sticking a mattress against the window to prevent the light being seen; we then piled the rest of the mattresses one upon another, and began to break down the ceiling with an old poker.

The dust nearly smothered us, and when we got through the plaster we found, instead of laths, oak battens and beams eighteen inches square. Then came the floor of the next story, which was of three-inch oak, with knots so hard that they twisted the gimlet. At about ten we heard the jailer unlock the outer door; this seemed to turn us to stone; but it was a false alarm, for he was only going to bed. After giving him a reasonable time to compose himself we recommenced, when our saw broke in one of the mortises. We sat down in despair, when all of a sudden Innis leaped up and cried, "Where are the pieces? I am not going to give up in th way!" With the help of his knife, a piece of wood, and some twine, he contrived a handle, to our great joy, which answered the purpose. At three in the morning, after nine hours' hard and unceasing labor, the last stroke was given, and the way made clear.

The affecting part of the concern came next: we had to part with two of our sick companions. It was painful to us, but what must it have been to them!

The parting over, we scrambled through the hole, and our enterprise began.

Arrived in the upper room we had a clear view of the two sides of the building. It was a dark wild morning, blowing wild and squally, and by a break in the clouds we could see the distant sentry snug in his box.

The first of us who went down carried the rope with two pieces of iron to stick in the walls to keep it firm. It was Alison, the heaviest; but the spout held firm and made no noise. One of those who remained threw down the rope when we were all safe, and the last man threw it over the wall. In the course of a few minutes we found ourselves safe at the bottom of the second rampart. Our first descent had been seventy or eighty feet: our second, forty or forty-five. We now began to congratulate each other on being clear of the fort without having hurt a hair of our heads.

But we had not proceeded more than forty yards when we came to another rampart, and then Wheelan (one of our party) suddenly remembered that there were three ramparts, and bursting into tears, said, "And this is the very place where Davis broke his thigh last year;" but still he could not remember the height. Determining to go on and make a leap in the dark we cut off about nine feet of rope. It was agreed that the two last should hold the rope for the others, and that their predecessors, if safe, should catch the others and break their fall. After three had landed Alison begged me to let him go before me and I consented. I in my turn arrived safe. Wheelan, who came last, fell and broke his tendon Achilles.

Poor fellow! He begged that we would carry him up to the fort gate, but we were in the situation of soldiers on the field of battle; we had no time to mourn fallen companions, but had to push on or be vanquished. We could do no more than place him in an easy position, shake him by the hand, and wish him good-by.

On looking round we were surprised and hurt to find two of our party gone, and much more so when Alison told us that they had tried to persuade him and Innis to go with them, saying they were safe, and why should they risk waiting for the others? We were now in the ditch; we ran along it until we came to a flight of steps leading to the glacis; on arriving at the top we made straight for the mountains. At daybreak we scrambled up a hill, and, sighting a small wood between two roads, made for it. We saw people pass and repass the whole day, but we still lay there undisturbed, although we could hear the signal-gun, and knew we were not yet more than five miles from the fort.

As soon as it was dark we came to a village which, by the number of lights, seemed to be a large one. We tried to get round it, but in doing so Alison fell, first into a quarry and then down a declivity. Fearing to make any further attempts we waited until midnight in an old roofless building, and while we were there it rained heavily. When all was quiet, and the lights were out, we entered the villag, which was knee-deep in mud. We had not got far when a dog barked. This brought a man out and he blew his horn, so we ran across a swampy common, and followed the course of a large river till we came to a wood where we slept till daylight.

During the next forenoon we skirted the wood, looking for a lone house, and at last found one. Just at dark we went up to it and found a man in the court-yard dressing a pig. Inside was another man, who told us we could have some wine; he recognized Alison, and said: "But you are from Bitche, I heard the gun yesterday morning." We did not deny it, but he cheered us up and promised not to betray us; and he bade us go up stairs lest any of the forest guards should come in. All that his house afforded he brought out in a frank open way, and for six crowns lent us his own servant as a guide.

Next day we rested under a cliff in a fir wood where, except some goats with bells round their necks, there was nothing to disturb us. The same night we ascended one of the Vosges mountains in a dreadful thunder-storm, and with the rain bursting down like a water-spout. Finding no cover we had to make a gigantic effort for tired men and scramble to the summit.

Alison, a robust man standing six feet high, and able to take a chair in his teeth and throw it over his head, was here seized with a fever and unable to go further, so we sat by him, though we heard voices all round us. In a little while two woodmen approached, told us there was no fear of gens d'armes, lighted us a fire, and went and got Alison some soup, and the rest some bread and wine. Alison having revived, one of these honest fellows offered to see us ut of the mountains. He procured us a man at idnight, who, for six francs, offered to guide us through the adjoining village, which was half a mile long, intersected by two rivers, and close to the Rhine. To our great joy we got through unmolested, without even a dog barking. That night we slept in a swamp on beds made of branches that we tore down from the trees. We were by this time so accustomed to fatigue that we slept soundly in this horrible place, although it rained hard all night.

Our new guide did all he could to terrify us, declaring that every horseman he met was a gendarme, and demanding his money beforehand. Next day another guide took us across the Rhine on a sort of raft made of five boards, and, after a fresh demand for crowns, we leaped ashore in Baden about five leagues below Strasburg. This was the seventh day since we left Bitche, yet in direct distance we were not yet more than twelve leagues from the fortress.

We now (with seven Louis in our pockets) commenced our march of four hundred miles through an enemy's country. Unfortunately we had forgotten the names of all the places between the Rhine and Ulm, for which place we were bound; but at last, after many inquiries, we hit upon a direct route.

In the Black Forest we came to a wine-house, and were startled at seeing a number of carbines hanging up belonging to the forest guard. For fear of exciting suspicion, we did not retreat, but staid and took a meal, though we observed on the wall a decree of Napoleon ordering the Baden people to arrest all persons traveling without passports.

At night we stopped at a small village, and a Frenchman, who took us for countrymen, obtained us beds, but, to our great disappointment, they were German cushion-beds, and the heat of the feathers kept us awake nearly all night. In the morning we told the Frenchman what we were, and, as he saw us out of the village, he warned us that it was safer passing as Englishmen than Frenchmen, as his countrymen were hated in Germany. He advised us to avoid the Wurtemburg main roads, as they were infested by the landwehr, who stopped travelers who had no passports. At a house, where some peasants in their best clothes were merry-making (for it was Sunday), we obtained a guide, who led us across the frontier into Wurtemburg. After a walk of six miles, he took us to the house of a friend, a good-natured, jocose fellow, with whom we were soon at home. He brought out plenty of wine, and, not understanding us clearly, sent for a lively French lad. We told him we were going to join the French army at Ulm, and wanted to know the shortest way. He at first wanted to go to the mayor of the village for a guide, but eventually, at our request, obtained a map for us, to mark down the villages, by which we might avoid the great military road; for we knew that we were only a few days in advance of the French army that was advancing to attack Austria.

Next night we slept at the house of a fine open-hearted Frenchman, to whom we at once told our secret. He told us we were quite right to pass as his countrymen, for the peasants, we should find, would be civil to us through fear. And this we found to be true, for we were never asked what we were, or whence we came. Here we had our shirts washed for the first and last time during our journey. On parting the Frenchman gave us certificates, such as the itinerant German mechanics use, but we had no faith in them, and when we got out of sight of him threw them away.

Our next guide promised to lead us round a town, but we got into a lane whose entrance had been lately built up, and we were obliged to clamber over a high wall, in sight of a hundred windows. Fortunately it was raining hard and no one observed us. Next day, in a heavy fall of snow, we crossed the Danube, and then walked along the banks of the river Iller, till we came near to Biberach.

We had now no retreat, for the river was on one side of us and the mountain on the other. Still, in despair, we pushed on, trembling, and found a narrow carriage-road, that led round the ramparts. Turning a corner, we saw a guard-house with its window staring full at us. A man seeing us, came out and posted himself in the middle of the road.

"This," said we, "is our last day's march; this fellow is sure to stop us; but let us show a good face and go boldly on."

We did so, walking in a careless dare-devil way, and he did not say a word, though we felt much inclined to run. In a little time we came to an unguarded bridge, and crossed the Iller, and coming to the junction of two roads, one leading to Augsburg and one to Memmingen, chose the latter.

Alison's stamina now began to fail. The once fat, robust man, was now a scarecrow; his coat hung loose upon him; his hat, soaked with rain, drooped over his ears; his frame was bent double; and he had to use a stick to support himself. Innis and I, unable to bear his complaints and piteous moans, generally kept a good way before him. Often at twilight, when we drew near a village, his haggard eyes brightened up, and he would say:

"Now we have made an excellent day's march. We must sleep here."

And as often we were pained to say:

"No, Alison, we must go on another stage."

Then his eyes would resume their languor, and moaning he would droop behind. Happily his sleep and appetite never forsook him; and he always rallied in the morning. Otherwise we must have left the poor fellow to his fate, for our funds would admit of no resting day.

Next day a woman refused us a lodging for fear of the landwehr, as we had no passports. We slept at a small pot-house, and next morning an honest German offered to guide us to Memmingen. It was a fearful morning, the snow coming down in large flakes, the cold keen east wind cutting our faces till they bled. We had to be our own pioneers. We could hardly trace our way through the drifts that were sometimes up to our knees. Our German was affable and friendly, and manifested no curiosity. He would scarcely believe us when we told him we were escaped English prisoners; but when he was convinced, he declared we must accompany him to his house at Kempten. But at the post-house they warned us not to go there, as the passes in the Tyrol were blocked with snow, and they were strict about passports at Memmingen.

The day we crossed the Wurtemberg frontier the cold had detained the gens d'armes round the fire (as we supposed), and we passed a long covered bridge over the Iller without hindrance. A league further we saw the gates of Memmingen, and here we had to experience the pain of parting with our kind German.

Avoiding Landsberg by walking across fields, dangerously deep in snow, we crossed a river on planks, and coasted Munich; and here Alison's legs almost entirely failed. We supported him for six weary miles, and then reached a village where we got comfortable lodgings, rubbed his legs with soft-soap and brandy, and put him to bed.

We had now to skirt Wasserburg, the last fortified town in Bavaria; but Alison broke down in crossing a swampy marsh, and six hours more of incessant toil and climbing entirely prostrated him. We rested and dined, and Alison exerted all his eloquence to detain us; but we knew the next post-house, seven miles off, was on the Bavarian frontier, and we wanted all next day to elude the outposts. We gave him an hour and a half to rest. A few yards, however, and he dropped; nature was exhausted.

"Stay by me or leave me," he said; "I can not go a step further."

A sledge coming by at the moment, I asked the driver to give a poor unfortunate worn-out traveler a ride. "I will give you all one," he said, and drove us to the frontier.

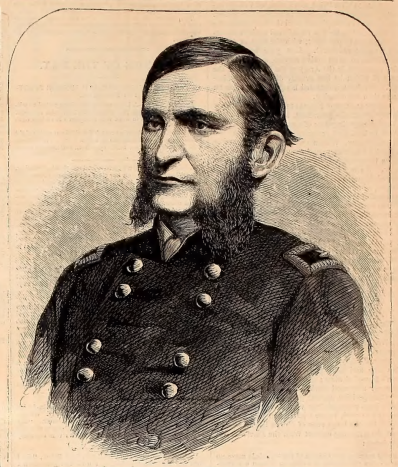
"Here, by the landlord's advice, we took a sledge, hoping to brazen it out with the police. We were stopped; but we passed ourselves off as Americans returning home from Barcelona by Trieste, who had thrown away our passports. Innis handed in a forged American letter, and we were all allowed to pass. This was a miraculous escape.

On reaching the Austrian frontier we jumped out of the carriage and claimed protection as Englishmen. After a toilsome march among enemies for twenty-two days, we were now safe, and were sent guarded to Saltzburg, where our two companions who had deserted us at Bitche joined us. The police director there gave us passports as Americans.

Unable to raise money at Saltzburg, we met at the inn an Austrian general of engineers, who lent us seven pounds; we had now spent our last sixpence. We left Alison there, and pushed across the mountains to Trieste, two hundred and eighty miles distant. The roads were choked with snow, the Carinthian people rude and inhospitable. Everywhere the same incessant demand for passports. My shoes were by this time worn out; our legs began to swell, and our feet to burn like coals. But for the want of shoes we should have been as fresh as when we started, for our feet had never blistered, nor had we lost much flesh.

As soon as we got near Trieste we went into an inn to shave, brush, and wash, for we looked like tramps. Our faces were dirty brown, our hats brimless, our hair long and tangled, our shirts seventeen days from the laundress, our pantaloons incrusted with mud, our stockings trodden away, our shoes tied to our feet, our gaiters in rags, and our coats looking as if they had been stolen from scarecrows.

At three o'clock on the seventh day from Saltzburg, and at the two hundred and eightieth mile, we saw Trieste lying below us with all its shipping and the free blue sea. After our tedious march of thirty days we sat down to contemplate the shipping and realize God's goodness and our freedom.



Then to carry out our old prison proverb, "Down the hill to Trieste," we marched with light hearts into the town to the British consul, and to our delight met Alison, quite recovered and in good spirits. We rigged ourselves out, and in three days started for Malta in an Austrian brig. We reached Malta in twenty days, and in two days more the Governor, the excellent Sir Alexander Ball, gave us passages home on board H.M.S. Lucifer.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—DRAWING RATIONS.

MAJOR-GENERAL STONEMAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERAL JUDSON KILPATRICK.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

OUR CAVALRY OFFICERS.

ON this page we publish portraits of four leading cavalry officers of the ARMY of the Potomac, Generals STONEMAN, PLEASONTON, BUFORD, and KILPATRICK. At the outbreak of the war cavalry was little thought of. General Scott pointedly discouraged its use. We have learned better since then; and now our cavalry is one of the most esteemed ARMS of the service, and its leaders among the most popular officers of the army.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE STONEMAN, head of the new Cavalry Bureau at Washington, was born in this State about the year 1826. He entered West Point in 1842, and, on graduating, was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the First Dragoons. He does not appear to have taken part in the Mexican war; but during the fifteen years of peace which ensued he acquired a high standing in his profession, and was deemed by his comrades an excellent cavalry officer. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed, on 9th May, 1861, Major in the Fourth Cavalry. In August of the same year, when M'Clellan undertook to create the Army of the Potomac, he was commissioned Brigadier-General, and took charge of a brigade. He was subsequently transferred to the cavalry arm of the service; and when the Army of the Potomac undertook the Peninsular Campaign he was appointed to the chief command of all its cavalry. His services during that campaign were conspicuous, and raised him high in public esteem. We believe that he went nearer to Richmond than any other man in the army. In the campaign in Maryland, and that under Burnside, he commanded a corps, giving continued satisfaction to the President and the people. Last spring he performed a feat which cast all the famous raids of the rebel Stuart into the shade. He rode round Lee's army, destroying their communications with Richmond, and some of his men actually went within two miles of the rebel capital. A dispute between General Hooker and General Stoneman for a time kept the latter in the back-ground; but as he has lately been appointed to the management of the new Cavalry Bureau at Washington he must continue to enjoy the favor and confidence of the Government.

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON, one of the most gallant cavalry officers in the army, was born in the District of Columbia about the year 1821, and is consequently about forty-two years of age. He graduated at West Point on 1st July, 1844, and entered the First Dragoons. In November, 1855, he was transferred to the Second Dragoons, and accompanied General Taylor on the expedition to Mexico. At Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma he distinguished himself, and was brevetted in consequence. He obtained his First Lieutenancy in 1849, and his company (in the Second Cavalry) in 1855. At the outbreak of the rebellion the resignation of Southern traitors left the way clear for his obtaining a Majority; and on 16th July, 1862, he was commissioned Brigadier-General of Volunteers. He was appointed to the Army of the Potomac, and served throughout the Peninsular campaign with distinction. When General Stoneman took the command of a division, before the battle of Antietam, General Pleasonton succeeded him in command of all the cavalry of the army, and discharged the duty of pressing on Lee's rear in his retreat. He has since filled various cavalry commands in that army with gallantry and success.

GENERAL JOHN BUFORD was born in Kentucky about the year 1827, but removed with his family to Illinois at an early age. He was appointed from that State to West Point, and graduated in 1848, engineering in the Second Dragoons as Second-Lieutenant. He served in his regiment until the outbreak of the rebellion, when he was transferred to the Inspector-General's Department, with the rank of Assistant Inspector-General. Last year he obtained permission to go on active service, and got a cavalry command in the Army of the Potomac, at the head of which he has greatly distinguished himself. We have illustrated his gallant charges on more than one occasion.

GENERAL BUFORD.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY ANTHONY.]

GENERAL PLEASONTON.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY ANTHONY.]

GENERAL JUDSON KILPATRICK was born in New Jersey about the year 1838, and is consequently about twenty-six years of age. He entered West Point in 1857, and graduated in 1861, entering the First Artillery within a week he was promoted to be a First Lieutenancy, and soon afterward obtained leave to accept a Lieutenant-Colonelcy of Volunteers. He was in the Army of the Potomac, and served throughout McDowell's and McClellan's campaigns, winning the confidence of his superiors and of his men. His capacity led to his selection to command a regiment of cavalry; and when Stoneman's great raid was undertaken he was given an command over one of the brigades. How well he discharged his duty—how daringly he rode through Virginia, destroying the rebel communications and threatening the rebel capital itself—every body still remembers. General Kilpatrick still has a large army command, and is likely to make his name still more famous before the war ends.

CHARLESTON.

We devote pages 536 and 537 to illustrations of the SIEGE OF FORT WAGNER, from drawings just received from thence. One large picture gives us a general view of the MORRIS ISLAND, showing Fort Wagner, Battery Gregg, General Gillmore's Works, his Camp, and Landing-Place, and Admiral Dahlgren's Iron-clad Fleet; other smaller designs illustrate our advanced works, Fort Wagner, hauling guns into position, mortar practice, etc., etc.

We have not received from work to week the progress of our work before Charleston. By way of explaining the large view of Morris Island we reprint the following extract from the Herald correspondence:

> Every morning ten or more of the iron-clads move up into position, and, at a distance of from one hundred and one hundred and seven hundred yards, and deliver their shot and shell into the rebel work. The Ironsides, Fort Wagner has within the week past become irregular, and almost every time the iron-clads attack it the firing from it ceases in half an hour or forty-five minutes after the commencement. Yesterday only one gun was observed upon the work, and no signs of another could any where be seen. The reason for this is plain enough to soldiers, it they have made some excellent practice. In the attack on Monday morning the guns that were fired from Fort Wagner, and both of them struck the Montauk, but, as usual, doing no damage. The firing then ceased, and the remainder of the day the fort was silent. The bolt, however, is expected to be fired by Battery Gregg (or Cumming's Point Battery) and Fort Sumter, from both of which excellent practice has been made. The latter is continually occupied by the iron-clads during an engagement they are within the range of Sumter; indeed, they have been fired at them from Fort Moultrie, and not failing very far short. The beach in front of Fort Wagner is cut and scooped up as though a party of navvies had been seeing how irregular they could make it look. The guns and general canonades of the fort look scarcely like any thing more than heaps of rocks, as their outlines are almost covered by dust and shell.
>
> Although a day more or less firing from the fort is yours, yet it must be nearly untenable, and the fire of the iron-clads for half an hour silenced it. Deserters, who were in the fort on the 18th of July, the day of the bombardment and storming, say that the explosion of the eleven-inch fifteen inch shell was frightful. Burying themselves in the sand, they exploded and simply shattered by throwing the earth high into the air and over every thing around.
>
> It is but proper to say the Montauk has been engaged more heavily and more often since she has been in existence, than any other iron-clad. Testimony to the effectiveness of her fire-arms is found in the fact that the executive officer of the Montauk, is known as one of the best shots in the world, and he rarely fires a gun unless the object upon which he sights his gun. It is thought he has not had a direct shot in the three weeks' duty of Morris Island.
>
> On James Island, over beyond Morris Island, and somewhat in the rear of Fort Johnson, are two new rebel batteries, which are now erected within the last ten days. The result of the firing upon Wagner has shown how probable it is that the rebels soon possess and occupy it, and these new batteries are for the purpose of an embracing fire. They are formidable as batteries, and, although they opened, throwing shot on Morris Island, and even near the iron-clads, They probably opened their fire in rage such, though of what caliber it is impossible to state.
>
> But General Gillmore is at work as well, and although by his efforts to possess all of Morris Island will soon be successful, the difficulty which he must yet encounter, and indeed since, will be superseded by works more extensive. Batteries covering up three hundred yards will not advance. Troops work if not entirely, will soon be completed. Already they are of such magnitude as to defy the wonder and admiration of all beholders. The front of the work runs parallel with the beach, and can not be less than seven hundred yards from Fort Wagner. It will not surprise some of you this week if Sunday, General Gillmore entirely discards Wagner and turns his attention to a more secure and feasible locality. His batteries, in the centre of Morris Island, cover any approach from James Island, if he is unable to make one from the mainland direct. The lower end of Morris Island is as busy as a work-shop in unloading from transporting guns, carriages, ammunition, and stores. On the shelving beach, under the bluffs, his men are working, and morning and evening advance the company drill and the dress parade. The whole extent of the island, from down to dock with the men and horses, who are accomplishing the work from which so much is hoped.
>
> From the new work a wheel has been built out upon the beach, affording a depth of water at high tide, and this has been constructed under the fire of rebel guns, as all the work has been done the landing on the island.

A letter of the 5th, published in the Times, contains the following:

> The preparations for renewing the attack on Fort Wagner are progressing as rapidly and favorably as could be desired. There is not an officer or private in the entire Department who has not a magazine of the fall of Fort Wagner on the removal of the assault. The same buoyant feeling is also shared by the naval officers, many of whom are positive in their belief that Charleston will be in our possession before the close of the summer months. Within the past three days General Gillmore has added numerous and heavy guns to his line of attack, and the unceasing toil day and night of the men upon the trenches indicates that work of a different character will soon commence. It would perhaps be superfluous to add that reinforcements have been added to Morris Island since the first fight, so that the strength of the enemy, when the next battle occurs, will be severely tested. Those reinforcements are greatly needed, as many of the soldiers who have long digging in the trenches and attending to other duties are completely worn-out from continued exposure and labor.
>
> The public may rest assured that the heavy ordnance now trained and to be trained on Forts Sumter and Wagner will be manned by men who have been educated to the business.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

OUT-OF-DOOR GAMESTER AND SUMMER SPORTING REGISTER.

Polostriviers.—A large assemblage is expected to witness a novel Wishing Match against time. An American lady has pledged herself to wish a bonnet in a less than two minutes.

Archery.—The shooting match for children under eight years of age is to commence in a few days. The targets will be provided with bull's eyes from the nearest sweet shops.

A lady, teaching in a ragged school one Sunday evening, was trying to impress on her class of young city Arabs the duty of thankfulness to Providence; and, to begin at the lowest and most tangible point, she called their attention to the pleasure of which in the course of the year they enjoyed the most. "Now, children, can any one mention anything, in her unsophisticated mind, the probable reply to her question, or, at the worst, the most pertinent dissertation upon the gustations of the school. The class, composed of ten or a dozen lads between seven and eight, was all very still for a moment in profound cogitation. Then the leader lifted his head, and the lady straight in him, and answered, "Cock-fightin', ma'am!"

An Irish piper, who now and then indulged in a glass too much, was accosted by a gentleman with—"Pat, what makes your face so red?" "Arrah, your Honor, I always blush when I spakes to gintlemen."

An unwilling lyrimen recently excused himself from singing by a letter, of which the following is a literal copy: "Sir,—As I am a Faurlaer and my lengwich Doncn I can not attail myselfe of the English to be agreich to be a jeury man and my cutious do not allow me to grive my opinion on wat I do not understan.—An answer vel oblegin.

ALL RIGHT.—A lady at sea, full of apprehension in a gale of wind, cried out unceasingly, "Captain, captain, we shall go to the bottom. Mercy on us, how my head aswims!" "Madam, don't be afraid of your head," said he, "you can never go to the bottom while your head aswims."

PRUDE.—A young warrior was observed to be seized with a sensation of shuddering when he saw a mouse. Being upon some one asked him what was the matter. "My flesh," replied he, "creeps at the thought of seeing a dangerous character my undaunted heart will certainly carry me."

"Never judge from manners," said Lord Byron, "for I once had my pocket picked by the civilest gentleman I ever met with."

One of the stories told by Mr. Gough of his experiences of the late war more than equals Sheridan's ride. It though it was not so much the misplaced H that hit him as that it was accompanied it. He was about to address a large audience on his favorite theme of temperance, and the committee, a very kind one, provided him with refreshments. Happening to recollect the miracle of Samson getting honey out of the lion's carcass, which he had slain in the Philistines, and thinking to turn it to account, the charitable lecturer said, "Gentlemen, I see the 'ouse to introduce to you the distinguished lecturer, Mr. John B. Gough, with which he has been regaled, and I recommend to you honey from the lion's mouth." Mr. Gough's audience knew how to appreciate a joke.

Tompkins considers that a brickies barrister ought never to be blamed: "for it is decidedly wrong to abuse a man without a cause.

An ill-bred fellow, who had suddenly risen to wealth by some profitable Government contracts, went to the opera, and stood in the pit. "Why," said he, "I must pay a man," whispered a wag; "he has so short a time been used to the luxury of a hat that he doesn't know when to take it off."

A LUCID EXPLANATION.—A gentleman on board a steamboat with his family, was asked by a stranger, "what boat with his family, was asked by a stranger, "what boat is that?" "That," he says, "is the name of the description of the machinery and its principles, to be followed by the name of the boat." "Thank you kindly," says down through that hole and fastens the jigger, and that connects with the crank-crosshead; and then that man—he's the engineer, you know—kind o' stirs up the fire-box-keeps the water from the priser, and they all shove along, and the boat goes ahead."

ADVERTISEMENT.—A gentleman with a few hours to spare will be happy to receive visits to any body who can't otherwise get a minute to himself.

HOW TO GET INTO A SCRAPE.—Shave with a blunt razor.

Why is a lovely young lady like a hinge?—Because she is something to adore.

Of all the dust thrown in men's eyes, gold dust is the most blinding.

Beefsteaks are very good things, but undoubtedly they sometimes need to be hauled over the coals.

"I feel the pelsit, but don't see the joke," as the sheep said to the fellow shearing it.

Of all the Fancy familiy the noblest is Percy Vere (perseverance), and the most cruel Percy Cute (persecute).

HORTICULTURE FOR LOVERS.—Watching the growth of affection.

A certain lady had been much annoyed by the ringing of her door-bell by the mischievous boys in the vicinity, and determined to be no more made a fool of by going to the door. In the course of her fortunes her mistress called to see her, dressed in his spruces manner; he answered the summons and gave the bell a terrific wrench, when the lady shouted from the entry, "I see you, boy; if I catch you I'll wring your neck!" The frightened gentleman immediately rushed down the steps, through a small crowd of young scamps, and has not called at that house since.

The heart, like a watchman, should confine itself to its regular beat.

A friend inquires whether a man can not vote by telegraph. This is a question for political wire-workers to solve. Our opinion is that it depends entirely upon the regulations of the poles.

THE NEW RIFLE MOVEMENT.

ARMS-BOUND VOLUNTEER. "Hallo, Gawky, my boy! what's all this about?"

INVALID DITTO (in gasps). "Oh, I—fact is—shooting the other day at—our Long Range—thought I'd try—Farquharson Position—made a centre, but—dislocated both my—shoulders—broken—concussion of the funny-bone and a crick in my neck ever since!"

For the benefit of the uninitiated we subjoin the practice referred to by our invalid friend:

"The Farquharson Position.'—Let a man lie down on his back, cross his legs, and place a rifle bolt into his hand somewhat, with the butt resting on his breast. Having done this, let him bring the left arm round the back of his head and take a hold of the rear of the rifle, the left elbow pressed against the head, somewhere on the right lobe, and the left hand at such a distance as shall suffice to fire a shot, by-the-way. If a man can do this, not as a gymnastic feat, but merely, so as to make bull's-eyes at 1000 yards in that remarkable attitude, he will be as clever as Mr. Farquharson.

A ten-year-old, who, though ungovernable, calls his father governor, asked his older sister, "Is the governor up yet, Mary?" "If you mean Papa, yes." "Well, then, tell him if he wants to speak to me about staying out late of a night, he had better come down and do so now, as I have got an appointment at ten o'clock to supper with the two Miss Sparkles! Be lively, there's a good girl!"

A deceased chief-justice once addressed a jury in the following model speech: "Gentlemen of the jury, in this case the counsel on both sides are unintelligible; the witness incredible; and the plaintiffs and defendants are both such d—d rascals, that I have not the least idea which way you give your verdict."

Among the Caffre agriculture is considered to be a kind of labor somewhat below slavery, and is therefore entirely left to the women. When they first saw a plow at work they gazed at it in astonished and delighted silence. At length one of them gave utterance to his feelings: "See how the thing turns the ground with its mouth! It is a more value than five wives!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AGENTS WANTED

To take orders for

Victor's History of the Rebellion.

The acknowledged standard, indorsed by the President, Cabinet, Members of Congress, Governors, Bancroft the historian, and Ex-Secretary Marcy. Two vols. now ready. Superbly illustrated with Steel Engravings. Sold by subscription only, and exclusive territory given. Canvassers make $50 to $100 per week. Send for circular of terms, &c.

EDWARD F. HOVEY, No. 13 Spruce St., N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at 6 Astor House, N. Y.

J. W. EVERETT & CO., METROPOLITAN PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE PURCHASABLE, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Tickets, Passage, Army Corps Badges, or any other articles procurable in the city.

We will forward, on receipt of 15 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, FREMONT, HOOKER, BANKS, BURNSIDE, HALLECK, HOWARD, SLOCUM, SICKLES; ADMIRALS FARRAGUT, FOOTE, DUPONT, or any of the leading Commanders in the Army and Navy.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PARLOR DOMINOES.
The excellent article, both for boiling meat, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive ivory article. We give the tedium of the Camp and the Hospital. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED,
$16,00
SINGLE BADGES,
15 cents

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

$ AGENTS WANTED.

5 MORE NEW ARTICLES now ready. For Catalogue and terms send stamp. RICE & CO., 27 Beekman St., N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing U. S. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers,
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night time perspective glasses, will often contribute to save or to hear him at from 2 to 6 miles. Possession of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the vision without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogue sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
669 Broadway, New York.

MES. MILOCK'S Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall Term opens Oct. 1st. For references inquire of Hon. WILGIN, A.M., Mount Hope Westchester Co., N. Y.

Phelan & Collender, Sole Manufacturers.

$15 Per Day Easy $15 And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unraveled, and valuable extra large Paper Fine Stationery, Recipes, and Yankee Notions Packages, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Buttons, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Ornaments, Household Conveniences, Many Thousands for Sale, Perfect Curiosities, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Perfect Collar-band, Patent Yankee Needle, all of which, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Designs, Curious Arts Advice, &c., &c., &c. The whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents, by mail. Wholesale rate to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 per cent profit allowed. Our Package Stock cannot be ever, simply, shown at the competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the largest and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up for Peddlers, Pedlers, Agents, Hawkers, Streetmen, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to all Parts of the world. Send for Circular. A Private Letter to Agents Writers, English Monetaries, and correct timepieces presented man to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. P. O. BOX 5,643. Address 107 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Print Package House in the World.

French (Solitaire) Patterns.

These fashionable goods are made of the finest Ivory, and brought to a polish of all colors, Black, Blue, Red, Blue, &c., and engraved with Initial Letters, old English, &c. Complete set $1 00, free by mail. Trade supplied.

JOHN F. PHELPS, 429 Broadway, New York.

N. Y. Medical College for WOMEN, Chartered 1863, and affording thorough Scientific Medical Education, begins Oct. 15th, 1863. For Pamphlet, address MRS. M. L. OSGOOD, M.D., 37 Lafayette Place, N. Y. City.

"RIDE A JACK HORSE," &c. The Original rhyme never contemplated that the rider was ever got to "Boston Corners," but the Patent Cantering Attachment by which any child away from horses can ride as well as the oldest and boldest equestrians. Sold by W. SMITH, No. 478 Broadway. Call or send for circular. Ladies, folks, and take a ride, or send stamp for illustrated circular.

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Window, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Glass Signs and Show Cards, of all kinds, Gilded and Painted. Office 167 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something urgently needed by every person. 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents. Address H. L. ALLEN, 512 Broadway, N. Y.

Family Sewing Machines, $5 to $15.

Warranted for three years. Highest premium ever produced. Novelty Machine Co., 442 Broadway, N. Y.

Proclamation.—500,000 Watches, Chains, Rings, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Goods, Daguerreotypes, &c., give all particulars. Agents wanted. Address A. J. H. & Co., 596 Broadway, or Box 5219, P. O., New York.

PLANTLETT supplies the NEEDLES for all SEWING MACHINES. Sends by Mail or Express everywhere. Also the renowned PLANTLETT NEEDLE, 150 for 25 cents. Depot, 442 Broadway, N. Y.

MRS. KEMBLE'S LIFE ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

"The Journal of Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble during her residence upon a plantation in Georgia as the wife of the proprietress, is the most intelligible and complete picture of the interior social life of the shrewdishing section in this country that has ever been published. Our previous accounts of that life have been derived from outside observers. But the Journal of Mrs. Kemble was jotted down from day to day in the midst of the plantation of which she was mistress. There is no excuse, no publication of facts, but the whole artless story of a lady who is describing before the eye. So faithful and final a witness we have not had. Even Uncle Tom's Cabin is only hundred upon feet. The Journal of Mrs. Kemble is fact itself."

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published:

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. Library Edition. Illustrated with portraits of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York; Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The best Popular Fairy Stories selected and rendered anew. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," &c., &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

ST. OLAVES. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50. Now ready. Vol. I.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the Author of "The Morals of May Fair," "Creole," "The World's Verdict," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches.....	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches.....	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Enamel Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops..	4 00 to 8 00 each.
5100 Gent's Breast Pins.....	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys.....	2 00 to 4 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Boson Studs.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Metal Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted	3 00 each.
Cases and Pencils.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on each Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 15 cts. for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate, 10 acre tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Relief sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and available condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Artificial Members of Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enamelled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags for the backs, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

455 Broadway, N. Y., or 105 William Street, N. Y.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers discharged for wounds, entitled to bounty, we send our Hand-Book of Information and Instruction, with Lists of Prizes, by enclosing stamp, with stamp to pay return postage. SOMES, BROWN & CO., 2 Park Place, New York, and 464 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

$75 PER MONTH guaranteed. Testimonials of clergymen and scientific men sent free. ISAAC HALE, Jr. & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—No stockin-trade required except those found in every household; profit $100 per cent; demand made at door. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address O. MUNRO, BROWN & CO., No. 74 Bleecker Street, N. Y.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals.
Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's pay, $30; Civilian's, $90. Send for a Circular. J. W. WESTON, Agt., 491 Broadway, N. Y.

Diarrhœa, Dysentery, &c.

Immediate and certain cure. HEGEMAN & CO'S HERBAL RADICAL REMEDY, which has been used with unfailing success since the cholera of 1849. Fifty cents per bottle. Sold by druggists. Prepared only by HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 303, 299, 511, and 756 Broadway, and corner 7th Street and 4th Avenue.

Piles! Piles! Piles!

Dr. Wilfrid's Vegetable Pills are a certain cure for Blind and Bleeding Piles. The worst cases yield after one or two boxes. No nauseous nor external application should be resorted to; such treatment only aggravates the disease. Testimonials from ladies and gentlemen of the highest respectability can be seen at the Office. Price 50 cents per box. Sent by mail to any part of the country. Sold at all the druggists, and by the proprietor, J. WILFRID, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

New and important Book for all Army Officials.

THE ARMY PAY DIGEST and Ready Calculator, or Regimental Pay Tables, compiled and arranged by Major Ezra Webb, Ottawa, Ohio. Price $2 00. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Just published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway, N. Y.

MEEKS' CABINET FURNITURE

WAREROOMS,

No. 699 BROADWAY,

AND

333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE now ready.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

PORTABLE

Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 81 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

Have you Seen the New Singing Book?

"THE HARP OF JUDAH,"

By L. O. Emerson, author of the "Golden Wreath," &c.

Get it—Look at it—Try it.

Specimen pages sent free. Price of the "Harp," $1. Per dozen, $9. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 15, and $25. Prices of an Office, with Press, $15, 20, 25, and $45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

To Arms! To Arms!—The Citizen Soldier will find a means ready for use in the fight, speedily water and damp night air than in the most determined enemy. HOLLOWAY'S PILLS so purify the blood and strengthen the stomach and bowels that the soldier can endure these hardships and still be strong and healthy. Only 25 cents per box.

WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet mailed, post-paid, for 25 cts. containing exact copies of advertisements for persons cured of impotency. Address or apply to HENRY HAVS, 659 Broadway, N. Y. Code of arms finely polished and engraved.

Duryea's Maizena

TRY ONE POUND.

TRY ONE POUND.

Was the only "Preparation for food from Indian Corn"

that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, with few or no eggs. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages.

For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Wholesale Depot 166 Fulton Street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

Attention, Soldiers!

J.A. MILLER

C.B.

5TH N.Y.V.

In solid 18 k. gold, $3 50.

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

The merits of Brandreth's Pills are often Life saving. They purify the blood, and thus supply health to every organ. They restore the elasticity of the stomach and bowels when injured by costiveness or other causes.

In Bilious Affections, Rheumatism, Debility, Sallowness, Worms, Piles, Costiveness or Looseness (even the Summer Complaint of Children), will all be cured by this medicine, which will not sicken, nor the fetor of the breath betray the weakness out. Get Brandreth's Pills and you will be, as a rule, safe.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 294 CANAL STREET.

Sold at 4 Union Square, and by all Dealers.

REMEMBER NEW STYLE INSURES THE GENUINE.

A GREAT BOOK FOR AGENTS!

DR. RANDALL'S new work on SHEEP HUSBANDRY, recently announced as in preparation, is now in press, and will be published early in Sept. It is entitled THE PRACTICAL SHEPHERD, and must prove the BEST AND MOST COMPLETE practical work on the subject ever published in America. The demand for a good Sheep Book is great, and this one is designed to supply it fully. Its sale must be immense in all parts of the country where sheep are kept. The book will be furnished to Agents on such terms that they can not fail to make money rapidly by its sale. Entire exclusive territory secured to Agents, and orders will attend to the business thoroughly. For circulars containing terms and other particulars, address

D. D. T. MOORE,
Eureka Steam New Yorker, Rochester, N. Y.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and falling of the hair; entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using Sterling's Ambrosia. My hair was short, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five inches further in length—that has let down resulting to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

MRS. L. A. BROWN, No. 608 Broadway, New York.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.

Sold by Druggists generally. Principal Depot No. 493 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 235 Broadway, Medal's Building, cor. Worth Street. Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Agents Wanted.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—No ointment will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

To Consumptives.—I shall the New Song, "HOME AND ONE TO CONSUMPTIVES." Price 25 cents. For sale at all Music Stores, or mailed, postpaid, on receipt of the price, by HENRY TOLMAN & CO., 291 Washington St., Boston.

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! The whole especially deserving public attention at this time is their celebrated

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR USE BY LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of half dozen, $60. By mail, $1 05 for postage; if registered, 70 cents additional. A safe delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the case.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING CASE WATCH FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for use and reliable are ever offered. It has the interior all and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering it self-entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action movement, and is warranted as accurate timekeepers. Price, in a handsome jeweled silver case, only $35. By mail, postage 30 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Our Watches are novelties, and can be produced by no other house. Wherever offered they meet the most hearty approval, and always generally meet the entire every portion of the country. The lives of this and neighboring cities essentially contribute to our success.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, July 25.

"The prettiest and most reliable Watches in the market."—Courier, June 8.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Public Journal and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"Superbly finished Watches: keep accurate time in all climates."—N. Y. Herald, July 7.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Sentinel, American.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—Illustrated Times, Jan. 24.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg Chronicle, July 27.

☞ TERMS CASH IN ADVANCE! Money can be sent by mail or Express. If by Express or mail, in a registered letter at our risk. Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St., N. Y. ☞ Established 1840. ☜ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

ATTENTION!

THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

4317 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $20. Trade list sent free. Address

J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

J. HAVEN'S PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Tourists, Sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from 37 cents to $7. Simple cost free on receipt of $1 25. Send stamp for circular. The fine wholesome fresh breeze it sway from the face, and the shot elastic, or string, keep it down all round. It don't affect the heating or sleeping, and is worth three times its price. J. HAVEN & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, as no Rights or Licenses have been sold. No 30 Nassau St., N. Y. Room No. 33. Agents wanted in all parts.

$1 WATCHES $1 AND JEWELRY.

The only chance offered to get good jewelry for One Dollar, and get what you want. Send 20 cents for blank certificate and catalogue, giving the name of every article, and a description of the watches.

H. BLISSE & CO., 83 & 84 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, for $1875. Price $2500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

EMPLOYMENT.

Agents, Male and Female, wanted everywhere, at $125 per day, to sell $1 75 worth of staple goods for 75 cents. Every family will buy. Sells at sight. Wonderful! Guarantees you the largest Yankee Notion FANCY GOODS and Stationery Prize Package in the World. Largest five quality Writing Paper, 30 Envelopes, over one dollar's worth of Jewelry and Yankee Notions; three new elegant Gift of new and fashionable Jewelry, valued from 99 cents to $50. Retail price of package $1. Sent to Agents, you can double the money you invest every day. We pay every article you sell. Sample package sent for one dollar. Address

RICHARDS & CO., 377 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y.

N. B. No connection with parties assuming similar names.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year.....	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....	5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $5 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years.....	5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Not more than Four lines for Single, and One Dollar per line for each Advertisement.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

JEFF DAVIS'S LAST APPEAL TO ARMS.

"Fellow Citizens—the Victory is within your reach. You need but STRETCH FORTH YOUR HANDS TO GRASP IT."—(Address of Jeff Davis to his Soldiers.)

Dr. B. C. Perry,

49 Bond Street, takes this occasion to inform the Public that he will be absent from New York during the month of August. He will return, the first of September, to the city, and resume his practice. During his absence, all communications should be addressed No. 12 Avon Place, Boston, Mass.

Attention, Army and Navy!

50,000 Agents Wanted.

Army Corps and Division Pins.

American Watch Chains, Engraved Spring Lockets, Guard and Neck Chains, Bracelets, Seal Stone, Masonic, California Diamond, Plain and Chaced Rings, Fine Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, Gents' Fine Gold California Diamond Pin and Cluster Pins with Chain attached, Coral, Opal, Lava, Mosaic, and Jet Enamelled Brooches and Ear Rings, Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, a Solid Silver Shield or either Corps or Division Pin, with your Name, Co., and Regiment handsomely engraved upon it. I will send to any one, on the receipt of $1, either of the above articles, together with my wholesale circular to Agents.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhea, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.

They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE A CO.,
202 Broadway, New York.

National Union League.

League Pins in Silver Plate, Fine Gold Plate, and Solid Silver, price from $2 50 to $12 per doz. Sample doz. sent by mail pre-paid, upon receipt of $5 00, or a single pin in fine gold plate upon receipt of $1 00. Our assortment is very fine. Many of our designs have been adopted by different organizations throughout the country. Also a complete assortment of Army Corps Badges.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,
Manufacturers Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE For 30 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

A Beautiful Complexion, free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of palm oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

H. P. FETRIDGE & CO., 31 and 33 Dey Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

GUNS, PISTOLS,
Military Goods,

French and English Fancy Goods.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Important to Soldiers.

Patent Spring "Eyelet Hook" for fastening the soldier's Rubber Blanket. By their use a double breasted overcoat, with sleeves, is formed, completely defying wind and rain.

Every soldier should possess a set. Once fastened, they can not be lost.

Head-Quarters Army of the Potomac, May 27th, 1863.

I have examined the Patent Eyelet Hook, and have a very high opinion of its utility. Believing that it would be of great value to the troops, I recommend that authority be granted to introduce it into this Army. RUFUS INGALLS,
Brig.-Gen. and Chief Q. M. Army of Potomac.

Approved by command of Major-General HOOKER.
S. Williams, A.A.G.

One set of Hooks sent to any address, free, on receipt of One Dollar. A discount of 20 per cent. to parties ordering one dozen sets and upward. Address FERGUSON & BALCH, Importers of Watches, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, John B. Robinson, late Pratt, Robinson & Co., 190 William St., N.Y.

The American Parlor Or Floor Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axles.
Frederick Stevens,
215 Pearl Street, New York.
68 Kilby Street, Boston.

DR. C. S. SEA, M.D., with 35 years' success—Rooms for Non-residents.
268 North Bond Street, Baltimore, Md.

$22. WATCHES. $22.

A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.

$22. Genuine. $22.

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates.

All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
208 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED for our Splendid New Mammoth Eureka Prize Package. 200 per cent. profit. Superb Watch free to Agents. $18 per day made. Send for New Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 40 Ann St., N.Y.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

The American Watch Company give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm. Ellery, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.

Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 38 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

STAMMERING.

Cured by Bates' Patent scientific appliances the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering, Stuttering, &c. They took the Prize Medal at the last London Exhibition.

For (new Edition of) Pamphlets and Drawings describing the same, address H. C. L. MEARS, 277 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 5076.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY
REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Selpho's Patent, 516 Broadway, N. Y., are the best substitutes for lost limbs the World of Science has ever invented. (Established 24 years.) Send for Pamphlet. Soldiers supplied.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.

10 COLLARS
FOR 40 CENTS.

6 for $12
6 for 15
6 for 18
6 for 21

Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.

THE GENUINE
CLOTH-LINED
PAPER COLLAR,
At Wholesale and Retail.

Gents Furnishing Goods.

I have the largest and best selected stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars wholesale and retail.

SHIRTS
MADE TO ORDER,

The pride of my establishment. In this department, I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always enabled to give work that will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.

NO FIT! NO SALE!

Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on

CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
Lafarge block. 675 Broadway, N. Y.

Wanted, at $15 per Day.

We want energetic Agents and reliable Canvassers for a genteel business, at a commission of from $5 to $15 per day. No humbug! Address C. M. DUNN & CO., Publishers, at Cincinnati, O., Chicago, Ill., or 135 Reade St., N.Y.

WATCHES FREE.

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. See "15 per day Easy" on inside page.

S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER.

UNRIVALED
In Manufacture,
Fitting, and Material.
At UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to dealers.

Agents wanted throughout the country.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF Blotches on the Body, L.Y.D.S.

Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S

YELLOW DOCK SYRUP,

Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Channel, Joint, and Limb.

One Dollar per Bottle (which often cures).

Depot, 130 CHATHAM St., N. Y. Sold 502 GRAND St.

Ask for LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1848. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses, a charming and perfectly natural color for the cheeks, or lips. Will not wash off, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with vinegar, and warranted not to injure the skin. Mailed free from observation for one dollar and 18 cts.

HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 S. Seventh St., Philad.

CONSCRIPTS!

Substitutes for $1 75. How and where to get them. Address, with stamps for return postage,

Capt. S. B. OULDS, Box 826, Haverhill, Mass.

"Noses Illustrated."

THE AUGUST DOUBLE Number PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, contains Noses of Americans, English, Irish, French, German, Hungarians, Russians, Indians, Negroes, &c.; portraits and characters of General Meade, Commodore Foote and Cobbett, with thirty illustrated engravings on Ethnology, Physiology, Phrenology, and Physiognomy—new volume. Only 15 cents, by first post, or $1 50 a year. FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published:

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

"Romola" is a performance of which no other woman of genius among us would have been capable than precisely George Eliot.—The Reader (London).

There are noble things to be found in "Romola," which will make the reader's heart burn within him. It will be scarcely possible to rise from the perusal without being penetrated by the "joy of elevated thoughts," without feeling a desire to cease from a life of self-pleasing, and to embody in action that sense of obligation, of obedience to duty, which is, indeed, the crowning distinction that has been conferred on man, the high gift in which all others culminate. This is high praise; and a work that can produce this effect, if only on a single reader, has not been written in vain.—The Athenæum (London).

Such an intellectual study, to use an artist's phrase, as "Tito Melema," has not been placed before the world in this generation; and we know not which to wonder at most, the accuracy of the anatomical knowledge displayed, or the art with which that knowledge is infused—there is no other fitting word—into the reader's mind. Shakespeare might have exulted in Tito.—Spectator (London).

George Eliot has Sir Walter Scott's art for revivifying the past, but not Scott's dynamical force in making you plunge into it with as headlong an interest as into the present. For this she compensates by a deeper and wider intellectual grasp. * * It is marvelous that the wide and calm imaginative power of the writer should have produced a work which is likely to be permanently identified with English literature, in which Italy and England may feel a common pride. * * The great and concentrated interest of the book—at least after the wonderful development of Tito's character—is the portrait of Savonarola, which it is almost impossible not to feel as faithful as history as it is great as romance. * * His portrait evinces almost as great a graphic power, and far more scrupulous care, than Sir Walter Scott used in those pictures of the various Stewarts.—Spectator (London).

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 348.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

REAR-ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

We publish on this page a portrait of REAR-ADMIRAL FARRAGUT, the hero of the day, from a photograph just taken by Mr. BRADY.

DAVID GLASGOW FARRAGUT was born near Knoxville, Tenn., about the year 1803, and is now sixty years of age. His father was an officer in the army, well known to and much esteemed by General JACKSON. When only nine years of age little David determined to be a sailor, and was taken by Commodore PORTER on board the Essex as midshipman. He shared the fortunes of that famous craft in her memorable cruise in the Pacific, and took part in the battle off Valparaiso. A person who is familiar with the facts tells the following story of the boy's behavior on that occasion:

He was ordered by the Commodore, while the contest was at its height, to go below and bring up some friction-tubes that were needed for the guns. While descending the wardroom ladder the captain of the gun directly opposite was struck full upon the face by an 18-pounder shot. He fell back against FARRAGUT, and they both tumbled down the hatchway. The man was a stout, heavy fellow, and it was fortunate for the young midshipman that his full weight did not fall upon him as they reached the deck. As it was, the lad was severely stunned; and recovering, as if awakening from a dream, he ran upon deck. Commodore PORTER, seeing him covered with blood, inquired,

"Are you wounded?"

"I believe not," was the reply.

"Then where are the tubes?" asked the Commodore.

The words brought him to his senses, and he immediately went below and got them.

When at last it was determined to surrender the brave little brig the Commodore sent FARRAGUT to throw overboard the signal-book, in order that the enemy should not come into possession of our code, it being reported that the signal-master could not be found. After a protracted search the lad discovered the book upon the sill of one of the ports, and at once threw it overboard. A few minutes afterward the recreant signal-master appeared, and excused himself for being absent from his post by stating that he had been over the side to extricate the book from the wreck, where it had lodged; but the falsehood cost him dearly.

During all this time young FARRAGUT bore himself like a man, never shedding a tear until he saw the American colors hauled down, and then he sobbed like a child. From this hearty grief he was soon aroused, however, by hearing an English middy exclaim by way of taunt, "Prize-oh, boys! here's a fine grunter, by Jove!" He knew the young reefer alluded to a young porker that had been petted by himself and all the sailors, and had helped to topsle away many a weary hour; therefore he energetically laid claim to the animal. "But," said the Englishman, "you're a prisoner, and your pig too." "We don't respect private property," said FARRAGUT, and he seized the squealing bone of contention, asserting that he should retain possession until compelled to yield to superior force. Here was sport for the older officers, who called out, "Go it, little Yankee; and if you can thrash 'Shorty' (a sobriquet for English midshipmen) you shall have your pig." "Accord," said FARRAGUT; and the lads went at it in pugilistic style. "Shorty" soon failed to come to time, and the victor walked off with the pig under his arm. He afterward remarked that he felt, in mastering the young Englishman, that he had wiped out the disgrace of being captured.

On another occasion he was placed in command of a prize-vessel, when only thirteen years of age. The original captain of the prize became very turbulent, and threatened to interfere with the navigation of the ship. FARRAGUT reported him accordingly to the Essex, upon which the man accused himself by saying that he only meant to "frighten the boy."

"Ask him, Sir," replied FARRAGUT to his captain, "how he succeeded."

The boy resumed command of the prize and took her safely into port.

At the close of the war young FARRAGUT was sent to school, and thence into the navy. His life, for the next forty years, was the usual routine of a sailor's life in peace-time, with its alternations of sea and shore duty, furlough and foreign station. He spent some time in South America, and, it is believed, took part in some of the revolutionary contests which are indigenous to that continent. He married, too, his wife being a Southern lady, and settled at Norfolk, Virginia, where he purchased some little property. The rebellion found him living there, surrounded by Southerners whose sympathies were all with the rebels. How he left Norfolk the following extract from the Times tells:

On the 18th of April he left Norfolk, just the night before the Navy-yard was burned, and no better proof of his loyalty can be given than the fact of the premeditated attack upon the Navy-yard at Norfolk being kept a secret from him. The morning before leaving Norfolk he was expressing very decidedly his opposition to the course of the Southern people, when he was told by some of the leading rebel naval officers, residents of the place, that he could not remain there with such sentiments. "Then I will go where I can live with just such sentiments," was his reply; and he accordingly went home and notified his family that they must get ready to leave for New York in a few hours. He arrived in Baltimore to learn that the track had been torn up the day before, and had great difficulty in getting a passage for himself and family in a canal-boat. This was accomplished, however, after a few hours' delay, and they managed to arrive safely at New York. He immediately sought a cottage at Hastings, upon the Hudson, in which to place his family, removed from the excitement of the times, so that he could be assured of their safety when he was called upon to go forth and battle for his country. With that same frankness of feeling and devotion that he possessed when a midshipman on board the Essex he obeyed the call. Had ADMIRAL FARRAGUT remained in Norfolk one day longer he would have been imprisoned, as was the fate of one Union officer, to whose disgrace be it said, that, after remaining a few hours in prison, he yielded to the Southern coercionists and joined their navy. The Admiral says he does not deserve so much credit for his prompt action in this matter, as, having had so much experience in the revolutionary countries of South America, he was well posted as to what might be expected from revolutionary times.

We believe that his anger at the loss of the Merrimac was freely expressed to every one he met, and that he told the Government that he (FARRAGUT) could have saved her, and would have done so had he received orders, even if the effort had cost the whole town of Norfolk. There is only too much reason to believe that one man of FARRAGUT's nerve might have saved us the Merrimac and the Navy-yard, the consequences of which upon the course of the war can hardly be overestimated.

For some months after the outbreak of the war Captain FARRAGUT was without a command, partly because the Department had no vessels. At length, when the expedition against New Orleans was resolved upon, he was selected to lead it. He entered the Mississippi River early in March, 1862. On 17th April DUPONT'S ocean tar-fleet began the bombardment of Forts Philip and Jackson, and on 24th Commodore FARRAGUT, with his entire fleet, ran past the forts, encountering a fire almost unparalleled in severity, a fleet of gun-boats, including several iron-clads, fire-rafts, obstructions and torpedoes innumerable. An idea of the brilliancy of the exploit may be formed from the fact that some French and English officers, who had been in New Orleans, laughed outright at the bare notion of running the batteries, and indulged in characteristic sneers at the insanity of the project. Commodore GOLDSBOROUGH first heard the news from a newspaper correspondent, who boarded the Minnesota at Fortress Monroe, on his way north with dispatches. The conversation is said to have run somewhat in this wise:

REAR-ADMIRAL DAVID G. FARRAGUT, U.S.N.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

REPORTER. "Commodore, I have the pleasure of informing you that Commodore FARRAGUT has run past Forts Philip and Jackson with his fleet, and taken New Orleans."

COMMODORE. "Run past the batteries?"

REPORTER. "Yes, Sir."

COMMODORE. "It's not true, Sir—it's a lie! It couldn't be done."

And ceri Commodore in great wrath.

It was done, however, as every one knows; and at a late hour on 25th April, 1862, the Commodore anchored off the city of New Orleans, and sent word ashore that all rebel flags must come down.

From that time to the present the Admiral (for he was immediately promoted to that rank) has been intensely active. He has run almost every rebel battery on the Mississippi, silenced a large number, and only left the river when there were no more to silence. The part he took in the reduction of Port Hudson was most important. He came here, in fact, when his work was done; and in the hope that the Administration would find him new fields of glory.

Of all our naval commanders he ranks, without question, as the first—the naval hero of the war.

His arrival here was a scene of great excitement. A crowd assembled to welcome him; the foreign consuls came on board the forts thundered glad salutes, which were grimly returned by the old Hartford; the city tendered him civic hospitalities; the Governor sent for him to thank him personally for what he had done for his country. If any man should feel proud at this day it is DAVID G. FARRAGUT.

One who knows him well writes of him:

From his childhood Admiral FARRAGUT has been remarkably self-reliant and determined, and although of very amiable disposition, never would consent that others should do for him what he could perform for himself. This dutsby is a decided trait in his character. When out on service he has always been a student, and while in foreign ports never neglected to acquire the language of the people. At one time he spoke the Spanish, French, Italian, and Arabic with great fluency—the latter language he studied when he was eighteen years of age, during a residence of nine months in Tunis. In connection with the Arabic the following anecdote is related. On approaching some islands in the Mediterranean, the Captain of the ship remarked on deck that he did not know how they were to converse with the people, as they had no interpreter. A dark-looking boat came alongside with some of the natives, and an officer replied, "Captain, we have an officer on board who seems to speak all languages intuitively; he is doubtless in league with the 'old boy;' but suppose you send for him, and see if he can not communicate with these people." So Lieutenant FARRAGUT was called for, and told in a peculiar manner that he must show if what he was accused of was true. He looked into the boat, and seeing an old Arabian woman, immediately commenced conversing, and transacted for the ship all the business. To the surprise of all on board, the Lieutenant Farragut did not tell them that it was Arabic he was speaking, and so he kept up the deception for some time, amused to hear them often repeat "that he was indebted to the devil for such a gift."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1863.

THE DRAFT.

THE "revolution in the North" which, in the opinion of the journalists at London and Richmond, was to counterbalance our successes on the Mississippi and the retreat of Lee, is at an end. The draft has been, or is being, enforced every where, including the city of New York, and there is no longer any question as to whether the people will submit to it. Within a fortnight from this time all the drafted men will either have taken their place in the armies of the Union, or have paid their $300 to Government.

The notion that the people of the United States would not submit to be drafted was the last plank in which the enemies of the Union clung. It was realized at Richmond and in England that, with our present vantage-ground, the suppression of the rebellion was a mere question of time, if only we could keep our armies up to a proper numerical strength. Hence the hysterical delight of the Richmond papers over the draft-riot in New York, and the ponderous disquisitions of the London press upon the impossibility of enforcing a conscription among the Northern masses. In this, as in so many other cases, the wish was father to the thought; but the event has disappointed both.

We shall commence the Fall campaign with our armies fully recruited to the war standard, and with such advantages over the enemy in point of numbers, material of war, position, prestige, and experienced leadership as to render our success reasonably certain. Mobile, Charleston, and Chattanooga ought to be in our hands before Christmas.

And—what is scarcely of less importance—we shall have made a precedent for all future time that may save us many a war. No politician of any standing will dare hereafter to petition the right of the Government to the armed service of all citizens; and foreign nations which quarrel with us will understand that they have to deal with a Power which can place five millions of soldiers in the field.

PROGRESS OF PUBLIC OPINION.

THE election of Mr. Bramlette as Governor of Kentucky by a majority of some 50,000 or more may be considered as settling the disputed question as to the opinion of that State on the issues of the day. Notwithstanding the President's proclamation, and notwithstanding the fact that almost every large household in Kentucky has some young member or friend in the rebel army, the majority against secession and in favor of Union is unprecedented in the electoral history of the State. It is true that the successful candidate, Mr. Bramlette, declared himself opposed to the emancipation proclamation. But he just as decidedly declared himself opposed to all unconstitutional or revolutionary opposition to any law of Congress or legitimate act of the Executive; and he pledged himself merely to seek the reversal of the policy of the President by peaceful constitutional action. In view, therefore, of the probable anti-slavery majority in the House and the decided anti-slavery majority in the Senate, to say nothing of the well understood anti-slavery views of the President, we may fairly infer that Mr. Bramlette, the Governor elect of Kentucky, is prepared to yield a cheerful acquiescence to the anti-slavery policy of the Government, as soon as he ascertains that he can not reverse or alter it by peaceful constitutional opposition. And this, we look, is very considerable success. When the war began the Kentucky Senators and the Governor, together with so many of the people that Generals Sherman and Anderson pronounced them decided upon by, were on the side of the rebellion. After he war had commenced Kentucky wanted to be neutral, and ratified the General Government not to invade her territory. After a year of war Kentucky took her side squarely, if not ardently, on the side of the Union. And now, within a year more, she will have a Governor, who, though naturally opposed to abolition, has nevertheless placed himself upon the record as ready to acquiesce in the emancipation policy of the Government. The next step in the progress will be a peremptory demand for abolition by the people of the State. This will probably be in another year.

Missouri is about twelve months ahead of Kentucky. Before the war, though St. Louis contained a number of far-seeing merchants who saw that the real question was the future settlement of the State was as unequivocally proslavery as that of South Carolina. It was from Missouri that the Southern Confederacy, which proposed to force slavery on Kansas with fire and sword. No more ardent advocates of slavery ever went to Washington than Atchison and Green. When the war began the Legislature of Missouri was not only devoted to slavery, but was so closely allied in sentiment to the other slave State Legislatures that it was only by force that it could have had to take St. Louis and Jefferson City as we took Nashville and Memphis. After the proclamation of Fremont the anti-slavery sentiment made great progress, especially among the Germans, and a Governor was elected—Mr. Gamble—who, though far from being an abolitionist, believed that there were other interests in Missouri besides slavery. When Congress adopted the President's recommendation to pay for emancipated slaves the anti-slavery impulse in Missouri received a further impulse, and a Convention was held in June last, at which it was determined to abolish slavery in eight years. This resolution, which would have subjected Missouri to monstrous three years ago, has not satisfied the people of Missouri. They are not content to wait eight years for immediate and valuable pay for land. Accordingly another Convention will be called by the next Legislature, which will undoubtedly abolish slavery at once. This is very fair progress.

In Maryland the development of anti-slavery views has not, as yet, made its appearance on the surface of the political arena. But the tone of leading newspapers, and the fact that almost a large slaveholder the other day had his entire stock assessed at $5 a head—indicate plainly enough that within a year or two the Maryland will, of her own free action, put an end to the incubus of slavery.

It is possible that the Border States, rapidly as they are improving public sentiment, may yet be outstripped in the race toward freedom by some of their more Southern sisters. The great institution of slavery, so economic and productive institution, is complete on the sea-coast of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in nearly half of Virginia, in more than half of Louisiana, and in the Mississippi Valley. No other system of labor has yet been substituted. In some localities all the adult male negroes are taken to the army, and the crops are hired out, sometimes by their old masters. But as a general rule, wherever slavery has been abolished by military rule chaos has succeeded, and desolation and poverty. It is, in fact, obvious that this state of things can not last long. An intelligent and industrious nation of twenty-five millions of whites will not long permit fertile land to lie idle when cotton is worth 65 cents, sugar 8 cents, and tobacco 18 cents. Sooner or later pride, prejudice, and passion will yield to the dictates of interest, and attempts will be made to reorganize labor. There have already been such attempts, spasmodic and partial, in Louisiana. When the full campaign has firmly secured to us the entire productive area of that State, together with the western part of Mississippi, and the valleys of Arkansas, we may feel assured that those attempts will be renewed, and on a general plan. This will be General Banks's work. And there are those among his friends who are not without the hope that, as early as next winter, a delegation of regularly-elected Congressmen from Louisiana will present themselves at Washington with a free State Constitution in their hand, and a platform of principles which will render them co-workers with the delegations from Massachusetts and Illinois.

For the world will keep moving. Here, in the great commercial metropolis, where every man who is not engrossed in making money is engrossed in spending it, we have timid descendants of Gallieo Judges, who deafen us with daily eulogies of slavery as it was, and denounce all progress as the work of the devil, or the logic radical—which means the same thing. But the world does not stop for their croaking, and planters in Louisiana and Mississippi, when placed in the dilemma of choosing between free negro labor on the one hand, and no labor at all on the other, will not feel much sympathy with Northern politicians who are so enamored of slavery that they would rather see planters starve than negroes free.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESIDENT.

The practical sagacity of the President is daily justified. His impulses are wiser than the wary plans of more cunning men. It is true that, in writing the letter to the Albany Committee, he was plainly accused in some quarters of want of dignity. But both the resolution to write and the time of writing were most happy illustrations of his shrewdness, while the letter itself is unanswerable, and will henceforth be a constituent part of the body of Constitutional law. Indeed, the whole tone of Governor Seymour are not less excellent in their way.

In fact, from the moment of his inauguration it will appear that he has fulfilled every duty of his great office with an ability not less remarkable than his boldness. The desperate effort to make him seem to be a partisan has utterly failed. He has aimed only at the maintenance of the Government and its laws, and he has at no moment hesitated to adopt a policy which his own party approved when he has to take measures which the party opposed with applause. He has shown the chief posts of command with men of all political views. Yet he has been most sharply denounced from the beginning by no less a party than by his own party friends than enemies. The consequence is, that, at this moment, he stands a little outside of all parties even among his own men. The rebels, and their tools the Copperheads, of course, hate him. The War Democrats distrust him some parts of his party. The Conservative Republicans think him too much in the hands of the radicals; while the radical Republicans think him too slow, yielding, and half-hearted. And yet, without doubt, the more thoughtful and patriotic men of all parties can not but see how consistently wise his whole course as President to be named to-morrow they would declare for Mr. Lincoln.

So calm in his temperament, and so patriotic his policy, that the emancipation act from his hands could not seem, and never has seemed, to be a partisan movement from the beginning he did not doubt the right of emancipation as a military measure. But he carefully declared the object of the war to be the maintenance of the Government. When Frémont and Hunter issued their orders he quietly revoked them, not, as he said, because such measures were not right, but because in his view the time for them had not come, and when it came, he must exercise the power. When it did come, he issued the rebels last September that he had never doubted the possible military necessity might arise; that a military measure so grave and so long debated should be momentarily stopped; that he admonished them, if they feared the consequences of such a measure, to escape them by submission to the laws; and that if they did not submit within a time months the measure would become a part of the policy of the Government.

The rebels and their allies the Copperheads organized. The disastrous failure of M'Clellan's and Pope's campaigns, with the retirement of Lee in good order to the Potomac, the destruction of the autumn, and the removal of M'Clellan, dispirited many and disaffected others. So the war, the consequences were seen in the elections. Mr. Horatio Seymour is a specimen of the result. But the President stood firm. The emancipation act, he saved, if at all, by a policy which was not approved by the virtual friends of the rebellion. The opposition of such men as Mr. Seymour and his managers was the conclusive argument for that policy. Therefore, on the 1st of January, the order of emancipation was issued, and it proved effective on that day as slaves within specified limits were freed.

To that order, and the policy which dictated it, every sincerely loyal man accedes. For it was clearly not an act of the President, as a partisan Republican, but as Commander-in-Chief, sworn to defend the Government by every military resource. The loyal men who sustain it to-day are of all the political parties which existed in all shades of opinion in regard to Slavery The order was not issued by the Commander-in-Chief, nor is it supported by the loyal country, because slavery is wrong, but because it helps the enemy. Doubtless the conviction that it is the root of the war has made many assent with more sincerity to the act of emancipation; but the President adopted it as a military act, not as a moral movement. The way in which it was done, and the time, are both indications of the practical wisdom of the Chief Magistrate.

History will vindicate the President, even if our impatience should be unjust to him. It will show that succeeding to the executive head of the Government at a moment of most complicated military and political peril, and when national salvation seemed almost impossible, he displayed such simplicity, earnestness, honesty, patience, and sagacity—neither overwhelmed by disaster, nor confounded by treachery, nor disquieted by the disquiet of friends—that he may be truly called a Providential man.

OUR GOVERNOR.

If we were to speak of Mr. Seymour in the language of the current, we should say that his favorite performer Heratius had undertaken his celebrated equestrian act of daring in simultaneously riding two horses, the well-known old Roadster-War-Democracy and the vicious young filly Copperhead. As they go in different directions, the point of interest is the fate of the rider.

If it should be roundly asserted that Mr. Seymour is a rebel, there might be a plausible denial made. If it should be said that he is not heartily loyal, that also might and would be denied; but not plausibly. His last year's elaborate accusation of the free States as responsible for the war—his previous declaration that he preferred to see the Union destroyed rather than slavery—his speech on the 4th of July, at the Academy, in which he sneered at the soldiers declaring that we "were promised Vicksburg for the 4th of July," and his threatening the Government with a mob—his subsequent address to that mob, giving them an excuse, and prostrating himself before them, and his correspondence with the President, in closing upon delay at a time when the rebellion prays for it and murders in his without—all these things are susceptible of a kind of explanation, for Mr. Seymour is too adroit a politician not to choose his phrases; but they all leave one deep and permanent conviction, and it is, that if the country should be compelled to make peace with the rebels upon their own terms, Mr. Horatio Seymour would not be sorry.

If we do him injustice it is an involuntary wrong. If he has any where or at any time expressed a heartfelt abhorrence of the rebellion, or a sincere desire that the Government should be maintained by every honorable means of war—if he has any where spoken in such even-handed measure of rebels lately belonging to the Democratic party as he has of the Republican party, to which he is politically opposed—we have not seen the speech, and yet we have very carefully read every thing he has written and said.

That he would thinks he can take the State of New York into rebellion, we do not suppose; but that he wishes to propitiate the faction in the State which helps him, because of it—and he is clear. If, therefore, under pretense of State Rights, he can encourage disaffection to the prosecution of the war—if by denouncing opposition to General Government he can perpetuate a vague terror of civil war at the North, without openly instigating it, so that power may become easy and insist upon negotiating with the rebels, he will have done the best thing which the faction require without having openly opposed the war.

It is a profound pity that at this epoch the Governor of the Empire State should not be the representative of the unconditional loyalty of the great majority of its citizens; called to the position only because the loyal people had removed for the common defense, were not heard at the polls, he can truly claim that he has done his little all to chill the ardor with which the sturdy men of New York supported the war for the Union, and that in the darkest hour of peril his country ever saw he turned his back upon her and encouraged her foe enemies.

A LOST LEADER.

It is useless to deny the great pain inflicted by Mr. Carlyle upon his sincerest friends and most intelligent admirers in his country by his "American Iliad in a Nutshell." And it is a complicated pain, for the squib in M'Millan's Magazine shows not only morbid spite, but intellectual feebleness. Among the many strange things that might have been expected from Carlyle, was not a simply silly performance to be looked for? Such is to tell a system of chattel slavery, in which babies are bred for sale, "hiring servants for life," is so shallow a trick that every man who has honored Carlyle must needs hang his head. It is a mean infidelity to human nature of which Legree would have been ashamed.

But the mind to which that wretched old tyrant and fool, the father of Frederick the Great, seems a hero and a king, is released from all ordinary canons of criticism. When the mind of a man has ceased to feel and to know most profound reverence for some only, Genghis Khan will always be a finer spectacle than the Apostle John, and a Dyak will a nobler type of force than Florence Nightingale.

If Carlyle's squib be a specimen of the value of his judgment of the real meaning of political events, what a charlatan he is! If he knew no more of the English rebellion and its significance than of the book goes on blundering, his "Oliver" is no better portrait than his "Peter of the North" and "Peter" is simply the vision of a hypocritic egotist. The only wonder in this lamentable performance is that he did not represent Peter and Paul as quarreling about a United States cracker. For if Carlyle should be so much as a single grain of truth into his melancholy mess is not apparent. We are fighting about slavery; and that is the very question that Carlyle does not so much as allude to the fact upon the half page of nonsense he has written about us.

It is useless to be angry—it is folly to regret. But the brave hearts in this country that long ago hailed the sure genius of Robert Burns as a friend of all men, and a lover of justice against all odds, can not now see his reverence and sympathy offered exclusively to bullies and tyrants without a pang. It might well make a greater man than Carlyle hesitate when he was that his view of any subject was applauded by the meanest of instincts and the worst of men. There is not a womanwhipper in the land who will not chuckle with delight over this squib. There is not a man in the country whose friendship Carlyle would value who will not wonder at its foolishness while he smiles at its falsity. There are disillusions enough in life, but few of us who have truly loved and honored him are likely to know a sadder day than that on which we write among the lost leaders the name of Thomas Carlyle.

JUSTICE.

SOME years since Judge Daly earned a most enviable fame by the energy and ability with which he conducted the trial of the Macready rioters. Recorder Hoffman has been doing a similar good work in the matter of the July riots. The force and clearness of his introductory charge were not more admirable than the candor and incleverness of his direction of each case. The question is perfectly simple, and he has not for a moment suffered it to be complicated. The pleas for the convicted prisoners were merely harangues in which the speakers sought to inflame the prejudices and passions of the jury, precisely as their clients had excited those of the mob.

Thus in the case of the man indicted for leading the attack upon the Tribune office, after the attorney for the defense had run the usual changes upon the views and conduct of the editor, Mr. Greeley, the District Attorney briefly disabused the minds of the jury, reminding them that they were not trying the views of Mr. Greeley, or of the prisoner, or of any body else; that they were not settling the origin of the war, nor the character of General M'Clellan; but they were deciding upon the evidence whether the prisoner had incited a mob against the peace of the community. The conviction was inevitable. The prisoner was convicted.

To commend a judge for uprightness should be as insult to the bench. But when a magistrate sits in the city of New York, where M'Cann is called Judge, such commendation simply indicates that he is not the worst in the municipal court. In his impartial conduct of the late trials Recorder Hoffman has won honor and troops of friends. Nor does his just fame lessen that of the prosecuting officers and juries who have shared with him the labor of the court.

SING SING CONSERVATISM.

IMMEDIATELY upon the election of the Honorable Fernando Wood to the Speakership of the House of Representatives it is understood that the policy of the Sing Sing conservatives will be further illustrated by the appointment of Mr. Isaiah Rynders as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, of Mr. D'Oench as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Mr. Andrews, now of Fort Lafayette, as Chief of the Metropolitan Police. When Mr. Wood is elected Speaker his "conservative" friend Mr. John B. Floyd will be called to the head of the United States Treasury in place of Mr. Chase; General Meade will be superseded in Virginia by the "conservative" General Robert E. Lee; and Mr. Vallandigham will be made Secretary of War.

There will be but the first steps of the Sing Sing programme for the restoration of peace to the country and of dignity, unity, and perpetuity to the national Government.

A NOTE FROM JANUS.

DEAR LOUNGER,—You are a howling Abolition fanatic, and one of old Ace's most cutlit minions; but it is good policy to make use of even such as you send you the following resolutions which I have prepared for all Democratic Conventions that wish to vide on you because or sit on you stouts. You can print them, and so I shall save postage. I merely wish to add that I spit in advance upon all Abolition vermin that dare to impugn my patriotism. Here are the resolutions!

1st. Resolved, That we are in favor of the war.

2d. Resolved, That we are opposed to all measures for carrying it on. Your obedient servant,

JANUS.

GROVELING.

THE letter of James Buchanan to Jefferson Davis, dated March 16, 1861, and lately made public, is a striking illustration of the servile obsequiousness of the Northern political allies of the slaveholding oligarchy of this country only a few years ago. The cringing, fawning, supplicating, shivering, slobbering tone of this letter is that of an eastern slave addressing a master. It makes the Sedalia of the master respectable. How could Jefferson Davis and his fellow-conspirators possibly persuade a man less than a country which, at their bidding, could elect as President such a craven? For the time Buchanan was to be, would even be to resist the fate which they, with his connivance, had prepared for the country?

The sole aim of this man was to propitiate the slaveholding class. His only desire was to impress a scornful Southern leader with the conviction that he was more Southern than the South. He knew no country but "the South." He knew nothing to be served but slavery. He was grateful for his elevation to it, and he thanked his masters humbly for the wages of a pimp. "Don't chastise me," he cries; "I have always worked for you; I went to Congress in December, 1821, and have always done more for you than any other man. This is the reason when I was very young I was once so excited as not to be responsible, and I happen to be put upon a committee to do something that was shameful. But I humbly beg your pardon. On my knees I swear to you that I didn't mean it. Cameron 's a scamp for betraying me. Just see how consistently base I have been ever since! Please honor me by reading the speech I send, which, being utterly mean, wholly pleases me." And what Buchanan said in 1850 the Democratic party now, in the same spirit and for the same purpose.

This was the man who succeeded Franklin Pierce as President. After the two civil war or national death were inevitable.

A FINE CHANCE.

SINCE MORGAN has been arrested and sent to the Ohio Penitentiary, it is not almost time for the Copperheads to announce that the Lincoln Despotism has again destroyed the constitutional rights of the citizen; and for Jefferson Davis to write one of those letters which impress Copperheads and Britons with so profound a sense of his ability, dignity, and piety, remonstrating against our inhuman and uncivilized system of warfare?

FROM CAMP DOUGLAS.

HERE is a soldier's letter, from Camp Douglas, near Chicago. The Lounger heartily commends it to its readers:

"LOUNGING FRIEND,—May a soldier lounge and talk a little while by your easy-chair?

"This is a time of many imperative necessities, and the most urgent of all our needs is the need of men. Not only men who will rally to the flag with rifle and bayonet, but men to stay at home as well. We must have more men every where, or we are lost—men with warm and souls, and the energy to fight for them. Political constitutions, charters, statutes all are good, if they are of the right kind; but they don't amount to any thing unless they are in the right kind of hands. If we put the stake of justice into the hands of a thief what becomes of their virtue? Grand ideas, like royal robes, must have kingly men to fit them, or they will not be properly worn.

"We must have a great, deep reservoir of strong manhood, to give force and volume to our rushing torrent of destiny, or it will be no river, only a brawling brook. There are days to try men's souls, and it is soul that tells. We have pinned ourselves too much to the past. We seem to think our fathers were good enough for two or three generations. We have wrapped ourselves in the folds of the patriarchal robe, and assumed that we should be clothed to borne with the ascending patriarchs to heaven. It is true we found that it was not the garments, but the Fathers, who went to heaven; and that if we go there we must wear our own clothes, and work our own passage.

"We must have men, and the men we must have be men. We forget the fact that history has the unit Men for its base. Every man who is a man is a unit of it; see to it that his account with God and the next generation is well squared.

"'Humph!' says Grudgrind; 'what's the use of such Utopian schemes of redemption as that? Look at the facts of the case. Here's a rebellion that you think there is of converting politicians, and business men, and the other rabble that occupy a country when transformed into rebels.'

"Grudgrind thy name is a good many, and thou art practical. I will be practical also. Let every man who is reasonably clear-headed and decently honest—a big man is up to the average—enlist in the regiments, or even of common decency, and we shall have purely enough in Canada to shut out the rebs from the north, and their demagogues and home traitors. Let every man who accomplishes anything in this world be up to the average be used, and we are saved. There is nothing impracticable or visionary about that, is there? If there is, God pity us, for we are a ruined and lost people.

"Nobody supposes that the list of January, 1863, or 64, or '65 will have a grand, full average. It will not in the Millennium. We are not going to come out of this war an even and perfect race. We will come out cripples, or worse, of common decency, and we shall have purely enough in Canada to shut out the rebs from the north, and their demagogues and home traitors. Let every man who accomplishes anything in this world be up to the average be used, and we are saved. There is nothing impracticable or visionary about that, is there? If there is, God pity us, for we are a ruined and lost people.

"Nobody supposes that the list of January, 1863, or 64, or '65 will have a grand, full average. It will not in the Millennium. We are not going to come out of this war an even and perfect race. We will come out cripples, or worse, and our politicians claimed and under foot, and with nothing noticeable about us except our extraordinary development of all the organs of combativeness. Whatever good our luck may be, it is going to take us a long time to make the average of humanity. Our experiences come on, and to get our boiling black tides into the smooth, level bed of the channel of the future will be our work from all the commencing movement forward, we shall have work enough.

"We shall always have—every great nation will always have—a good deal of filth and foulness that boils up in draft time and settles down in the channel of peace. But if we can't develop among us currents of pure man stream strong enough to keep themselves clear of filth and over three shinking dregs, and set the machinery of our progress in vigorous and successful motion, then truly the nations may ask each other the gibing question—all the more bitter that we shall have to answer it—'Where is the formidable U. S.?' Ans the American idea is—"

PRIVATE F——,
Camp Douglas."

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

THE court of inquiry to investigate the facts and circumstances of the evacuation of Winchester and Martinsburg was organized at Winchester, June 26. The court consists of Brigadier-General BAIRD, President, and Brigadier-General MILROY, Colonel MCLEAN, Major HOFFMAN, and Captain R. N. SCOTT, Judge-Advocate. The court commenced its labors evidence on Monday morning.

Acting-Master FREDERICK D. STEWART, formerly of New York, has been ordered to the command of the gun-boat Dakota.

General OSTERHAUS left St. Louis on August 17 to join his command in Mississippi.

The body of Lieutenant CONDEN reached St. Louis on 16th. His funeral took place on 17th with appropriate military honors.

First Lieutenant D. L. MONTGOMERY, of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, has relieved Captain DE RUSSY, as General Halleck's aid-de-camp, and will act as Adjutant for the Twenty-second Corps. Captain DE RUSSY asked to be relieved.

The order dismissing Captain GUSTAVUS MYERS from the service has been revoked, and he has been granted an honorable discharge.

The death of Commodore Morris took place in this city on Friday, August 14, after a lingering illness of his age. After a protracted and painful illness. He has recently returned from New Orleans, where he had been second in command to Admiral Farragut, and was on his way north to this city by the Union authorities.

The funeral of Commodore Morris at Cairo on 14th to the largest outdoor audience ever assembled there.

Rear-Admiral FOOTE returned on 14th with the flagship Black Hawk from Memphis, and will hoist his flag on gun-boats off the levee.

General ANDREW, of Columbus, Kentucky, has been relieved by order of General GRANT, and General A. J. SMITH takes command there.

Brigadier-General JAMES M. TUTTLE has received the Democratic nomination for Governor of Iowa, in place of SAMUEL J. KIRKWOOD, resigned. TUTTLE was a strong opponent of the State Central Committee. He is now in the service in the field, and in that position we do not see how he can be popular with the Copperheads.

Lieutenant-Colonel WYNKOOP was in town last week en route for Santiago.

The United States steamer Albatross arrived at New Orleans lately from Galveston, bringing as passenger Commodore BELL, who relieves Admiral FARRAGUT in that department. The Commodore enters at once upon the discharge of his duties. Admiral FARRAGUT was relieved at his own request.

General RUNT and his staff, with a small escort, have just returned from Tuli-bah-quah, about twenty-six miles from Fort Blair.

Intelligence has been received at St. Louis the. the rebel General HARDEE died recently of diffirium tremens.

General DODGE is still quite low, but improving. No danger is apprehended from his sickness.

Brigadier-General JOSEPH W. REVERE, who was tried by court-martial at Falmouth, on May 11, Major-General WM. S. HANCOCK, president, and found guilty of misbehavior before the enemy, and of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, was sentenced to be dismissed from the military service of the United States. The President has approved the finding, and ordered the sentence to be carried into effect forthwith.

Second Lieutenant ALFRED SCOTT, of Company L, Sixth Iowa cavalry, has been dismissed the service by order of the President, for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in having appeared before the regiment in a beastly state of intoxication on the 3d inst.

Surgeon ALFRED WHITMAN, United States Volunteers, has been ordered to Philadelphia to examine and report upon information of important movements of our troops, but which would not be necessary to be disclosed the service.

Last week Major-General JOHN J. PECK and staff left Forkers Monroe on the steamer C. W. Thomas, Captain EASTER CLAY, for Newbern, having been assigned to the General Forte to the command of the Eighteenth Army Corps.

Commander MURRAY has been detached from special duty at the Navy Department, and has been ordered to the Wabash.

On 18th, screw steamer Western World took on board the Admiral of the fleet, S. P. LEE, from his flag-ship, screw frigate Minnesota, at New Inlet, and conveyed him to Beaufort, where he went by rail to Newbern.

Colonel GREEN, Chief Quarter-master of the Department of Washington, has received an admirable gift for the erection of a permanent contraband village on Arlington Heights, and he will soon be commenced at once.

General GIBBON is rapidly recovering from the severe wound he received at Gettysburg.

Second Lieutenant BENJAMIN, of New York Cavalry is to be given the command of a brigade.

General WILLIAM HARNON, commanding the second Division of the Ninth Army Corps, and Lieutenant-Colonel Wowdell, left Washington last week for Indiana on a leave of absence.

CHARLES H. GREEN, Quarter-master Sergeant at Fort Columbus, Governor's Island, has been promoted to a Second Lieutenancy in the United States Artillery.

Brigadier-General THOMAS WELSH, commanding the First Division of the Twenty-fifth Corps, died at Gonaives on 14th of congestive fever, caught during the campaign in Mississippi.

Second Lieutenant VALENTINE HITCHCOCK, Company G, First Heavy Artillery, Pennsylvania Volunteers, Deputy Quartermaster in the presence of the enemy, has been cashiered and his name erased from the rolls of the army, and has been ordered to be published in the newspapers in and about the camp, and in the particular State from whence he came.

Second Lieutenant JOHN NORTON, Company C, Second Regiment, First Inland Volunteers, for drunkenness on duty, has been sentenced to be cashiered, to be dismissed. Second Lieutenant W. H. TANNER, Company B, Sixty-fifth regiment New York Volunteers, has received the same punishment.

Second Lieutenant E. B. GREGORY, Company I, Sixty-fifth regiment New York Volunteers, for disobedience of orders and disrespect toward his superior officers, has been dismissed the service by order of the President.

THOMAS JEWETT, Company D, Fifth Maine Volunteers, for desertion, has been sentenced to be shot. Colonel MEADE approved the sentence, and ordered that it be carried into effect in presence of the division on Friday, the 14th inst., between the hours of 12 M. and 4 o'clock P. M.

The Miantonomah, the first iron-clad built entirely by the Government, arrived at the Navy Yard, Brooklyn Navy Yard on 8th. Her dimensions are—between perpendiculars, 200 feet; extreme breadth, 45 feet; depth amidships of beam, 5 feet 10 inches; depth of hold, 14 feet 9 inches from keel.

The charges against Colonel DE FORREST, of the Fifth Regiment, Harris Cavalry, are for defrauding the Government of large sums of money, thousand dollars, which, it is alleged, he did by false bills of articles which were never purchased for the service. The Colonel is now in this city under arrest, and will soon be tried, the Government witnesses having arrived in the city from the United States District-Attorney.

Colonel D. L. BELL, of the Regular Army, died in Baltimore on August 15, at his residence in M'Cullough Street. After five years' service in the field, and with an unbroken constitution, caused by hard services. He was the oldest Infantry Colonel in the service, having gone through the Florida and Mexican wars, and was twice brevetted for gallant services in the latter. He came from the western border of Texas to the Pacific, and was in command at Sonoma and in California after its annexation to the United States.

On 19th the United States steamer Fort Jackson was officially put in commission at this port as one of the United States Navy. She is armed and equipped after the fashion of a first-class sloop-of-war, and has a crew of picked sailors. A few months since this vessel was purchased from the Government by Messrs. Howland & Co. She was called the Union when the service of the "Commodore," and had been the favorite vessel of excellence which made the Government purchase her.

A commission was issued on 15th, in Boston, appointing Lieutenant-Colonel CHARLES HALLOWELL, of Colonel of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment, in place of Colonel Shaw, deceased. In the action in the assault on Fort Wagner. Colonel HALLOWELL was wounded in the assault by a musket ball in the face, and has been ever since in the field, but is now in Virginia. The appointment is deserved congratulations have and accompanied him thereon. Colonel HALLOWELL is a Pennsylvanian, and one of the fighting Quakers.

Brigadier-General SALOMON, recently in command of the district of Corinth, Mississippi, is at present on a visit to his friends at Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Lieutenant L. C. HOUGHTON has been assigned to the Chief Quarter-master's staff of the Department of the Cumberland.

The order heretofore issued dismissing Captain R. B. HUNT, One Hundred and Ninth New York Volunteers, from the service has been revoked by command of the President. The evidence submitted on behalf of Captain HUNT proves that the charges were groundless.

Colonel HANCHETT, Aid, of the Sixth Infantry, and Lieutenant-Colonel CHARLES NATHAN, of the First Artillery, have been put on the retired list at their own request.

The New Orleans Era announces the death, August 8, of Dr. D. W. WADSWORTH, United States Army, who died on board the ship Black Hawk at that port, of typhoid fever, after an illness of ten days. His remains are to be sent North.

Brigadier-General STEDMAN has been relieved of the command of the Second Brigade of BANNAN'S Division, and ordered to report to General GEORGE H. GORDON. It is hinted that he will soon have command of a division.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHARLESTON.

OUR advices from Charleston are to the 16th instant (Sunday) from Fortress Monroe, relating the state of affairs up to Friday morning. At that time the batteries on Morris Island opened fire for a few hours, during which the walls of Fort Sumter were struck several times by heavy mortar extensively. The Monitors did not fire a shot, however. It was also reported that the grand attack was to come off on Sunday, the 16th, and the fullest expectations of a triumphant result were entertained by the officers in command. Our heavy guns are making sad havoc on Sumter, and have breached the walls exposed to the fire of the batteries.

REBEL ACCOUNTS.

Rebel news from Charleston to the 16th inst., two days later than received from our own side, reaches us by way of Chattanooga. The Rebel, printed in that city, on the 16th published dispatches announcing that a general bombardment of the Federal batteries and fleet had been commenced on the day previous—Saturday—and was still in progress. It said that the fire was chiefly directed against Sumter, and that the fight was still going on when the Rebel was issued. The Rebel also commends the commanders on their coolness in the contests of the Rebel, says that the bombardment is the most severe on the heaviest that has been brought to bear upon the harbor, and exhibits the usual confidence of gloom.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

There are signs of motion in the Army of the Potomac. Reconnoissances are made by the enemy on 19th on the left of our army, and heavy cannonading was heard in the direction. The impression at head-quarters was that a battle was going on in the direction of Bristoe Station, or probably toward Fredericksburg, but no intelligence of that kind would be reached Washington but night it is most likely that it was merely a reconnoissance.

ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

General Grant has forwarded dispatches to the Government recommending that trade be opened to all loyal citizens with cotton, reserving such restrictions as he will bring into market thousands of bales of the staple now hidden.

THE REBEL ARMIES IN THE SOUTHWEST.

The latest report of Bragg locates him at Chattanooga, in command of over 70,000 men—the rebel force under 10,000 by desertion during and succeeding his recent retreat. Of this force 30,000 are under the immediate eye of Braxton Bragg, Hardee, also with 25,000 men. On their rear Kirby Smith has been elected. Governor Pierpont is now reported clear of guerrillas. Our latest dispatches from Chattanooga, via Cairo, state that General Granger, Indiana, has bound an address to the citizens of that State urging the improvement of slaves into the rebel service.

BLOCKADE RUNNERS.

It is reported that within the past few days no less than seventeen large steamers, laden with arms, consisting of blankets, shoes, and uniforms, eleven locomotives, 58,000 English rifles, etc., ran the blockade at Wilmington, North Carolina.

THE WAR IN THE NORTHWEST.

General Sibley's campaign:

HEADQUARTERS, WISCONSIN, August 18, 1863.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

The following dispatch from General Sibley, dated August 16, is received:

We had three desperate engagements with the rebel Sioux on the 15th inst., in which they were routed and finally driven across the Missouri with the loss of all their munitions, etc. Our loss was small, while at least one hundred and fifty of the savages were killed on the ground. Forty-six Indians have been found.

I am, General, yours truly, Brigadier-General.

General Sully marched from Fort Pierre for the big Sioux on the 7th instant, on the 20th of July, and Sibley will doubtless intercept the flying Sioux.

Hon. Wm. Dennison, Postmaster-General and delegate of the Indian hostilities, has been killed and his car captured. The Indians are now to the east of the Missouri river, and are considered as an end.

JOHN POPE, Major-General.

A DIPLOMATIC EXCURSION.

A diplomatic party set out from Washington last week on a tour of observation to the north and east of New York. The party consists, as we understand, as follows: Mr. Seward, Secretary of State; Baron Gerolt, the Minister of Prussia; Mr. Molina, the Minister of Nicaragua; Mr. Bigelow, Minister of France; Mr. Lothrop, the British Minister; Baron Stoeckl, the Russian Minister; M. Mercier, the Austrian Minister; M. Schleiden, the Hanseatic Minister; M. Bermudez, the Italian Minister, Count Piper, the Swedish Minister; M. Asboth, the Portuguese Minister; and several secretaries and attaches of the different legations. The first place they stopped at was Sharon Springs.

MORE COTTON TO BE RENDED.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, C. S. A.,
RICHMOND, July 19, 1863.

Hon. J. A. Seddon, Secretary of War:

SIR,—The fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson exposes to the enemy the cotton purchased by the Government in Mississippi and Louisiana. I learn that many of the planters in those States are willing to burn the cotton leave their plantations, so that there will be no person to whom the duty can be intrusted of preserving the cotton, if it can be preserved, or of destroying it where it is likely to fall into the hands of the enemy. Under the present circumstances I would respectfully submit that the subject be referred to the proper military commanders in those States, and that they be instructed to destroy all such cotton as can not be preserved from the hands of the enemy. With much respect, your obedient servant.

G. G. MEMMINGER, Secretary of the Treasury.

THE BRITISH PIRATES.

We learn something of the doings of the pirates Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, by late news from Brazil to the 8th ult. Three American vessels were captured by the Florida off the coast of Brazil, the crews transferred to her enemy boats—namely, the ships Sunrise and the Ocito of Boston, and the ship, the Conrad, was armed and converted into a pirate.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE MEXICAN CROWN.

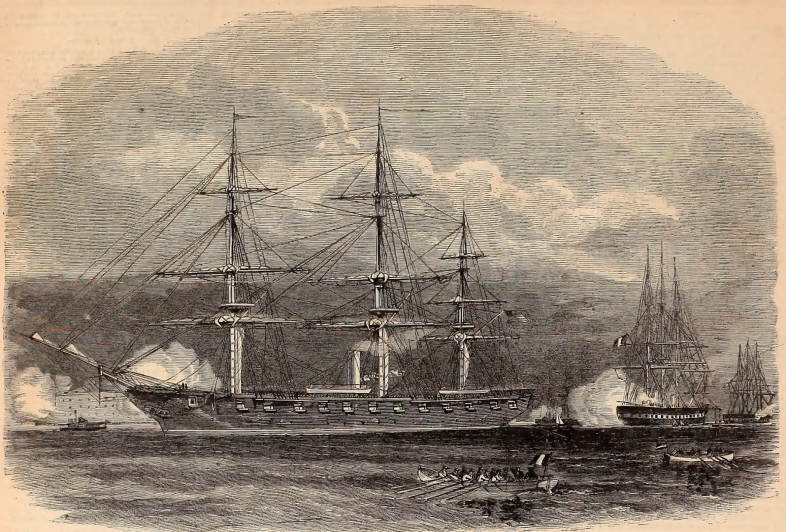
It is said that Louis Napoleon has written a letter to Archduke Maximilian, urging him to accept the Mexican throne. The Archduke has declined to consent, and had consulted the Pope on the subject.

RUSSIA.

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE INSURRECTION.

It is generally agreed to that instead of a collective note to insure, each of the three Cabinets will address a separate note, identical in idea, to St. Petersburg. It is stated that Austria declines going in for diplomatic action.

GERMANY.



A ROYAL CONFERENCE.

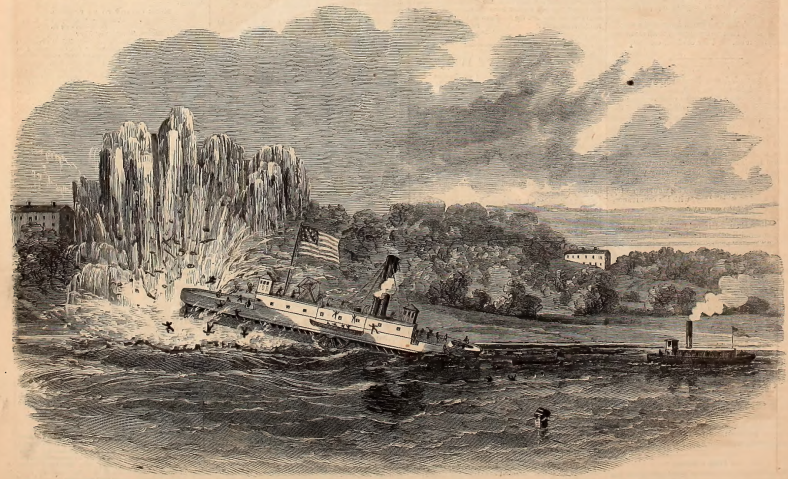
The Emperor of Austria has called a conference at Frankfort, to which the German sovereigns have signified their intention to be present—the King of Prussia excepted, declining to do so unless invited to elicit the feeling of Germany and the empire in regard to Polish affairs.

CANADA.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The first session of the eighth Parliament of United Canada was opened by the Governor-General on August 18. The Governor-General in Council by proclamation, and dates in both Houses in the Council by proclamation, and in the Assembly on 8 majority. The Ministerial candidate in the Assembly received 40 Upper Canada votes and 24 Lower Canada, while the Opposition cast 40 Lower Canada votes and 18 Upper Canada votes. The speech of the Governor-General, delivered from the throne on the last day, announced the passage of an improvement of the law, and the taking into consideration of telegraphic and postal communication between Lake Superior and the Pacific.

THE "HARTFORD," ADMIRAL FARRAGUT'S FLAG-SHIP, ARRIVING AT NEW YORK AND RETURNING THE SALUTES OF FOREIGN FRIGATES.—[SEE PAGE 546.]



A TORPEDO IN THE JAMES RIVER.

We publish below an illustration of the explosion of a torpedo under the gun-boat Commodore Barney, in the James River, on 4th August.

General Foster was making a reconnoissance up the river with the Commodore Barney, the Sangamon, and the Cohasset. They had already been fired upon by riflemen on the river-bank. The Herald correspondent goes on to describe the event illustrated in our picture:

No other incident of an exciting nature transpired until the fleet had reached a point on the river within six miles of Fort Darling. Here, as usual, the Barney bore the brunt of the misfortune. A torpedo was exploded under her starboard bow. The effect of this explosion was terrific in appearance, but, luckily, did not turn out so bad after all. The vessel was lifted by the shock upward of ten feet out of water, and an immense jet of water was hurled from her bow fifty feet in the air at least, falling over and completely deluging her, and washing overboard thirty men. Notwithstanding the desperate condition of affairs boats were immediately manned, and the unfortunates were rescued by their faithful brethren from a watery grave. Two of these men only, named Martin Krout, seaman, and I. Gamble (colored) were drowned. The rest were picked up. Two or three swam ashore.

It was now discovered that the Barney was badly injured; so much so that it was found necessary to point her head for the shore. The Cohasset, however, took her in tow shortly, it being found that her engines were completely disabled. A further advance was now considered useless, inasmuch as the men seen on shore were there, doubtless, for the purpose of exploding the torpedoes beneath our vessels as they attempted to pass. So the expedition returned to Dutch Gap, where anchors were dropped for the night.

EXPLOSION OF A TORPEDO UNDER THE BOW OF THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "COMMODORE BARNEY," IN THE JAMES RIVER.
[SKETCHED FROM THE "COHASSET."]

FUNERAL OF THE LATE CAPTAIN CAILLOUX, FIRST LOUISIANA VOLUNTEERS (COLORED).—SKETCHED BY A NATIVE GUARD.
[SEE PAGE 551.]

REBEL PRISONERS IN THE NEW ORLEANS CUSTOM-HOUSE.—SKETCHED BY MR. J. R. HAMILTON.
[SEE PAGE 551.]

MEXICO.

ANOTHER throne!
Through twice two thousand years
The earth has answered man's unending groan
With, "Draw ye not enough of tears
The cursed thistle's leaves to wet,
But ye must pile upon my weary breast
The weight of kingly thrones,
To keep my children from their rest
With digging hard among the basement stones
The tap-roots lengthened downward by my sweat?
Ah! woe is me: a crown has little weight,
Although of purest gold its orb be made:
But from it such long rays of chains go out
To every pair of wrists beneath its shade,
That I am wearied to bear them aught about,
And ye are dumper with the hopeless spade."

Another throne
On fallen Montezuma's, Iturbide's,
Uplifted by the wicked hand that guides
The destinies of Europe, and its own.
What vulture eagles o'er the sea have flown,
Smelling the death-heap from afar,
Watched by a younger brood.
And settled with slant, northward eyes to tear
Dead pulse far than those, whose blood
Could quench not thirst, did not the fiercer scream
Of ten thousand beaks big with thirst thereat!
The light is blood upon the midnight dream
That haunts the despot's brain;
A crown is there, but it shall cast in vain
Its poisoned shadow toward the free,
As on the desert toward some fertile plain
Falls the short shade of a dead upas tree.

O Corsican! whose second life was stilled
In dark suspicion near the Hapsburg throne,
While broken lines of kings with fictions filled
The gaps that bore no name except thine own—
Scent thou the line strong to fulfill thy shame,
Too weak to share the glory of thy name;
The Hawk's-beast brood from Alpine height,
Whose wings flagged not a horrid night
From Elve's tide to Zuyder Zee,
And wide through vine-hilled Germany,
And flushed even in the Danube's waves
Fast wild-eyed Hungary's countless graves,
And blackened sunny Italy—
Scent thou that line
Whose "right divine"
Of priest or demon blotted thine
Grope backward, led by one of thy strong race,
Its own through empty urns of kings to trace,
And whisper as it rejoiced it "Tis mine,"
Till o'er the western waves
Is claimed for it the Latian blood
That long ago crept through soft barbaric veins,
Until is left of its inhuman flood
Naught but the crimson stains,
And there it lingers out earth's roll of slaves
Is found a throne beside old Aztec graves?
Perhaps thy gorgeous tomb
May be full present, if demand be made
Even yet, for every scorn upon thee laid;
Perhaps the bitter doom
Of powerless kingship leaning on an arm
Most hateful, that derives from thee its charm
Of power may satisfy thy soul.
If any debt of man might roll
Away the gloom that on Helena's isle
Went with thee through the gates of death,
And more than iron lips agitate to smile
The death-crowned brow beneath.
Threw setting up a puppet thing
Of the hated line to be called a King
By thy magic name—a thing for show,
Scorned even by fallen Mexico.

The sacred tribe
Who lay on bended heads their pious hands
Like millstones, whose broad feet keep back the lands
From toil, except the brute
Leave children footless; the high lifted caste
Whose pillow hands to take and keep are sold
From memories of Spain's illgotten gold;
The priest and noble make unblushing haste
To bring the orb and sceptre, wheel and bail,
For sheaves whose growing was a murder's waste
Whose taking leaves another famine pale.

Another throne
Built on the western world;
The years shall see some fragments buried
To earth that once were an uplifted shape
Like to a man, and wondering flesh shall gape
At the base tinsel soon with moss o'ergrown.

THE STATION-MASTER AT LONGLEY.

I AM not an old man, you say? Well, you are right there: one is not usually considered old at the age of forty-five. Why am I so bald, then? Ah, friend, you may well ask. Men do usually lose their hair so early in life; and my scalp was polished, as the shining fashion, some fifteen years ago. It took only one grim night's work to do it all.

A story? Yes, comrade, there is a story anent this same poor bald pate of mine; and, if you care to hear it, I will tell it you. It is an old story now and one quite out to our friends gathered here, for I fear I have gabbled it somewhat too often when the bottle has been going round; but, as you never heard it before, you will find it as good as new. The up-train is not due for a full hour yet; and perhaps my story may help as well as any thing else to kill time. Fill your glass, then, and draw nearer to the fire; for that drifting snow outside does not make this winter night too warm.

You say you knew at once, when first you saw me, that I had served. Well, no doubt the soldier who has been in active service always bears the stamp of his profession about him. I have smelled powder on more than one field. I was nine years in the —th Fusiliers. I served in Canada; and, after reaching the grade of sergeant, I was dangerously wounded in a encounter with the Caffres at the Cape, and was sent home with a pension. The restoration of health brought back my constitutional antipathy to idleness; and, after knocking about in sore discontent for some time, I at last succeeded in procuring occupation as ticket-clerk at the Longley station on this line.

You don't know the country about Longley? No. You lose nothing thereby; for a more miserable district of bleak hill and wild moorland is not to be found from this to John o' Groats; and the population, rude and churlish, are as little attractive as the country they dwell in.

Among the few acquaintances I made during the one year I spent there was a young fellow named Carston, the son of a wealthy local farmer, who lived some six miles from the station. A clever fellow he was—the real manager of the farm—and its market-day, and sold. So he was a frequent traveler on our line. Young Carston and I had come to be great friends, more than one pleasant holiday I spent with him (for even we railway officials have holidays now and again) up among the hills, bleak and barren they were. I fired upon all this (rather tediously, perhaps) because it is to Frank Carston I owe this bald crown.

It was a cold, cheerless winter evening, as I stood upon the platform waiting for the mail train from the north, which was a little behind its time. There was no passenger from Longley; the roads would not wait two minutes, and my work would be over when it had passed on. I was pleasantly anticipating a quiet night by a warm fireside, with a hot cup of tea and the London morning paper, when the train came dashing in and pulled up with a shriek, and a fellow sprang out from one of the carriages, while the familiar voice of my friend Carston hailed me.

"Ned, old fellow!" he said, as I hurried up to him, "I want you to do me a great favor. You see this bag: it contains two hundred sovereigns. Journeys a rush-ogy, and I've got to be back for the old man this morning. You know the craze he has for paying in gold. I am going through to London on urgent business, and I want you to do for me as to take charge of the money and this letter, and carry them out to our place. Get up sort of conveyance and drive out: don't mind the expense—I'll settle all that. I know that, as a friend, you'll do this carefully for me. Tell Fa-ther I'll be home—certainly, if possible."

Off went the train, and before I could utter a word I was left alone on the platform with the heavy bag of gold in my hand. The commission with which I had been so unexpectedly intrusted was a very disagreeable one that bleak winter night; but it would be churlish to disappoint a friend. I went to my lodgings, got some tea, loaded a small double-barreled pistol (an unusual precaution against the lonely road I had to travel), put it in my pocket, and wrapped my great-coat round me. It was no easy thing to get carriage, fly, or gig in a little place like Longley at last hour; and what was a walk of four miles to me, when I was sure of a stiff glass of something warm and a good bed that night, and a pleasant canter on a sure-footed nag back to the station in the morning?

The night, though cold, was dry, and the moon was up. To be sure, some ominous clouds were gathering round her, and she was not rising, but steadily sinking, and it soon be hidden; but behind the hills. No matter: I should be far on my way before high noon, and, as I mentally added, I thought, were not likely to change into what they promised—a snow-shower—till I was safely ensconced of old Carston's fireside. Accordingly I went well enough for the first half hour; and as the brisk walk made the blood course warmly through my veins, I thought much pleasanter than this was than to be jolted and bruised in some such crazy lumbering old vehicle as the Longley. This was capable of anything, even that rough, wild, mountain road. But my anticipation of the weather proved sorely deceptive. Before the half hour had well gone by the snow came down in fierce and fast, and the moon was no longer visible. There was no help now, however, but all the more need to get on as quickly and as much as possible; so I clutched my stick with a firmer grasp and quickened my pace. But the thick, steady fall of snow so blinded the air that I could not see twice my arm's-length before me; and I had not been walking many minutes when the appobstacles of place and time began to thwart my way. It was a dangerous locality I was in just then in the midst of that snow-storm; for the road wound over hill and moor, without a hedge or fence; and, where the snow was rapidly covering heath and path alike, to trace my route with accuracy became impossible. Human life had seen sacrificed more than once, amidst the snow-drift, on that wild moorland, and I remembered with pain to have been lost. To make my danger greater, the place was full of pits and hollows, where mining speculators had tried for coal, and had left their marks. Should I wander off the beaten track the chances were I might meet a broken neck in one of those confounded holes.

I stumbled on at random. I had lost my bearings utterly; and in a few minutes I knew as little where I was as if I had been set down and bound and blindfolded in the middle of the moor. I was making my way, surely, as best I could, through the snow-drift, and that was all. I might be going in any direction but the right one. Was I on the beaten road, or was I on the heath? Another minute cruelly solved my doubts. One step more—my foot found no rest; and I fell headlong into a broad, deep pit. Stunned by the fall, I lay there I know not how long. Bruised and giddy, I tried at last to regain my feet, when a pang of exquisite pain shot through my left arm: the bone was broken. As with my right hand I now tried to steady myself and grope my way out of the hole, the agony I suffered was indescribable; yet my first thought was to feel for the bag of gold, which was still safely suspended from my neck. I crawled out of the pit, and pushed forward on what course more slowly than ever, though, and cautiously, for the terror of those vile holes was strong upon me now. But I grew weaker every moment, and a vague and sickly alarm seized me. Suppose I should swoon upon that moor—my head was giddy and my limbs unsteady already: what had a dreadful death under the fast-falling snow awaited me? At this horrible thought a cold sweat suffused my whole body, and my parched throat refused to swallow. To my last hour I shall not forget the horror of that picture of death which rose before my mind's eye that night. The pain of my arm grew more excessive every moment; it hung by my side like a leaden weight. But, strange to say, even with the grim terror of death before me, I still had strength to creep over me to lie down upon the snow and rest. Had I done so, no doubt my last sleep would have been there. But luckily I got then a faint glimmer of light caught my eye, and with the eagerness of awakened hope I hurried toward it. Yes, there it was! I could myself at the open door of a wretched cabin, on the heath of which a wood fire was burning.

"Hallo!" was the greeting I received from a rough voice, "who the —— are you, and what d'ye want here such a night as this?"

The words died away on the hearth was fresh and damp, and filled the cabin with smoke as well as with a pungent odor. It took some little time to discover what was the matter. When the woman proceeded the figure of a man, large, gaunt, and broad-shouldered, raggedly clad, with dark scowling face, and features coarse and strong, coarse, black, matted hair. I hurriedly explained to this person my misadventure. He rose and pushed toward me the only chair in the place, a wooden one.

"Sit you down, man," he said, somewhat less roughly; "you look weak, and a broken arm is no joking matter. I'll see what I can do for you after I know. But what errand took you out upon the moor such a night as this?"

"I was going to Longley, on important business, to Farmer Carston's."

"From Longley to old Carston's!" he exclaimed. "Why! that's a seven miles' round. You've taken a roundabout way to get to your journey's end."

"Roundabout? What do you mean?" I asked.

"Why, that you've been going in the opposite direction," was his answer. "And you have been steadily walking away from it for the last half hour at least."

"And how far am I from it now?"

"Some four good miles at least."

Here was a discovery! What was to be done? I asked the man to guide me to Carston's, and offered to pay him well.

"No! not for the money they say old Carston has in the bank," he answered, "would I attempt to go over the moor to-night. Why, man, the snow is falling so thick you couldn't see a yard before you. It would be as much as our lives are worth. No; you must stop here upon that moor outside, before now, on such a night as this."

All this time the pain of my arm was growing intolerable, and help of any kind was impossible there. I must make it do: I must stay in this wretched place till morning, and endure my agony till daylight should bring the chance of aid? There was no alternative.

"All you can do," said the man, "is to keep where you are. You may be thankful that you have the shelter of even these miserable walls on such a night as this is. It will be well, even, if the snow-drift outside does not bury the whole hut itself before morning. If you want any thing to eat you can have a crust of bread—that's all we have—and some cold water. You must make the best on the straw till morning comes. But you do look horribly beaten up. Here, Sally, up with you, then, and give us a drop of gin."

I turned to the other corner, beside the fire, to which these words were addressed, and now beheld, for the first time, a woman sitting beside a sick child that lay asleep upon the ground. I turned and found her eyes fixed upon me with a strange look of fear. She was miserably clad, and looked sickly and thin, yet her face showed the traces of much personal beauty. She was delicately fair: very beautiful she would be, I thought, with a long, disheveled hair, of a golden tinge, actually glistened in the blaze of the fire. But what struck me most was the wildness, the hungry, wolfish glare of her eyes, so unnaturally large: fastened as it was upon me, that wild, eager look made my heart sink with a vague fear and dislike. I felt that the woman did not speak; but she went to a large chest at the other end of the room (almost the only piece of furniture in the place, except a rickety deal table and a couple of stools), and took from it a large black bottle and two tumblers.

"Come," said the man, taking the cup and the bottle, and pouring some of the contents of the one into the other—"you look as though you could do with a drop of this. I'm a shepherd's hut on the moor. No matter; it came to us some way. Try one tumbler of it, and you could not take safer physic to-night."

Most gratefully did I seize the cup and drink off its contents at a single draught—genial more welcome. The blood came coursing warmly through my shivering frame again, and for a while I even forgot the excessive pain of my broken arm. Declining the bread which the man offered me, I drew nearer to the fire. I took the pistol from my pocket, and laid it down on the ground beside me; and as I stooped to do this the bag of gold struck against the wood with a metallic clink of the coin within. For the next moment, when I raised my head, I found the terrible eyes of the woman fastened upon me with a glare more hungry and wolfish than before. I was startled, and (almost mechanically) thrust the bag into my breast. She turned away, muttering something about my bed, and went into the other room of the cabin. In the mean time the man sat down at the other side of the fire, where the child was sleeping, and (he had taken some of the brandy, and was less rough and more communicative now) began to talk about the snow-storm, the probable loss of sheep it would cause, and the similar visitations of former years. In a short quarter of an hour the woman came to the door of the other room and called him to her. He went; and, for several minutes after, I heard them conversing in low, eager tones. Their words I could not catch; but the woman seemed to be vehemently urging something upon her companion, while his answers were brief and hesitating. Gradually the voices grew confused—a drowsy feeling of power over every limb benumbed me. Words, or one minute or an hour had passed I knew not, when a heavy hand was laid on my shoulder, and a hoarse voice sounded in my ear:

"Come, friend, you're tired, I see; you had better throw yourself on the bed inside, and sleep till morning."

I started up, and was soon recalled to perfect consciousness by the sharp pain of my broken arm. The man was still standing near me.

"My wife has shaken out the straw," he said, "as softly as possible; and I mistake if, after to-night's tramp, you don't find it as pleasant as a bed of down. But take this by way of a nightcap before you go."

I drank the brandy, and, muttering a few words of thanks, was turning away, when he stopped me.

"Stay," he said, "you are forgetting your pistol. You had better take it with you."

I did so, and, bidding them good-night, went into the other room. My bed was a heap of straw covered with a large sheet-wrapping; but had it been of choicest feathers it could not have been more welcome then. I stretched myself upon it, and was soon fast asleep. But strange dreams with it confused and distressing dreams, with which the glare of those wild, hungry eyes were strangely mingled. I awoke with a sense of pain intolerable, and found that I had turned over on my left side, and was bearing my wounded arm under me. How long I had been sleeping, of course, I could not tell; but the first sound that fell upon my ear was the confused hum of voices in the room of the room. Immediately the voices grew more distinct, and some words reached me that speedily brought me to a terrible consciousness of my peril. One of those words was "gold;" and, at the sound, my head searched for the bag: it was there safe. With a cyclone agony I turned my head and crept toward the door. Through a chink between the shrunken boards I could see the man and woman seated at the fire. The latter, whose face was almost completely turned toward me, sat with her elbows on her knees, and her chin resting on her hands. Her eyes were of hers were fixed upon the man, and they glowed with a hellish fire. I slickened at the look of that face, so handsome, so delicate, so fiendish. The man was speaking at the moment; and as the sound of his voice drew my eyes toward him, I beheld beside him an object which froze the blood in my cold—a large, shining hatchet or cleaver.

"I can't help it, lass," he was saying; "I don't like the job myself, I wish the thing could be done some other way. About taking the gold I'm not particular to a hair, and in a downright tusle I wouldn't mind what kind knocking a fellow on the head. But to murder a man in his sleep—dang it, but it goes against my liking!"

"But those beautiful golden coins, Bill dear," the tempting fiend rejoined; "the lovely gold that could take us out of this hole and away to a new, one miserable life compared to that? And who will know about it? The snow-storm is most likely. We can put him down beneath the piled-up snow in one of those holes outside, and we shall be many a hundred miles from this—yes, across the Atlantic itself—before any trace of him is found."

How my blood curdled and my hair grew stiff with horror as I listened to the words of this female devil, and watched the Gergon-like glance of her eye, and the hideous smile that curled her lips! I have been in deadly peril of life and limb in more than one fierce fight, as these medals show. I remember once when the knife of a gigantic Zulu was within a hair's-breadth of finishing me over with me, till a comrade's rifle brought that savage down. But never, in deadliest hour of danger, did I feel my life more sickly threatened than during which crept round my heart as I listened that night to the murderous words that woman uttered.

"It's all in vain," replied her companion; "'tisn't the danger of discovery I'm afraid of. 'Tis the job itself I don't like; the murder of a sleeping man in cold blood—that's all."

With fury flashing from her eyes she sprang to her feet and seized the hatchet.

"Coward and fool!" she hissed, "do you call yourself a man? You see your wife and child starving for food and fuel, and you have not the manhood to do the deed which will save them from the death of dogs! I will do it myself."

"Lass," he said, catching her by the wrist, and drawing her back to her seat again. "You're a plucky girl, Sal, but d'ye think I'd let a woman do what I shrink from the contemplating myself? I told you I did not like the job: I had rather get at the money any other way; but I didn't tell you that I would not do it. Sit down, then, and let's talk it over. The chap is fast asleep now—the fatigue and the brandy have done for him, and you may see him snoring as he sleeps. The ugly tip of steel may be useless after all. A cloth upon his mouth and hand will make him wind-pipe may be enough. There will be no signs of blood; and when they do find him after the snow melts they will say he perished in the storm."

"Now, Bill," said the woman, with a horrid show of admiration, "you talk like a man, and a wise one. I begin to know you again."

"Well, lass," he said, "consider the thing as done. Just give me the bottle."

He took it, raised it to his lips, and drank a deep draught. With trembling hand I felt up the door for bolt or lock. There was a wooden lock only. Gently and silently I pushed it home, then crept back to my bed and searched for my pistol, resolved to sell my life dearly. I got the pistol; drew back the hammers and felt the nipples: the caps were gone! I tried the barrels: they were drenched with water. I saw it all: the pistol had been dealt with while I slept at the fire; and I was now utterly at the mercy of those fiends. But I had little time to waste in thought, for the next moment the door was shaken by a heavy hand. I lay back and moaned and snored like one in a troubled sleep.

"The door is bolted on the inside," I heard the man whispering; "the fellow fastened it before he went to sleep."

"Then burst it open," said the woman.

"No," was the rejoinder, "that would waken him up, and he might show fight. We must adopt some quieter course."

"There's the window," she said; "can you not get in through that?"

"Quite right, Lass: I had forgotten."

I looked to the window: it was an aperture some two feet square or more, with a crazy sash of four panes, every one of which was broken. I crept toward it and felt the sash: the hand of a child might have pulled it out. What was I to do? What course of a struggle had I now? Faint and weary, with that broken arm, what resistance could I offer to this man of gigantic strength? Crushed by the pressure of my inevitable doom, I staggered back from the window and fell against a projection of the cabin-wall. I thrust out my right hand to save me from sinking to the ground; it did not touch the projection, but stretched far into some hollow space. A pang of hope shot through my heart: here was a large open chimney like that at the other end of the cabin; and I felt the snow, which had fallen down through it, crackling under my feet. Could I escape through this? Was there still a chance of life? I stooped under and thrust up my head. The aperture was wide and deep, and the large stones of the rude masonry projected on every side. These were steps by which it was easy enough to climb. To think of all this, not upon my thought, occupied less time than I have taken to tell it. In spite of the helplessness of my left arm, and the unendurable pain I felt from it, I was up through the chimney and out on the roof before I heard the frail sash be low forced in. To slide to the ground was easy enough; and, blessing God for my deliverance, I crawled round to the other end of the cabin, and from this starting-point I hurried off across the moor as fast as my feeble limbs could bear me. Looking back, I saw the glare of light from the open door of the cabin, and heard the shouts of a fierce, angry voice. The snow-drift had almost ceased to fall, and the whitened ground gave out some faint light through the winter darkness. What I longed for now was some pit or hollow to creep into and burrow there till lumediate danger was over. I was not long in finding one. I slid down into it, and with my right hand gathered the snow around me. Not ten minutes had I lain there when I heard a heavy footstep crunching the snow above. It was my pursuer, the intending assassin; and I could hear his muttered curses as he passed on. In a few moments more I heard him coming back again, and then all was silent and still as death. At length I crept out from my hiding-place, with cramped and aching limbs. I have no more in what direction he must have then I had known before. I had entered that accursed cabin; but I struck right ahead, knowing that there must be a human habitation somewhere before me, should I only have strength enough to reach it.

I was fearfully exhausted, and I dragged my feeble limbs along as if they were weighted with lead. At times the consciousness of my danger and the excitement of the fearful scene I had gone through, sustained me; but by-and-by strength and reason alike seemed to desert me, and I staggered along like one in the delirium of fever. How long this continued I can not tell, for I made no count of time that terrible night; but I remember how, at last, in utter exhaustion, I fell prostrate on the snow.

As I lay there, unable to rise and unable to move a limb, a long piercing shriek, the horrible import of which I knew too well, rang in my ears. I looked up: that eye of fire was fixed upon me. How can I tell you the horror of my situation?—a life's agony compressed into the compass of one awful minute. The goods train, which always passes Longley about three o'clock in the morning, was coming, and I was lying helpless on the rails! With a cry of agony I rose to my feet, but I fell back in utter exhaustion. Even the terror of approaching death did not give me the energy enough to crawl from where I lay. That night was more active enough for the one thought—to stretch myself out with my head toward the rails—the terrible blended with the rattle of the carriages and the grinding sound of the wheels upon the snow they covered for the rails, and then—and I looked up to Heaven, with a feeble laugh of speechless gratitude; and all danger was over. The train had passed along the other line of rails that ran parallel between which I lay. The snow had prevented me from distinguishing the one from the other; but had I had strength enough to crawl in the direction I had intended the engine and carriages would have inevitably passed over me, and left me there a mangled corpse. It was my utter weakness which saved my life. The joy of my deliverance from a horrible death was followed by a natural reaction. I sank back in a swoon; and when consciousness came back to me again I found myself, weak and wasted, in my own bedroom, and in my own bed, where (they told me) I had lain for eleven days in raging fever. It seems that, in the morning, one of the railway porters found me lying insensible in the snow; and thus I was, a third time within a dozen hours, saved from death. But this bold part was the price I paid.

"But the bag of gold?"

Was found suspended from my neck, and, with the letter fled. In my pocket, was delivered in the proper quarter.

"And the intending assassins?"

I know nothing of them. They did not belong to that part of the country. They had disappeared from the cabin on the moor several days before I recovered from my fever, and, therefore, before suspicion could have fallen upon them; and they were never heard of after.

"The Carstons, I hope, were grateful?"

Do you see where that light is burning faintly, in that window across the line there? Frank Carston's sister is always sitting there, I should hope in that room. She is mother of three of the finest young Britons in this big shire, and I am their father. But here comes the mail-train, and it makes no long stay here. You had better look after your luggage.

LEFT ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

Oh, my darling! my darling! never to feel
Your hand going over my hair!
Never to lie in your arms again—
Never to know where you are!
Oh, the weary miles that stretch between
My feet and the battle-ground,
Where all that is left of my dearest is Lies under some yellow mound!

It is but little I might have done
To lighten your parting pain;
But the bitter fear that you must died alone
Out in the dark and the rain!
Oh, my bero love!—to have kissed the pain
And the sadness from your fading eyes!
To have saved one only passionate look
To sweeten these memories!

And thinking of all, I am strangely stunned,
And can not believe you dead;
You loved me, and you loved you, dear!
And your letter lies there unread!
You are not dead! I can not be so!
God never could will it so—
To craze my brain and break my heart—
And shatter my life—I know!

Dead! dead! and never a word,
Never a look for me!
Dead! dead! and our marriage-day
Never on earth to be!
I am left alone, and the world is changed,
So dress me in bridal white,
And lay me away in some quiet place
Out of the hateful light.

HOWARD GLYNDON.

THE FUNERAL OF CAPTAIN ANDRE CAILLOUX.

WE illustrate on page 549 the FUNERAL OF THE LATE CAPTAIN ANDRE CAILLOUX, of the First Louisiana Volunteers, who was killed at Port Hudson. Captain Cailloux was one of the bravest soldiers in our country's service, though a colored man. The following account of his funeral we take from the New Orleans Times:

By far the largest funeral procession that has been seen on our streets since the burial of Colonel Charles Dreux, his first tribute to military valor, was that of Captain Cailloux. It was that of Captain André Cailloux, of the First Louisiana Native Guards. This officer was killed on the 27th ult. during the assault on the fifth of May last, while leading his company in a charge against the rebel works at Port Hudson. From the time he fell, within a few feet of the enemy's parapet, until the arrival of his remains in General Banks, on the 5th of July, the body of this brave man lay exposed to the weather, and the consequence was that the fetid sharp-shooter that his friends found it impossible to carry it from the field.

Immediately on the truce being declared his body was taken possession of, and placed, first in charge of a guard of honor, composed of men of his own regiment who had been wounded during the charge, in the command-ant of Adjutant T. A. Sears. The body arrived in this city on Saturday last, and since that time has been lying in state in the hall of the "Friends of the Order," of which society Captain Cailloux was a leading member.

The body, as before mentioned, lay in state in the hall of the Friends of the Order, and was deposited in the centre of the room. The coffin was draped in the American flag, on which lay the sword, belt, and sash worn by the unfortunate soldier. Around the coffin flowers were strewn in the greatest profusion, and the perfume was quite continually burning. All the rites of the Catholic church were strictly complied with, the body being placed under lock and key, and altogether it presented as solemn a scene as was ever witnessed.

At nine o'clock the band of the Forty-second Massachusetts Regiment made their appearance, and discovered the entire neighborhood for a long distance. The Native Guards, of this city, the church of St. Rose of Lima—who we are glad to see has paid no trifling attention to the last communication and demonstrations issued against him by the Archbishop—and the various societies to which the deceased belonged, were present. After the regular services in accordance with the Roman Catholic ritual, a touching and eloquent eulogy on the virtues of the deceased. He called upon the people to remember the noble deeds he had done, martyrs to the cause of justice, freedom, and good government. It was a noble and enviable death to envy. Had we room we would gladly give the whole of this stirring address.

Immense crowds of colored people had by this time gathered around the building, and the services which thereto were rendered almost impassable. Two companies of the Native Guards, commanded by Captain Lewis, and camp on the Company Canal, were there to act as an escort, and Esplanade Street, from Rampart to Derbigny, was lined with colored societies, both male and female, in open order, extending for a long distance.

After a short pause, a sudden silence fell upon the crowd, and the procession moved off. The coffin was first taken out, brought from the hall on the shoulders of eight soldiers, and placed in the six members of the band, who, during the time, who acted as pall-bearers. The corpse was conveyed to the hearse, which was composed of white and black people, and in silence profound as death itself. Not a sound was heard save the mournful music of the band, and not a head in all that vast multitude but was uncovered.

The procession then moved off in the following order: The hearse containing the body, with Captain J. W. Bingold, W. B. Barrett, S. J. Wilkinson, Eugene Mailhon, J. A. Gien, and A. St. Leger (all of whom, we believe, belong to the Second Louisiana Native Guards), and six members of "The Friends of the Order," as pall-bearers; about a hundred convalescent sick and wounded colored soldiers, the two companies of the Sixth regiment, a large number of colored officers of all Native Guard regiments, the carriages containing the relatives of the deceased, and a number of army officers; winding up with a large number of private individuals and societies.

After moving through the principal down town streets, the body was taken to the Bienville Street Cemetery, and there interred with military honors due his rank.

Captain Cailloux was a native of this city, aged 43 years, and was one of the first to raise a company under the call of General Butler for colored volunteers. In conclusion, we can not do better than quote from the Union of this city. It says:

By his gallantry during his gentlemanly deportment, his amiable disposition, and his capacities as a soldier—have ing received a very good education—he became the idol of his men, and won the respect and confidence of his superior officers. He was a true type of the Louisianian. In this city, where he passed his life, he was loved and respected by all who knew him.

In Captain Cailloux the cause of the Union and freedom has lost a gallant defender. Captain Cailloux, defending the integrity of the sacred cause of Liberty, vindicated his own rights to freedom, and by the action which it was charged, he leaves a wife and several children, who will have the consolation that he died the death of the patriot and the righteous.

The correspondent who sends us the sketch from which our picture was taken mentions a curious incident in connection with the funeral. Father Le Maistre, the officiating clergyman, could not get any white person to attend his servants in the discomfort to assist him to perform the ceremony, in consequence of the prohibition of the archbishop. He had heard, however, that Captain Bingold of the First Louisiana Native Guards had said that so many trades and professions were represented in the regiment that it was a town in the prairie in sixty days; and to him he applied for aid. Two privates instantly volunteered, and assisted in performing the services according to the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church. At the grave-yard again a private of the regiment left the ranks to perform the duties of bricklayer.

THE REBEL PRISON IN NEW ORLEANS.

We reproduce on page 549 a sketch by our special artist, Mr. C. E. Hamilton, illustrating the place of confinement of the rebel officers who recently surrendered at Port Hudson. Mr. Hamilton accompanies his sketch with the following remarks:

"I required to go through a certain amount of form before being able to obtain the above sketch for you, as the strictest guard is kept upon the prisoners. I was obliged to apply for permission to General Bowen, who, having no personal objection, gave me a note of introduction to Captain Bearing, Provost-Marshal of the Custom-house, expressing his willingness that the Captain should permit me to sketch, 'provided that no offense should be given to the prisoners.' I thought that this was showing an amount of regard toward rebel sensibilities that they are not always to be in the habit of manifesting, and I thanked well for General Bowen's feelings as a gentleman.

"On arriving at the Custom-house Captain Bearing, courteous as politely, and at once conducted me through the various wards, communicating with each other, in which the rebel officers are confined. This was in the northern portion of the building, in which over 250 prisoners—all officers—are now located. But as there was no room for them all, they are divided into a corps d'élite and the whole I have selected the largest apartment in which the greater number are quartered.

"The room I have sketched about, mostly, me from one room to the other. They are lounging, and trying to take things as pleasantly as they can under the circumstances. They are in fact looking set of men, and were dressed, some in uniform, some in civilian's costume, and others again in nothing but their shirts and pants.

"I did not think it necessary to make any formal inquiry as to whether my sketching would be objected to, as I could see at a glance that the Captain left me, I out with my sketch-book and fell to work.

"'Are you making portraits, Sir?' asked one of two or three who came to overlook me.

"'No, necessarily,' I replied; 'I am some headsome officer can put himself in the fore-ground on purpose.'

"'Don't forget, in your sketch,' said a smart young gentleman, 'those horrible mosquitoes that eat us up all night.'

"'Ah! the delicious fare we have to live on,' chimed in another.

"'Your treatment here is not unusual, I hope, Sir,' I said, inquiringly, turning to a middle-aged officer near me.

"'Oh no, not at all; we have nothing to complain of. We are prisoners of war subject to segregated creatures some temporary inconveniences, but we are allowed every thing we can expect under the circumstances.'

"This concession was made in a very gentlemanly tone, and, indeed, my own eyes had already told me that such was the fact. On a long table in front, plenty of ice going to and fro, and one or two suspicious-looking bottles that seemed as if they had contained something more sparkling than water. Besides that, I had met in the ante-room that good Samaritan, Mrs. Brandt; and it is not likely that she would neglect her soldier can lack any thing within the reach of womanly care and kindness while she is kindly at hand.

"As I gazed on this scene I could not help making some comparisons highly favorable to our section, in spite of Mr. Bull Russell's and Punch's assertion that this war is 'fast brutalizing the North.' I could not help wondering if our poor Yankee boys in Libby Prison, Belle Island, Andersonville, at that moment, faring as well in rebel hands as the officers then before me; or if poor Montgomery, when just about to be hanged as a felon, could have given as good an account of his treatment as the one I above alluded to. As I looked toward the end of the room, and saw two youths seated on the window-sill, and gazing carelessly into the street below, how could I forget that, if they were Union officers in the Libby Prison at Richmond, a murderous bullet from some sentinel below would put an end to their hearts' aspirations for ever, and that I, engaged in Richmond from what they were.

"The few officers with whom I conversed on this occasion were, as usual, men of much intelligence and refinement. I left them with one sole wish in my heart, and that was, that instead of having to portray them in the character of mortal enemies, my pencil could have caught the features of so many friends and brothers, enjoying again with us the sweets and amenities of social life."

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

We devote pages 552, 553, and 556 to illustrations of the operations of General Gillmore and Admiral Dahlgren against Forts Wagner and Sumter in the Bay of Charleston—from sketches by several correspondents on the spot.

One of the correspondents, writing from the Catskill, says:

"U. S. IRON-CLAD 'CATSKILL',
CHARLESTON BAR, S. C., Aug. 5, 1863.

"One of my sketches represents the iron-clads in their position in the attacks on Fort Wagner and the Cumming's Point Battery during the last bombardment of the 18th. In the forenoon of the 10th and 11th, before the Ironsides came over the bar, the Catskill bore the blue pennant of Admiral Dahlgren, and was therefore the chief object of the enemy's fire.

"We were struck sixty-four times—our smoke-stack being thoroughly ventilated with shot-holes, and our turret and deck well punched, but not materially damaged.

"About midnight on the 10th July a large iron side-wheel steamer, having escaped the fire of the guns of the outside blockading fleet, was fired during the night by Captain Rodgers arrested her progress by two shots from our 11 and 15 inch guns. The vessel ran ashore on Morris Island, and, took fire, and became a total wreck—a warning to all Anglo-Rebels to keep away from Charleston during the present war.

Another correspondent, to whom we have been indebted for sketches more than once, writes:

"FORT PULASKI, S. C., Aug. 1, 1863.

"I herewith transmit a sketch of the discharge of wounded prisoners at the buoy off Fort Wagner, Charleston Harbor, July 24, 1863. While the Catskill and the Admiral Monitors were in Fort Wagner a terrific rain of shot and shell, and occasionally Sumter and the Cumming's Point battery opened fire. The buoy is a lonely object in English built (the Alice), and painted the color of our own cruisers, came down past Sumter and communicated with the Monitors. The Georgiana, hospital steamer, which was anchored among the fleet below, started and met her on the buoy of Fort Wagner. Immediately upon the sight of the flag of truce all firing stopped on both sides for the rest of the day. The men to-day were sent on shore daylight—the first instance of the kind on record.

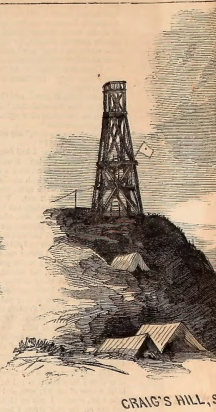
"The flag-staff on Fort Wagner was shot away during the first days of the bombardment, and they do not now pretend to fly the symbol of their Confederacy. Our batteries for the breaching of Fort Sumter are established in their new advance of the house upon the beach shown in the sketch. The new rebel batteries on James Island, in the rear of Sumter, have been silenced since they commenced the siege, exploded shell over our workmen in the trenches day and night, but do not hinder the progress of the great work.

"General Gilmore proposes to demolish Sumter by firing over Fort Wagner and Battery Bee on Cumming's Point. The latter is a heavy job for our hands subsequently. We shall hurl against her brick wall 71 cwt. of shell from the heaviest rifled guns at every 100 yards of distance.

The other pictures, the GENERAL VIEW OF MORRIS ISLAND, showing the rebel works and our lines, the GENERAL LAIDLEY'S QUARTERS, and those in the trenches, etc., etc., explain themselves. The Herald correspondent writes:

"Morris Island has already earned the even tener of their way. We have the usual amount of heavy artillery firing daily, and occasionally a casualty on our side, but at long intervals, and our work goes on with as much regularity as if the enemy had no existence, except as to our presence and operations in their lumedine neighborhood. Our position on Morris Island is so advanced that it is only through carelessness or foul-hardiness we suffer any loss. The rebels are more sparingly, and we must say fire; but they do not always care to avoid them. Our men are protected by bomb-proofs, and consequently limbs and hands are lost from fragments of shells which have been thrown over or thrown by the rebel artillerists on James Island and Fort Sumter.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.



We reproduce on page 557 two drawings by our special artist, MR. WAUD; one of them representing the battered condition of the railway bridge (on the Potomac) on Quantico Creek, it became the dépôt and head-quarters of the blockading forces. It was then the only means of saving skirmish; the heights on the north afford a fine position; and last winter the Union cavalry crossed in force here.

Now the railway-branch line was vacated last June a large portion of the army, and nearly all of the train, passed through Manassas.

The Military Railroad Bridge over the Potomac Creek has been destroyed by the rebels since the evacuation of Falmouth, as well as the greater part of the track from Aquia to Falmouth dépôt. It was a very handsome structure, erected in place of the temporary and somewhat unsafe concern first thrown over the Creek. Its height was between 70 and 80 feet, and redoubts were thrown up for its defense; but when the army left no force could be spared for the preservation of the railroad and dépôts."

GILLMORE'S HEADQUARTERS.

CRAIG'S HILL,S

A, New Rebel Works on James Island.—B, Rebel Look-out.—C, Fort Johnson.—D, Rebel Iron-clad.—E, Fort Sumter.—F, Battery Gregg.—G, Fort Wagner.—H, Battery Bee.—I, Fort Moultrie, Sullivan's Island

GENERAL VIEW OF MORRIS ISLAND.—UNION CAMPS AND REBEL WORKS—FORT JOHNSON—THE LOWER HARBO

GNAL STATION.

IN THE TRENCHES BEFORE WAGNER.

Battery Beauregard.—K, Moultrie House.—L, M, Union Batteries.—N, Union Look-out.—O, "New Ironsides."—P, Ruined Light-house.—R, Flag-ship.—S, Union Fleet.—T, Gilmore's Head-quarters.—U, The Ocean.

OF CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, ETC., ETC.—SKETCHED BY AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT FROM FOLLY ISLAND.—[SEE PAGE 551.]

A YOUNG LADY'S SOLILOQUY.

Uselessly, aimlessly drifting through life,
What was I born for? "For Somebody's wife,"
I am told by my mother. Well, that being true,
"Somebody" keeps himself strangely from view;
And if naught but marriage will settle my fate,
I believe I shall die in an unsettled state.
For, though I'm not ugly—pray, what woman is?—
You might easily find a more beautiful phiz;
And then, as for temper and manners, 'tis plain
He who seeks for perfection will seek here in vain.
Nay, in spite of these drawbacks, my heart is perverse,
And I should not feel grateful, "for better or worse,"
To take the first Booby that graciously came
And offered those treasures, his home and his name.
I think, then, my chances of marriage are small;
But why should I think of such chances at all?
My brothers are, all of them, younger than I,
Yet they thrive in the world, and why not let me try?
I know that in business I'm not an adept,
Because from such matters most strictly I'm kept.
But—this is the question that puzzles my mind—
Why am I not trained up to work of some kind?
Uselessly, aimlessly drifting through life,
Why should I wait to be "Somebody's wife?"

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

"We laid the poor proud creature on the sofa, and bathed his face with eau de Cologne. He spoke directly, and said that was nice, and 'My head! my head!' And I don't think he was ever quite insensible, but he did not know what was going on, for presently he opened his eyes wide, and stared at us so, and then closed them with oh such a sigh; it swelled my heart almost to bursting. And to think I could say nothing: but mamma soothed him and insisted on his keeping quiet; for he wanted to run away from us. She was never so good to him before: she said, 'My dear child, you have my pity and my esteem; alas! that at your age you should be tried like this. How few in this sorry world would have acted like you: I should have sided with my own flesh and blood, for one.'

'What, right or wrong?' he asked.

'Yes,' said she, 'right or wrong.' Then she turned to me: 'Julia, shall all the generosity be on his side?'

I kissed her and clung to her, but dared not speak; but I was mad enough to hope, I scarcely knew what, till she said in the same kind sorrowful voice, 'I agree with you; you can never be my son; nor Julia's husband. But as for that money, it revolts me to proceed to extremes against one, who after all is your father, my poor, poor chivalrous boy.' But she would decide nothing without Edward; he had taken his father's place in this house. So then I gave all up, for Edward is made of iron. Alfred was clearer sighted than I, and never had a hope: he put his arm round mamma and kissed her, and she kissed him: and he kissed my hand, and crept away, and I heard his step on the stair, and on the road ever so far, and life seemed ended for me when I heard it no more.

Edward has come home. Mamma told him all: he listened gravely: I hung upon his lips; and at last the oracle spoke: and said, 'This is a nice muddle.'

More we could not get from him; he must sleep on it. O, suspense! you torture! He had seen a place he thinks will suit us: it is a bad omen his saying that so soon after. As I went to bed I could not help whispering, 'If he and I are parted, so will you and Jane.' The cruel boy answered me out loud, 'Thank you, little girl: that is a temptation; and you have put me on my guard.'

Oh, how hard it is to understand a man! they are so impracticable with their justice and things. I came away with my cheeks burning, and my heart like a stone; to bed, but not to sleep. My poor, poor, unhappy, noble Alfred!"

"Dec. 27th. Mamma and Edward have discussed it: they say nothing to me. Can they have written to him? I go about my duties like a ghost; and pray for submission to the Divine will."

"Dec. 28th. To-day as I was reading by main force to Mrs. Eagleton's sick girl, came Sarah all in a hurry with, I was wanted, Miss. But I would finish my chapter, and O how hard the Devil tried to make me gabble it; so I clenched my teeth at him, and read it as if I was spelling it; and then didn't I fly?

He was there; and they all sat waiting for me. I was hot and cold all at the same time, and he rose and bowed to me, and I courtesied to him, and sat down and took my work, and didn't know one bit what I was doing.

And our new oracle, Edward, laid down the law like any thing. 'Look here, Hardie,' said he, 'if any body but you had told us about this fourteen thousand pounds, I should have set the police on your governor before now. But it seems to me a shabby thing to attack a father on the son's information, especially when it's out of love for one of us he has denounced his own flesh and blood.'

'No, no,' said Alfred, eagerly, 'out of love of justice.'

'Ah, you think so, my fine fellow, but you would not have done it for a stranger,' said Edward. Then he went on: 'Of all blunders, the worst is to fall between two stools: look here, mamma; we decide, for the son's sake, not to attack the father: after that it would be very inconsistent to turn the cold shoulder to the son. Another thing, who suffers most by this fraud? why the man that marries Julia.' Alfred burst out impetuously, 'Oh, prove that to me, and let me be that sufferer.' Edward turned calmly to mamma: 'If the fourteen thousand pounds was in our hands, what should you do with it?'

The dear thing said she should settle at least ten thousand of it on Me, and marry Me to this poor motherless boy, 'whom I have learned to love myself,' said she.

'There,' said Edward, 'you see it is you who lose by your governor's—I won't say what—if you marry my sister.'

Alfred took his hand, and said, 'God bless you for telling me this.'

Then Edward turned to mamma and me; and said, 'This poor fellow has left his father's house because he wronged us: then this house ought to open its arms to him: that is only justice; but now to be just to our side; I have been to Mr. Crawford, the lawyer, and I find this Hardie junior has ten thousand pounds of his own. That ought to be settled on Julia, to make up for what she loses by Hardie senior's—I won't say what.'

'If any body settles any of their trash on me, I'll beat them, and throw it in the fire,' said I; 'and I hated money.'

The oracle asked me directly did I hate clothes and food, and charity to the poor, and cleanliness, and decency? Then I didn't hate money, 'for none of these things can exist without money, you little romantic humbug; you shut up!'

Mamma rebuked him for his expressions, but approved his sentiments. But I did not care for his sentiments: for he smiled on me, and said, 'We two are of one mind; we shall transfer our fortune to Captain Dodd, whom my father has robbed. Julia will consent to share my honest poverty.'

'Well, we will talk about that,' said Edward, pompously.

'Talk about it without me, then,' I cried, and got up, and marched out indignant: only it was partly my low cunning to hide my face that I could not keep the rapture out of. And, as soon as I had retired with cold dignity, off I skipped into the garden to let my face loose, and I think they sent him after me; for I heard his quick step behind me; so I ran away from him as hard as I could, and of course he soon caught me; in the shrubbery where he first asked me to be his; and he kissed both my hands again and again like wild-fire, as he is, and he said, 'you are right, dearest; let them talk of their trash while I tell you how I adore you; poverty with you will be the soul's wealth; even misfortune, by your side, would hardly be misfortune: let all the world go, and let you and I be one, and live together, and die together; for now I see I could not have lived without you, nor without your love.' And I whispered something on his shoulder, no matter what; what signifies the cackle of a goose? and we mingled our happy tears, and our hearts, and our souls. Ah, Love is a sweet, a dreadful passion: what we two have gone through for one another in a few months! He dined with us, and Edward and he sat a long, long, time talking; I dare say it was only about their odious money; still I envied Edward having him so long. But at last he came up, and devoured me with his lovely gray eyes, and I sang him Aileen Aroon, and he whispered things in my ear, oh, such sweet, sweet, idiotic, darling, things; I will not part with eve[illegible] the shadow of one of them by putting it on [illegible] only I'm the blessedest creature in all th[illegible]; and I only hope to goodness it is not [illegible]d to be so happy as I am."

"[illegible]. It is all settled. Alfred returns to Oxford to make up for lost time; the time spent in construing Me instead of Greek: and at the end of term he is to come of age and marry—somebody. Marriage! oh what a word to put down! It makes me tingle; it thrills me; it frightens me, deliciously: no, not deliciously; any thing but: for suppose, being both of us fiery, and they all say one of them ought to be cold-blooded for a pair to be happy, I should make him a downright bad wife. Why then I hope I shall die in a year or two out of my darling's way, and let him have a good one instead.

I'd come back from the grave and tear her to pieces."

"Jan. 4th. Found a saint in a garret over a stable. Took her my luncheon clandestinely; that is ladylike for 'under my apron:' and was detected and expostulated by Ned. He took me into his studio—it is carpeted with shavings—and showed me the 'Tiser digest, an enormous book he has made of newspaper cuttings all in apple-pie order; I mean alphabetical; and out of this authority he proved vice and poverty abound most wherever there are most charities. Oh, and 'the poor' a set of intoxicated sneaks, and Me a Demoralizing Influence. It is all very fine: but why are there saints in garrets, and half starved? that rouses all my evil passions, and I can not bear it; it is no use."

"Jan. 6th. Once a gay day; but now a sad one. Mamma gone to see poor papa, where he is. Alfred found me sorrowful, and rested my forehead on his shoulder; that soothed me while it lasted. I think I should like to grow there. Mem.! to burn this diary; and never let a creature see a syllable.

As soon as he was gone, prayed earnestly on my knees not to make an idol of him. For it is our poor idols that are destroyed for our weakness. Which really I can not quite see the justice of."

"Jan. 8th. Jane does not approve my proposal that we should praise now and then at the same hour instead of always praying. The dear girl sends me her unconverted diary 'to show me she is "a brand."' I have read most of it. But really it seems to me she was always goodish: only she went to parties, and read novels, and enjoyed society.

There, I have finished it: and, oh dear, how like her *un*converted diary is to my converted one!"

"Jan. 14th. A sorrowful day: he and I parted, after a fortnight of the tenderest affection, and that mutual respect, without which neither of us, I think, could love long. I had resolved to be very brave; but we were alone, and his bright face looked so sad; the change in it took me by surprise and my resolution failed; I clung to him. If gentlemen could interpret as we can he would never have left me. It is better as it is. He kissed my tears away as fast as they came: it was the first time he had ever kissed more than my hand: so I shall have that to think of, and his dear promised letters: but it made me cry more at the time, of course. Some day, when we have been married years and years, I shall tell him not to go and pay a lady for every tear; if he wants her to leave off.

The whole place so gloomy and vacant now."

"Jan. 20th. Poverty stares us in the face. Edward says we could make a modest living in London; and nobody be the wiser: but here we are known, and 'must be ladies and gentlemen; and fools,' he says. He has now made me seriously promise not to give money and things out of the house to the poor: it is robbing my mother and him. Ah, now I see it is nonsense to despise money: here I come home sad from my poor people; and I used to return warm all over. And the poor old souls do not enjoy my sermons half so much as when I gave them things to eat along with them.

The dear boy, that I always loved dearly, but admire and love now that he has turned an intolerable tyrant, and he used to be Wax, has put down two maids out of our three, and brings our dinner up himself in a jacket, then puts on his coat and sits down with us, and we sigh at him and he grins and derides us; he does not care one straw for Pomp. And mamma and I have to dress one another now. And I like it."

"Jan. 30th. He says we may now, by great economy, subsist honestly till my wedding-day; but then mamma and he must 'absquatulate.' Oh, what stout hearts men have! They can jest at sorrow even when, in spite of their great thick skins, they feel it. Ah, the real poor are happy; they marry, and need not leave the parish where their mother lives."

"Feb. 4th. A kind and most delicate letter from Jane. She says, 'Papa and I are much grieved at Captain Dodd's affliction, and deeply concerned at your loss by the Bank. Papa has asked Uncle Thomas for two hundred pounds, and I entreat you to oblige me by receiving it at my hands and applying it according to the dictates of your own affectionate heart.'

Actually our Viceroy will not let me take it: he says he will not accept a crumb from the man who owes us a loaf."

"Feb. 8th. Jane mortified, and no wonder. If she knew how very poor we are, she would be surprised as well. I have implored her not to take it to heart, for that all will be explained one day, and she will see we could not.

His dear letters! I feed on them. We have no secrets, no two minds. He is to be a first class and then a private tutor. Our money is to go to mamma: it is he and I that are to work our fingers to the bone (I am so happy!), and never let them be driven by injustice from their home. But all this is a great secret. The Viceroy will be defeated, only I let him talk till Alfred is here to back me. No; it is not just the rightful owner of fourteen thousand pounds should be poor.

How shallow female education is: I was always led to suppose modesty is the highest virtue. No such thing! Justice is the queen of the virtues; he is justice incarnate."

"March 10th. On reperusing this diary, it is demoralizing; very: it feeds self. Of all the detestable compositions! Me, Me, Me, from one end to another; for when it is not about myself, it is about Alfred, and that it is my he-Me though not my she-one. So now to turn over a new leaf: from this day I shall record only the things that happen in this house and what my betters say to me, not what I say; and the texts; and outline of the sermons; and Jane's Christian admonitions."

Before a resolve so virtuous all impure spirits retire, taking off their hats, bowing down to the very ground, and apprehending Small Beer.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Extracts from Jane Hardie's Diary:

"March 3d. In my district again, the first time since my illness, from which I am indeed but half recovered. Spoke faithfully to Mrs. B. about her infidel husband: told her not to try and talk to him: but to talk to God about him. Gave her my tract, 'A quiet heart.' Came home tired. Prayed to be used to sharpen the sickles of other reapers."

"March 4th. At St. Philip's to hear the Bishop. In the midst of an excellent sermon on Gen. i. 2, he came out with the waters of baptism, to my horror: he disclaimed the extravagant view some of them take; then hankering after what he denied, and then partly unsaid that too. While the poor man was trimming his sails, I slunk behind a pillar in the corner of my pew, and fell on my knees, and prayed against the stream of poison flowing on the congregation. Oh, I felt like Jeremiah in his dungeon.

In the evening papa forbade me to go to church again: said the wind was too cold: I kissed him, and went up to my room and put my head between the pillows not to hear the bells. Prayed for poor Alfred."

"March 5th. Sadly disappointed in J. D. I did hope He was embittering the world to her by degrees. But for some time past she writes in ill-concealed spirits.

Another friend of mine, after seeking rest in the world, is now seeking it in Ritualism. May both be drawn from their rotten reeds to the cross.

And oh this moral may my heart retain,
All hopes of happiness on earth are vain."

"March 6th. The cat is out of the bag. She is corresponding with Alfred; indeed she makes no secret of it. Wrote her a faithful letter. Received a short reply, saying I had made her unhappy, and begging me to suspend my judgment till she could undeceive me without giving too much pain. What mystery is this?"

"March 7th. Alfred announces his unalterable determination to marry Julia. I read the letter to papa directly. He was silent for a long time: and then said, 'All the worse for both of them.' It was all I could do to suppress a thrill of carnal complacency at the thought this might in time pave the way to another union. Even to think of that now is a sin. 1 Cor. vii. 20–4, plainly shows that whatever position of life we are placed in, there it is our duty to abide. A child, for instance, is placed in subjection to her parents; and must not leave them without their consent."

"March 8th. Sent two cups of cold water to two fellow-pilgrims of mine on the way to Jerusalem, viz.: to E. H., Rom. viii. 1; to Mrs. M., Philipp. ii. 27.

Prayed for increase of humility. I am so afraid my great success in His vineyard has seduced me into feeling as if there was a spring of living water in myself, instead of every drop derived from the true fountain."

"March 9th. Dr. Wycherley closeted two hours with papa—papa had sent for him I find. What is it makes me think that man is no true friend to Alfred in his advice? I don't like these roundabout speakers: the lively oracles are not roundabout."

"March 10th. My beloved friend and fellow-laborer, Charlotte D——, ruptured a blood-vessel at 3 P.M., and was conveyed in the chariots of angels to the heavenly banqueting-house, to go no more out. May I be found watching."

"March 11th. Dreadfully starved with these afternoon sermons. If they go on like this, I really must stay at home, and feed upon the word."

"March 12th. Alfred has written to his trustees, and announced his coming marriage, and told them he is going to settle all his money upon the Dodds. Papa quite agitated by this news: it did not come from Alfred; one of the trustees wrote to papa. Oh, the blessing of Heaven will never rest on this unnatural marriage. Wrote a faithful letter to Alfred while papa was writing to our trustee."

"March 13th. My book on Solomon's Song now ready for publication. But it is so difficult nowadays to find a publisher for such a subject. The rage is for sentimental sermons, or else for fiction under a thin disguise of religious biography."

"March 14th. Mr. Plummer, of whose zeal and unction I had heard so much, was in the town and heard of me, and came to see me by appointment just after luncheon. Such a sweet meeting. He came in and took my hand, and in that posture prayed that the Holy Spirit might be with us to make our conversation profitable to us, and redound to His glory. Poor man, his wife leads him a cat and dog life, I hear, with her jealousy. We had a sweet talk; he admires Canticles almost as much as I do: and has promised to take my book and get it cast on the Lord for me."

"March 15th. To please, one must not be faithful. Miss L. after losing all her relations, and at thirty years of age, is to be married next week. She came to me and gushed out about the blessing of having at last one earthly friend to whom she could confide every thing. On this I felt it my duty to remind her she might lose him by death, and then what a blank! and I was going on to detach her from the arms of flesh, when she burst out crying and left me abruptly; couldn't bear the truth, poor woman.

In the afternoon met him and bowed, and longed to speak, but thought it my duty not to: cried bitterly on reaching home."

"March 17th. Transcribed all the texts on Solomon's Song. It seems to be the way He has marked out for me to serve him."

"March 19th. Received this letter from Alfred:

'Dear Jane,—I send you a dozen kisses and a piece of advice; learn more; teach less: study more; preach less: and don't be in such a hurry to judge and condemn your intellectual and moral superiors, on insufficient information.

Your affectionate brother,

Alfred.'

A poor return for me loving his soul as my own. I do but advise him the self-denial I myself pursue. Woe be to him if he rejects it."

"March 20th. A perverse reply from J. D. I had proposed we should plead for our parents at the Throne. She says she fears that might seem like assuming the office of the mediator: and besides her mother is nearer Heaven than she is. What blindness! I don't know a more thoroughly unhealthy mind than poor Mrs. Dodd's. I am learning to pray walking. Got this idea from Mr. Plummer. How closely he walks! his mind so exactly suits mine."

"March 22d. Alfred returned. Went to meet him at the station. How bright and handsome he looked! He kissed me so affectionately; and was as kind and loving as could be: I, poor unfaithful wretch, went hanging on his arm and had not the heart to dash his carnal happiness just then.

He is gone there."

"March 24th. Stole into Alfred's lodging when he was out; and, after prayer, pinned Deuteronomy xxvii. 16, Proverbs xiii. 1, and xv. 5, and Mark vii. 10, upon his bed-curtains."

"March 25th. Alfred has been in my room, called Matthew vii. 1, Mark x. 7, and Ezek. xviii. 20, on my wall. And he found my diary, and has read it, not to profit by, alas! but to scoff."

[Specimen of Alfred's comments. N.B. Fragmental criticism:

A. Nolo Episcopari.

B. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good.

D. The old trick; picking one text, straining it, and ignoring six. So then nobody was to be born married, must get married.

E. Recipe. To know people's real estimate of themselves, study their language of self-depreciation. If even when they undertake to lower themselves, they can not help insinuating self-praise, how their humility is a padding, their vanity is a well. This sentence is typical of the whole Diary, or rather Diary; it sounds Publican, smells Pharisee.

X. How potent a thing is language in the hand of a master! Here is sudden death made humorous, and a few incongruous phrases neatly disposed.

F. Excuse me; there is still a little market for the Liquefaction of Holy Writ, and the Perversion of Holy Writ; two deathless arts, which meet in your comment on the song you ascribe to Solomon.

Z. And more than Mrs. Plummer does, apparently.

G. Apotheosis of the British public. How very like profaneness some people's Piety is!

C. H. Faith, with this school, means any thing the opposite of Charity.

I. You are morally truthful: but intellectually mendacious. The texts on Solomon's Song? You know very well there is not one. No grave writer in all Scripture has ever deigned to cite, or notice, that coarse compendium of Oriental delicize.

J. Most peripatetic for "I like it." Motto for this Diary? "Ego, et Deus meus."

K. In other words a good, old-fashioned, sober, humble Christian, to whom the daring familiarities of our school seem blasphemy.

M. Here I recognize my ——— somewhat spoiled by a detestable sect, but ———

[Here Alfred was forever abusing]; and succeeded always amiable, when off her guard.]

"March, 1861. Mr. Crawford the attorney called and told papa his son had instructed him to examine the trust-deed, and to draw his marriage settlement. Papa treated him with the greatest civility, and brought him the deed. He wanted to take it away to copy; but papa said he had letters of a clerk here. Poor papa, his distress from this gentleman, though not from me; and gave him a glass of wine.

Then Mr. Crawford chatted, and let out Alfred had asked him to advance a hundred pounds for the wedding presents, etc. Papa said he might do so with perfect safety.

But the moment he was gone his whole manner changed. He walked about in terrible anger and agitation; and then sat down and wrote letters: one was to Uncle Thomas; and one to Mr. Wyckrey; I believe a brother of the doctor's. I never knew him so long writing letters before.

Heard a noise in the road, and it was Mr. Maxley, and the boy after him hooting; they have found out his infirmity: what a savage animal is man, till grace changes him! The poor soul had a stick, and now and then turned and struck at them; but his tormentors were too nimble. I drew papa to the window, and showed him, and reminded him of the poor man's request. He answered impatiently what was that to him? "we have a worse case nearer home. Charity begins at home." I ventured to say yes, but it did not begin and end at home."

"March 31st. Mr. Osmond here to-day; and, over my work, I heard papa tell him Alfred is blackening his character in the town, with some impossible story about fourteen thousand pounds. Mr. Osmond very kind and sympathizing; set it all down to illusion; assured papa there was neither madness nor insincerity in it. That what the letter am I for that? said poor papa: 'if I am slandered, I am slandered. And they went out together.

Papa seems to feel this engagement more than all his troubles, and, knowing by sad experience it is useless to expostulate with Alfred, I wrote a long and faithful letter to Julia, just before luncheon, putting it to her as a Christian whether she could conscientiously be her profession to be a son against his father, and marry him in open defiance.

She replied 3 P.M. that her mother approved the marriage, and she owed no obedience, nor affection either, to my parent.

3.30. Sent back a line rebuking her for this quibble.

At 5 received a note from Mrs. Dodd proposing that the correspondence between myself and her daughter should cease for the present.

5.30. Replied with an assurance that it should cease forever. No reply. Such are worldlings! Remonstrance only galls them. And so in one afternoon's correspondence ends one more of my Christian friendships with persons of my own sex. This is the eighth, to which a carnal attachment has been speedily fatal.

In the evening Alfred came in looking very red, and asked his father if he was not well; and was uncharitable of me to condemn so many estimable persons, all better acquainted with the circumstances than I am. I replied with a fifth commandment. He bit his lip and said, 'We had better not meet again, until you have found out which is worthiest of honor, your father or your brother.' And with this he left abruptly; and something tells me I shall not see him again. My faithfulness has wounded him to the quick. Alas! Prayed for him: and cried myself to sleep.

"April 4th. Met Ain disguised as a common workman, and carrying a sack full of things. I was so shocked I could not maintain my resolution; I said, Oh, Mr. Edward, what are you doing? He blushed a little, but told me he was going to sell some needlecticks and things of his making: and he should get a better price in that dress: all traders looked on a gentleman as a thing made to be pillaged. Then he told me he was going to turn them into a bonnet and a wreath: and his beautiful brown eyes sparkled with affection. What egotistical creatures they must be! I was quite overcome and said oh! why did he refuse our offer? did he hate me so very much that he would not even take his due from my hand? No, he said, nobody in our house is so unjust to, you as to hate you; my sister honors you, and is very sorry to think ill of her: and, as for me, I love you: you know how I love you. I hid my face in my hands and sobbed out. Oh, you must not; you must not; my poor father has one disobedient child already. He said sadly, Don't cry, dear one, we have a little patience; perhaps the clouds will clear: and, meantime, why think so ill of us? Consider, we are four in number, of different dispositions, yet all of one mind about Julia marrying Alfred. May we not be right; may we not know something we have not told to Alfred you? His words and his rich manly voice were so soothing; I gave him just one hand while I hid his my bosom; I gave him no other; he kissed the hand I yielded him, and left me abruptly.

If Alfred should be right. I am staggered now; he puts it so much more convincingly."

"April 5th. A letter from Alfred, announcing his wedding by special license for the 11th.

Made no reply. What could I say?

Papa, on my reading it out, left his very breakfast half finished, and went to his bag and rushed up to London. I caught a side view of his face; and I am miserable. Such a new, such a terrible expression: a vile expression! Heaven forgive me, it seemed the look of one who meditated a crime."

VAINCUE.

AWAY at the further end of the long drawing-room Paul Lorgen was sitting softly, sending out deep, full chords, flying selfish moments, into the shadow deepening about him; and in the bowwindow, lighted by the sinking pale gleam left in the sky, sat Lillian and John Darce.

Lillian was of a race that grew pale, not red, with passion; and the passion of anger lowered rather than raised, the voice. Her lap was filled with flowers massed together—purple and waxwhite fuchsias, heliotrope, white and purple pansies, and sweet heliotrope: and it might have been thought that the deft little fingers placing them in the tall vase were not at all trembling, or that the full scarlet lips had paled somewhat. Be that as it might, she gave no other sign of indignation.

John sate near her, and, half imploring—imploring, not in weakness, but very consciousness of strength, knowing the immutability of his resolve. If she would but yield to their tyranny —more, I will resist it; and till I am your wife, at least, will cease, dance, talk as I list, and with whom I will."

"Lillian, how much have I sacrificed for you? Can you relinquish me for this?"

"I entreated you. You command me."

"It is my right. You are mine, Lillian—pledged to me, not to Paul Lorgen, who never saw you, not of you. You should hold yourself too costly to be held in his thought, a thing to be won with the wearing, spite of duty, of more than that, his misapprehension of you touches my honor; the insult of his careless comment will scathe me also."

He was growing more earnest, she a little paler. She had hung the last honey-suckle over the marble bedge of the vase, and now she was slipping up and down her fingers the string—a great quiet, set about with diamonds, and holding imprisoned a tongue of blood-red flame. John marked the action, and knew its meaning.

"Lillian," he said, again, "we must find an end for this. I should not wish you, as my wife, to yield to a legal form what you had refused to love. I can not retract with honor and self-respect. Your own honor and delicacy both demand of you submission. Will you give it?"

"No."

"Think, Lillian. We must be miserable apart."

"No."

Out from the shadow commenced to sound a steady, throbbing waltz-beat, and a wild, wailing strain.

"Think," murmured John, "while that goes on, for at its close you must have decided for us both."

She answered not so much as by the lifting of an eyelash, but sat a listening statue. The eerie strain grew more involved, deepened all about her in the darkening air. She heard the coming wail all about her, and a great joy where—on the shadow, in the sickening fragrance of the flowers, in the dreadful music—knew that later she must feel it, but could not now, for very pride and stoniness of heart. The waltz grew in fire and passion. It sounded out loudly, and knew within itself strange and unimaginable harmonies; but through it all throbbed the steady waltz-beat, like the pendulum of some merciless clock, counting off the moments between her and misery.

On a sudden she turned hastily, thinking that John had spoken. But he was standing at her, all his great love and tenderness springing up in his set, stern face, passionate entreaty in his eyes. The waltz went back to the first low throbbing, died away shuddering, and was silent.

"Do you like that, Lillian?" asked Paul from the shadow.

"Your answer!" demanded the low voice in her ear.

Something dropped into his hand. He held it close to the window, and in the fading light flashed out the ring—the last pledge of his love—a betrothal ring: and brushing past him, she had gone over to Paul, saying something lightly in praise, and he had answered in an undertone, and was playing it again, she, meanwhile, calmly listening.

And John, stung into life and motion, dropped the ring from the window which also had left its last ground-it under his heel.

Later on Paul had brought in lights, Paul caught the sparkle of something on the carpet, and picked up fragments of gold and an opal broken in two.

Lute Pins exclaimed:

"Why, Lillie, it is your ring! What an omen! Child, how could you be so careless?"

Paul, remembering the twilight sitting in the window, and a certain odd light in Lillian's eyes as she asked him, handed her the fragments, with a steady meaning look that could not be misunderstood. The blood flushed redly up in her cheeks.

"You do not understand," she said, coldly, putting her arm in that of Lute's and walking away.

In the second pause Rouse found itself foolishly bereaved. Lillian had gone to visit Mrs. Grant Baracole. John Darce had returned to the city: and there was nothing left to be mentioned but facts together, and linked them with the finding of the broken ring. But ——— House was too busy with prayer and psalm to heed that of the poet.

Grant Baracole, returning after two weeks' absence with a friend on whom he had stumbled in the cars, found his home summarily deserted. The doors stood wide, showing the broad river from one piazza, and the wooded hills from the other; but a fragrant rustling breeze had hall and drawing-room quite to itself. A work-stand, on which was a half-finished braided frock, stood near the window, and on the open piano lay a little purple glove. Otherwise it might have been a mansion designed out of that itinerant city of the Eastern poets, or one of those little houses over the mountains old, where good children had refuge with fewfold Peace, for an amiable disposition.

"They are below," said Grant, "bent on some mischief, doubtless. Let us go and surprise them."

At that very moment Mrs. Baracole was saying to Lillian:

"How we shall astonish Grant! He has a tradition, you know, that we are not practical."

"Are you?" asked Lillian, absently, tossing the Baby (the ladies had given the kitchen a holiday, and were doing their own work).

Mrs. Baracole withdrew a couple of very floury hands from a large yellow bowl that had the appearance of having itself perfectly, and already made a pass at Lillian, who held up Baby as a shield, whereupon Baby broke into a crow, inciting the two ladies to a furious onslaught upon its mouth, neck, nose, arms, and hands, till Lillian, breaking into a sort of Tilly Slowboy chant of "Did a gentleman mean to eat its precious, precious, like a dragon as she is?" broke away from Mrs. Baracole's floury embrace, fled to the door, and, as a consequence, into Grant's arms, who was just entering thereby.

Grant caught the Baby, flung it high toward the ceiling, and, catching Lillian with his other hand, swung her around face to face with his companion.

"My dear fellow, I must know each other. Lillian, this is John Darce."

Lillian gasped and recoiled. John, grown ashy pale, said, in a harsh, grating voice, unlike his own,

"I thought you knew. We are already acquainted."

Grant and Hesperia looked at each other in dismay.

"What is it all about?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"I understand nothing of it."

Lillian looked disgusted. She could go down later with a cold, impassive face, but this at her heart must first find its way forth. He was looking so miserable, so pale and worn, and she had sinned against him! She was starving for his love, and he was starving for hers, for she knew him. He would disdain all petitions of feeling; but then submission must come first, and that was impossible. She had not the moral courage to bend.

At this point came Hesperia with some fuchias for Lillian's hair. A rare woman was Mrs. Baracole. She said nothing, but met eyes and the bottle of rose-water that she quietly placed on the dressing-table near the flowers. A little additional tenderness was all left to induce to whatever she might have thought or suspected.

John, too, had his relentings. Lillian had looked at such a time, lovely, flushed and laughing, with her wide sleeves fastened back at the shoulders, her muslin skirt pinned about her trim waist, her dainty feet with their wide bows and pointed bows; and she had so trembled and turned pale on seeing him. After all, she was not stone; and as he leaned against the piano, the recollection, sitting there alone in the little fragrant drawing-room, came in Lillian, pale and frozen in look and manner at the piano, the recollect means of avoiding a tête-à-tête; but once there some evil demon prompted her to play the value that had sounded the knell of their loving. John got up hastily and went out on the lawn, and Lillian triumphed after the fashion of women who are fond of stabbing themselves to the heart, where there is a reasonable hope of distressing thereby some friend or lover. At supper, however, her triumph was over. He came back serene as of old. There was no shade on the face that looked down upon her. Apparently no resentment or hateful kindness; so Lillian chose to term it.

In the evening her evil Vaged sent her aid in the shape of Paul Lorgen, who had followed her to G——. Lillian met him with both hands outstretched; talked with him apart in the shadow of the piazza; sang with him; suffered his crisp curls to brush her cheeks, his fingers to meet hers. John saw, and divined what he did not see, for love makes us seers; revenged himself with a single pained and pitying look that haunted Lillian all night.

The following evening Grant came back from the city alone. John was trying a new horse, and thought best to drive up by himself. "It had no fancy," he said, "for risking a neck about which wife and baby were clinging."

Grant looked at him sternly, and no John. The hills looked dim ghosts, the sky low and leaden-red, water sullen and motionless. Grant could not hide his uneasiness. Lillian was in her window in utter silence, straining her eyes out into the growing darkness. Hesperia came once and took her hand, but she drew it away quickly.

"There is no need," she said, haughtily.

The night struck on, and as the last stroke rung out from the mantle wheels came crunching up the gravel.

"It has come!" cried Grant, starting up, but Hesperia held him back, for Lillian had left the window, and was through the hall and down the steps like a sylph, crying out:

"John, is it you? Are you quite safe? We have been in such dread."

Her voice trembled, her eyes were brimming. In her excitement she had gone straight up to John and laid her hand on his arm: but when, remembering, she took to credit his name, hypocrisy seized the hand and carried it to his lips, she pulled it from him angrily.

"Let me alone!" she said. You are a human being, and therefore I rejoice that a brute has not dashed out your brains with his heels; but I am not come to you. Where is Lucian?"

Her voice rang out clear with scorn and anger on the still air. John's passing fancy for her could not but heat. Coming in with sore heart, Lillian went to her to put her arms about her, but was thrust away.

"No, I am too vexed with you. I lose all respect and liking for you, when I see you bartering your own and my self-respect for the love of such poor pride and spite. No, I will not kiss you, coax as you may. I have no patience with you."

But John was not going to be driven away of so ample a pattern that, as a rule, it covered all her neighbor's shortcomings. Lillian therefore was the more charmed by this fierce outburst, falling from a smiling sky. The next day she was so penitent that Hesperia found it hard to be austere. She forbade her to see John, and sent a peremptory engagement, leaving John and Lillian alone. Lillian would have gone to bed, but with her foot on the carriage step Hesperia had said to her:

"I am mortified at leaving Mr. Darce. You will be so kind as to remain with him till we come back."

Lillian therefore of a necessity took her work into the library. To tell the truth, she was overjoyed by Mrs. Baracole's sudden development as a shrew.

John had a book and read in it, or not at first, for Lillian watched him, but with real interest. He smiled occasionally to himself; sometimes reread a passage. He could not have done so had his wife been there. Magnetized by her looking he glanced up. At that down went her eyes demurely. She cleft ticket-holes in the blind, the only ones that they might ever spend together, were dying.

After a while,

"Shall I read out?" he asked. "Will it interest you?"

Lillian smiled sweetly,

"Oh, certainly!"

So he read to her about the Gelachians, and explained the Gelachian system, and about agriculture and more at his hardness of heart, felt her own softening rapidly. At last she laid her head down upon the table. At that John stopped.

"Does your head ache?"

"No."

"Are you sleepy?"

"Oh no!"

The no's sounded stifled, and as if issuing from the depths of a handkerchief.

"Let me show you this diagram, then," pursues this stolid John.

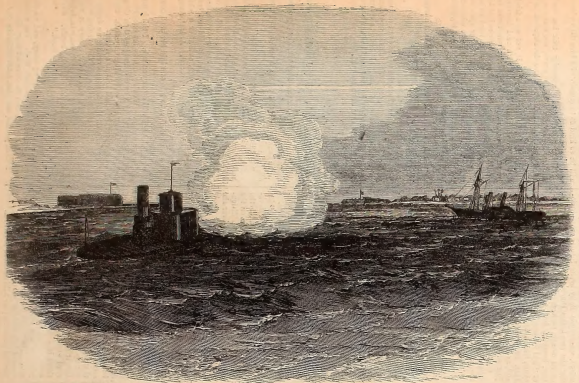
"Oh, no. I think that I understand them all."

"But this is a new one, and curious."

She must see that her lips were quivering, her bosom heaving, her eyelashes wet and glistening. At that he laid down his book and looked steadily at her till, spite of herself, she glanced at him for an instant. He held out his hands toward her. She did not give him hers, but drew them tow ard her. She took possession, and after a while kissed them, this time unreproved. At last, stooping, she kissed her forehead.

She nestled close to him and laid her head down on his shoulder.

"Oh, John, I will do as you ask. I think myself in the wrong. Won't you take me back?"

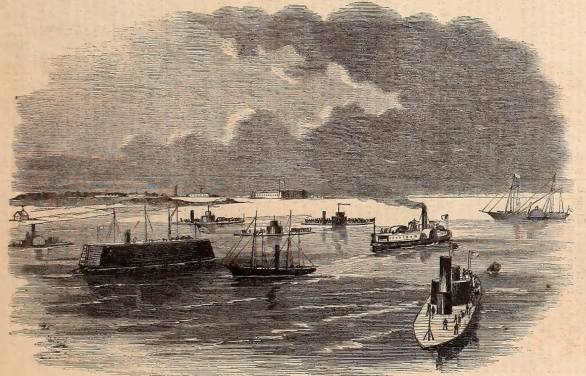


John answered by a caress, and just then Grant and Hesperia came home, looking very arch. Some time after Hesperia told Lillian a secret.

"My dear, on that famous evening we drove to the back of the house and spent the evening in the kitchen. You can't think how cheery it was: there is something so wondrously cozy in bright tins, a purring cat, and a steaming kettle. Grant wished for a lover's quartet every week."

"And John knew it."

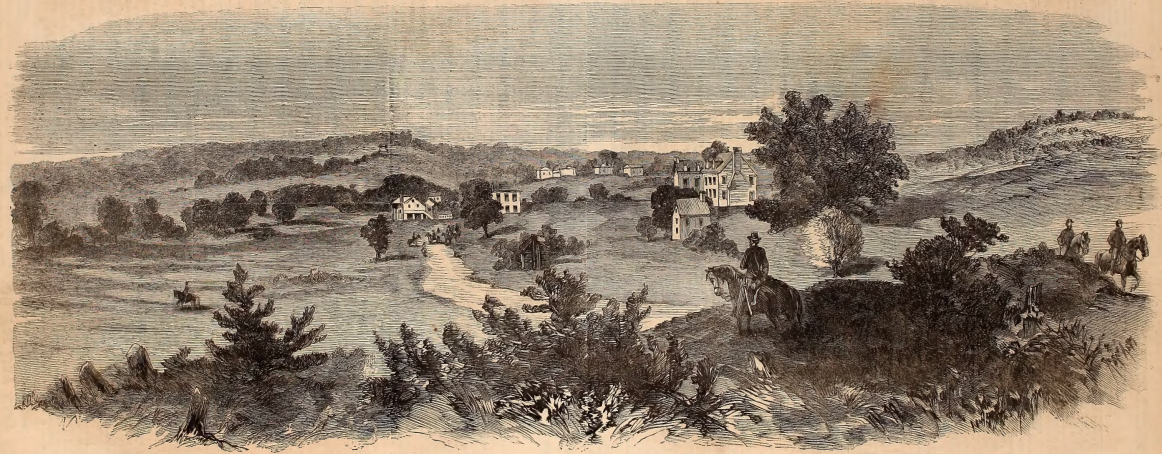
"Of course. He was going away, and we persuaded him to make one more trial. You see you were so miserable that we knew all sorry for you."



Lillian pouted, but then what could she do?

THE IRON-CLAD "CATSKILL" SINKING A BLOCKADE RUNNER UNDER SUMTER'S GUNS, JULY 19, 1863.—[SEE PAGE 551.]

UNION SHARP-SHOOTERS IN FRONT OF FORT WAGNER, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[SEE PAGE 561.]



EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS UNDER A FLAG OF TRUCE, CHARLESTON HARBOR, JULY 21, 1863.—[SEE PAGE 551.]

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT WAGNER, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[SEE PAGE 551.]

GENERAL HAUPT'S BRIDGE OVER POTOMAC CREEK, VIRGINIA, DESTROYED BY THE REBELS.

DUMFRIES, VIRGINIA.—From a Sketch by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 5

GRATIA'S FORTUNE.

"CHARLES EVERETT, —th New York —, shot through the heart!"

The new-paper dropped from Gratia Everett's nerveless hand as he eye met that one line in the ghastly list of "Killed and Wounded," and the blood receded from her cheek, leaving it whiter than a marble statue.

The morning sunshine lay on the purple violet wreaths of the Axminster carpet, and glimmered over the gilded chairs of the dainty little apartment where the young heiress sat at breakfast with her solemn old governess. She was a slight, fragile little thing with large, brilliant eyes, and cheeks just tinted with tremulous pink, like white roses stained with sunset, and her dress, of snowy muslin, tint at the waist with simple blue ribbons, seemed exactly adapted to her pure childish loveliness.

Mrs. Allaire took up the paper and scanned the columns through her gold spectacles.

"Charles Everett—so it is," she muttered. "Gone at last, poor fellow! I wonder what his wife and little ones will do. You ought to help them a little, Gratia."

"Help them? of course I will! He was my distant cousin, wasn't he, aunty?" she asked, unconsciously using the pet name by which she had known her governess for years.

Mrs. Allaire nodded her head.

"Your cousin, child—and your rival for years."

"My rival, aunty? I do not understand!"

"Your rival in the affections of old Colonel Everett, my dear. Ah, you may well look surprised—you have been heiress to this property ever since you were a child, and never knew how it came to you."

"Tell me about it, aunty," said Gratia, setting down the blue Sèvres chocolate-cup and folding her little hands tightly together.

"There is not much to tell, Gratia, only Charles was own nephew to Colonel Everett, while you were but a remote cousin. And when Charles displeased his uncle by marrying a poor young girl in spite of all his advice, and the old man was willed all the property which was to have been his nephew's to you, a babe in the cradle, there were plenty to declare it was the chocolate."

"It can injustice," said Gratia, with burning cheeks and compressed lip. "Why have I never been told this before?"

"My dear, Colonel Everett had a right to bestow his property where and how he pleased!"

"Had not Charles Everett been brought up in expectation of being his uncle's heir? Was he not the nearest blood relation, while I am but a distant connection?"

"Yes, but—"

"Now that this has not Charles laid down his life, under the crimsoned folds of his country's flag—are not his wife and children in destitution, while I am revelling in the wealth that should have been theirs? Great Heaven, that this thing should have been for years, and I not to know of it!"

Gratia had risen from her seat, and was walking up and down the room with strange fire flashing in her hazel dark eyes. Mrs. Allaire watched her with a troubled face.

Suddenly she stopped.

"Aunty, this injustice shall be repaired—this wrong shall be righted as far as in me lies. I will give this money back to the widow and the fatherless—that it should be too late to render restitution to the brave man who lies on the red field of Gettysburg!"

"Gratia—my child—are you insane?"

"No, aunty, I am only sane. Do not irritate me with useless questions and unmeaning sophistry—my mind is made up, and I wish to lose no time. Will you send for a lawyer?"

"For Mr. Southall?"

The sudden carmine blazed into the pearl-pure cheek—the eyelids drooped with momentary shyness, but it was only for a second.

"For Mr. Southall, if you like. He has always had charge of my affairs, and is perhaps the best person to speak with this emergency."

"Very well, my dear, I will do as you desire; but I am quite convinced that Mr. Southall will think with me that this is an absurd piece of Quixotism."

"He will not, aunty," said Gratia, softly, yet positively; "I know that he will not."

"Oh, dear, dear!" groaned poor Mrs. Allaire, in a conflicting tempest of annoyance and vexation; "if I had only had my foolish tongue about Charles Everett and his claims!"

But Gratia, wrapped in deep thought, had no ear for the poor old lady's lamentations.

It was a quaint old room that library, with its heavy dark furniture and vast cut-brown carpet sprinkled with scarlet and amber gleams from the stained glass window, in whose deep recess stood the round table with its chess. Was a faint odor of Russia leather in the apartment, and a strange sense of quiet rested in every nook and corner.

Gratia sat at the table, one round arm, white as carved pearl and circled with a plain band of gold, resting upon the piles of papers, and the other hand toying idly with her watch-chain, while her violet eyes were fixed full upon Warren Southall's face.

"The deed, then, gives all unconditionally to Charles Everett's widow and children—all?"

"It does, Miss Gratia."

"And it takes effect immediately?"

"Yes."

Gratia drew a deep breath of relief.

"You will see that they receive the benefit of this document as soon as possible, Sir?"

"Certainly, if you wish it. And now, Miss Gratia, another subject demands your consideration."

Gratia looked up at the dark bricht eyes fixed with such grave kindness on her childish brow, and bowed down again with a strange quiver at her heart.

It was not a handsome face—no one had ever called Warren Southall handsome—yet there was a nunulous something in the grave eyes and earnest mouth that irresistibly impelled you to turn and look after him as he passed you in the street. People had said, "What a pity, poor fellow!" when he came back from Antietam with the left sleeve fastened, empty, to his breast; but Gratia had always felt a strange secret pride in that folded sleeve—was it not a badge of the Legion of Honor brought back from the rolling clouds of battle, the very mouth of red-throated artillery?

"Another subject?" she repeated, hesitatingly.

"Yes, Miss Gratia, have you ever yourself from an heiress to a poor girl—almost a penniless girl."

"I know it," said Gratia, calmly; "I have been thinking it over, Mr. Southall. I am perfectly aware that it now becomes necessary for me to earn my daily bread. Need I say how cheerfully I shall do it?"

He bowed, almost reverentially, before the clear light of those soft hazel eyes; and she went on:

"There is not one way in which I can hope to maintain myself, and that is to go out as a governess. I know but few people, Mr. Southall; but your circle of friends is large, and even if you would interest yourself for me a little—a word of recommendation from you—"

Gratia paused to hide the tremulousness in her voice. Southall was regarding her with grave earnestness.

"I think I know of a situation for you, Miss Gratia."

"Do you?" Her face lighted up. "Oh, Mr. Southall! Do you think I could do justice to it?"

"I have not the least doubt on that head."

"But you know I am so young, so inexperienced."

"Neither of these facts would militate against you," he returned, smiling, although he had grown quite pale.

"Yet I have such a dread of going out into the world. Do you think, Mr. Southall, that you will let me, Mr. Southall—at first, you know, until I learned the nature of my duties? Would they be kind?"

"I am sure of it," he said, emphatically.

She looked at him, a little surprised.

"What is the situation?"

"As my wife," he said, as the light and love of my whole being. Nay, dearest, do not turn pale and tremble at my temerity. Will you love me? Will you trust to me? I shall never forget how you turned to woo the wealthy heiress, maimed and battle-scarred as I am; but, Gratia, I may tell you now I think you read her all these years how my love thought, when they left me for dead on the field, was of her. Dearest, I could not love you more, but this noble renunciation has taught me how to revere you still more deeply. Will you accept the 'situation,' Gratia?"

Something in her eyes had answered him ere he ceased speaking, for even as the words crossed his lips he drew her to his breast with a deep thrill of tenderness.

"My love! my little wife!"

And so on the same day that Gratia Everett gave up her worldly wealth to the children of the dead soldier she found a greater treasure in Warren Southall's heart—a treasure which neither time nor change could take from her. Truly "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

EXAMINATION IN NATURAL HISTORY.—Why does the fish-hawk build its nest in a tree?—Because it can always find a perch there.

A TOWARD of one thousand pounds is offered by a philosopher for the discovery of one single man who ever asked for a "little good advice," and then followed it.

What kind of essence does a young man like when he pops the question?—Acquiescence.

A VERY SORRY FLOWER.—The pink of politeness.

"My dear madam, can you give me a glass of grog?" asked a traveller of a landlady, requesting to be entered a cabin on the road-side. "I ain't got a drop, my dear, but I can give you a glass of water, if that will do; for you had a barrel." "Why, good gracious!" replied the woman, "what do you suppose I keep whiskey it to me and my children when we are out of milk?"

"Have you dined?" said a lounger to his friend. "I have, upon my honor," replied he. "Then," rejoined the other, "if you've dined upon your honor I fear you have made but a slight repast."

What a meaning and unique expression was that of a young Irish girl, who was asked to describe suppose an individual in one of our courts not long since. "Arrah, now," said she, "I'm about he never made his mother smile."

"How rapidly they build houses nowadays," said Enos, as he passed by a new mansion in course of erection. "I remember that building last week, and already they are putting it up higher!" "Yes," replied his friend, "and next week they'll put in the lieres."

People usually consider two hands enough for all purposes, but we recently saw a man who had got a little behind hand.

PRIVATE THOUGHT. In many cases authority is but another name for penury.

A cobbler in Spalding writes to his friends in Boston, that by a recent fire he lost his awl. We hope it won't his last.

No matter how often you may fall into the river, you won't drown if you keep your head above water.

"My dear," said an anxious father to a bashful daughter, "a friend that you shall be married, but I do not intend that you shall throw yourself away on any of the worthless boys of the present day. You must marry a man of color and mature age—one that can charm you with personal attraction. What do you think of a fine, full-figured, mature husband of fifty?" The timid, meek, blue-eyed little daughter looked in the man's face, and with the slightest possible blush of interest in her voice, answered, "I think two of twenty-five would be better, papa."

"When things get to the worst they generally take a turn for the better." This proverb applies more particularly to a tall man in a silk dress—when the can not get a new one.

"Take off your hat, man," cried a judge to an Amazon in a riding-dress. "I'm a lady," was the reply; "take off a man."—"Then," said his lordship, "I'm not a judge."

How many parts of speech are there?—It depends upon the speaker, who may sometimes divide his speech into several parts, and sometimes show a total want of parts in speaking it.

A few years since, at the celebration of an anniversary, a number of gentlemen were present, being called upon for a toast, offered the following: "Here is health to poverty—it sticks to a man when all his friends forsake him."

AN OLD SAW NEW SET.

"Come, wife," said Will, "I pray you devote
Just half a minute to mend this coat.
Which is the needle, which the thread?"
"Pie tea cholick," said his drowsy mate;
"I know not what you will with it rather late,
But it's never too late to mend."

GLUTTONY.—Here is an extract from a Preston letter:—"One of my friends at Preston had he had met a section the day before and asked him how trade was with him. The reply was, 'Well, first it was 'Yes-and-no'—next duke bayley.' 'Well, how's that?' asked the other. 'Well, thee sees,' answered the section, peevyer sudden kills. There's far more kit wi' de'e-hayrin' and de'e-drinkin' nor there is wi' de'e-pinchin'." There is truth in this.

A man in New Hampshire had the misfortune recently to lose his wife. Over the grave he caused a stone to be placed on which, in the depth of his grief, he had ordered to be inscribed, "Here lies one restless bee—therefore I sweep."

Last Sunday little Jim, three years and a half old, went to church for the first time. His mother gave him a penny to put in the contribution-box, which he did, and sat quiet for a few moments, when he wanted to know how soon the man was coming with the candy.

An officer and a lawyer were talking of a disastrous battle. The former remarked that the number of brave officers who fell on the occasion; when the lawyer observed "that those who fell by the sword must expect to die by the sword." "By a similar rule," replied the officer, "those who live by the law must expect to die by the law."

"Permit me to introduce myself," as the oyster-knife said to the shell-fish.

"Why don't you hit one of your own size?" as the tenpenny nail said to the sledge-hammer.

"This is what they call a 'fellow' feeling for a man," as the thief said when the policeman was groping for him in the dark.

The keeper of a menagerie was lately seen beating one of the monkeys with a shovel. A by-stander asked him the cause. "Why," said the keeper, "I was only whipping him all about the tent, and he's big enough to know better!"

A Dutchman was relating his marvelous escape from drowning when fourteen of his companions were lost by the upsetting of a boat, and he alone was saved.

"And how did you escape their fate?" asked one of his hearers.

"I did not co in te pote," was the Dutchman's placid answer.

AN IRISHMAN'S WILL.—"I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Bridget all my property without reserve, and to my eldest son Patrick the control of the remainder, and to Denis, my youngest son, the rest. If any thing is left it may go to Terence Mc Grath."

What is the difference between a brewer and a fire? The one boys hops and the other takes them.

An Extract from the Aug. Number of the "Little Examiner," edited by Rev. Geo. Strong.—"SODINE WATER.—In this number of the Examiner, we introduce to the attention of our readers this medical preparation. We have done so, not only here because our papers are used as a medium of advertisement—for we have uniformly declined them—but because we do God, and a sense of obligation to Dr. Anders & Co., has made us insert the following:

My only son, George F. Strong, now 37 years old, has been afflicted, from his childhood, with fits or ieis, with painful swellings and inflammations in various parts of his body; oftentimes, almost to death; he never at doubt then a respite for a season, but only for a return of the diseases with more violence. For the past three years he has had an open sore on his breast, and latterly one near his collar bone, which became so in the throat that we rapidly increasing, so that distressing to swallow, and to destitute health.—Dr. Anders & Co., Sir: By the use of the Iodine Water the ulceration in his throat disappeared in a short time. Continuing it use, in less than two months he was appreciably relieved, and his general health much improved. This son, whom I had fear-ed would fall sleep in death before this Summer should close, is very properly, in a fair way to recover so perfect health as it cannot be expected. In gratitude to God, who has thus answered prayer, and in justice to Dr. Anders & Co., I have made the statement, satisfied that my friends in the Iodine Water treatment which the readers of this magazine will thank Dr. Strong for bringing to their notice. GEO. STORE."

ADVERTISEMENTS

CAUTION.

MOFFAT'S LIFE PILLS AND PHŒNIX BITTERS.

Druggists and Medicine Dealers throughout the country are cautioned against buying or selling certain medicines, prepared by a firm calling themselves and doing business at No. 23 East 13th Street, which medicines are claimed by them to be the genuine MOFFAT'S LIFE PILLS AND PHŒNIX BITTERS.

JOHN MOFFAT & Co.,

The Court having appointed the undersigned Trustee to conduct the business for the benefit of the minor children of the late Proprietor,

DR. B. MOFFAT, deceased,

he (the Trustee) has obtained an injunction restraining the said John Moffat and Co. from making or selling the same, and he begs to assure the trade and the public that he will use every means in his power to protect them against the introduction of any

SPURIOUS ARTICLE,

purporting to be

MOFFAT'S LIFE PILLS AND PHŒNIX BITTERS.

The undersigned is the only person who is authorized or competent to manufacture these medicines. They will be compounded in strict accordance with the late

DR. MOFFAT'S ORIGINAL RECIPE, which is the only one which he has left on record.

ANDREW ANDERSON, JR., Trustee,

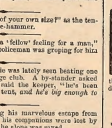
Moffat Building, 335 Broadway, and 156 Church Street, New York.

ATTENTION!

THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

4311 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $50. Trade list sent free. Address

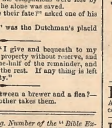
J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.



$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unrivalled, and unheard-of Gift Sale Packages, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Pocket Knives, Pocket Books, Jewelry, Perfumery, Ambrotypes, Gold Pens, Gold Pencils, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cuttings for Mechanics, Household Receipts, Camp Companions for Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Knives, Ladies' Pocket Knives, Gents' Watches, Watches and Jewelry Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Designs, Games, Many Advices, &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 50 cents each. Wonderful success in every way for, from $100 to $200 PER CENT PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand same as ever, sell, and always all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the most popular Gift Sale Packages ever offered. Agents say the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 100 for Soldiers, Fieldsmen, Whitehall Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to all parts of the army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, Express Movements, and correct to-piece presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circular, containing Extra Premium Inducements, and Terms. A. G. ELLIS MANUF'G & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

W. EVERETT & CO.,
METROPOLITAN
PURCHASING AGENCY.



We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE PURCHASABLE IN THE LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Fancy Goods, Corsets, Corge Badges, or any other article procurable in the city. We will forward, on receipt of 10 cents, Price Lists of photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, FREMONT, ROSECRANS, HOOK, BANKS, BURNSIDE, HALLECK, SLOCUM, SCHLEPS; ARMORIAL PORTER, FOOTE, DEPOSIT, or any of the leading OFFICERS in the ARMY and NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PARLOR DOMINOES.—This excellent article, being neat, durable, and a perfect model for the more expensive wooden sets, it relieves the tedium of hours passed in the Hospital. Single sets, 10 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES. 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

BARTLETT supplies the NEEDLES for all SEWING MACHINES. Needles by Mail or Express everywhere. Also the renowned BURNISHED HAND NEEDLES, 150 for 15 cents all sizes. 442 Broadway, N. Y.

MUSQUITO ALL NETS.

MUSQUITO	NEW	NETS,
MUSQUITO	BEDS	NETS,
MUSQUITO	PATENT	NETS.
MUSQUITO	CANOPIES	SHIELDS.
		SHIELDS.
		SHIELDS.

Lace At Kelty's Curtains.

LACE No. 250 Broadway. CURTAINS.
LACE LACE

Holland & Gold Window Shades

HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.
HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.

PIANO-FORTE SONGS.
Illustrating the Incidents of the War.

"The Cumberland." Song and Chorus ..... 35 cents.
"Close to Quo. Hot Work Is Here." Ditto 25
"The Soldier. Song and Chorus 25
"I'm Not Maybe Breaking Your Heart." 25
"Keep this Bible Near Your Heart." 25

CONTRABAND SONGS.

"Poor Rosy, Poor Gal." Love Ditty ..... 25 cents.
"Away Goes Coffee." Stirk-weather 25
"Darkey's Wife." Stark-weather 25
The above mailed, post-paid, on receipt of the price.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

GLASS, LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Showbills, Bulletins, and other advertising purposes, Rare and Slow Cards, with frames, to order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. Send for Circular.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something urgently needed by every person. 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents or one sample for $2. Address E. G. WALCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Family Sewing Machines, $5 to $15.
The acknowledged simplest practical Machines ever produced. Novelty Machine Co., 442 Broadway, N. Y.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S 302 Broadway, Second Store, near Canal, N. Y.
13th Established 1840. For Specimens by Mail, send two stamps.

$ AGENTS WANTED.

2 MORE NEW ARTICLES NOW ready. For Catalogue and terms send address to C. M. KELLOGG & CO., 37 Park Row, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business for life using Dr. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Stamps free for 25 cents.)

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just Published:

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $1 75.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the Author of "The Morals of May Fair," "Heart of Gold," "Wife's Verdict," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	40 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches ..	15 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	2 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
1000 Lava and Porcelain Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
1500 Gent's Breast Pins	2 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Boson Studs	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 10 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ed Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Extension	4 00 to 8 00 each.
Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one shall have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all instances by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents in each case in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate. Farms in tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Hundreds are settling. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Agent of Solon Robinson and Wilkinson Post Office. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and admirable condition for profitably farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by UNION'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Boilers charged low rates.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 56 enumerated cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flag, adorn the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

465 Broadway, N. Y., or 307 William Street, N. Y.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers discharged for wounds, entitled to bounty, we send Blank Form of Information and Application with Lists of Prizes, by enclosing address, with stamp to pay return postage. BARNES, BROWN & CO., 7 Park Place, New York, and 476 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

$75 PER MONTH guaranteed. Testimonials of character and responsibility, and scientific men sent free. ISAAC HALL, Jr. & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

Diarrhœa, Dysentery, &c.

Immediate and certain cure. HEGEMAN & CO.'S VELEPAUTA REMEDIES, which has been used with astonishing success since the cholera of 1849. Fifty cents per bottle. Sold by druggists. Prepared only by HEGEMAN & CO., No. 111, 113, and 116 Broadway, and corner 11th Street and 4th Avenue.

Piles! Piles!

Dr. Wiffield's Vegetable Pills are a CERTAIN cure for Blind and Bleeding Piles. The worst cases yield after one or two boxes. No surgical operation nor external application should be resorted to; such treatment only aggravates the disease. Testimonials from ladies and gentlemen of the highest respectability can be seen at the Office. Price 50 cents per box. Sent by mail to any part of the country. Sold at all the druggists, and by the proprietor,

J. YOUNG, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

MEEKS' CABINET FURNITURE

WAREROOMS,

No. 699 BROADWAY,

AND

333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the country, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected materials, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE now ready.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, 25, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet mailed, post-paid, for $3, containing exact copies of advertisements for persons entitled to property. Address or apply to HENRY HAYS, 649 Broadway, N. Y. Costs of arms found, painted and engraved.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "Preparation for food from Maize"

that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without litigium, with few or no eggs. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. Put up in 1 pound packages. Under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages.

For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Wholesale Depot 160 Fulton Street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

Wells & Walker's

IMPROVED

Artificial Limbs,

No. 429 Broadway,

Corner of Howard Street, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Theatre, Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 3 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest magnifying power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,

669 Broadway, New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Oregeneral will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE with HIS NAME, MARKET DISTRICT, and NUMBER upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above can represent size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to any garment. Address

J.A. MILLER C.B. 5TH N.Y.V.

Its size is 1¼ in. oval, $3 50.

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

The merits of Brandreth's Pills are often Life saving. They purify the blood, and thus supply health to every organ. They touch the elasticity of the stomach and bowels when injured by costiveness or other causes.

In Bilious Affections, Rheumatism, Debility, Sallowness, Worms, Flatulency, or Looseness (even the Summer Complaint of Children), will all be cured by this medicine, which puts not soreness into the frame but takes soreness out. Get Brandreth's Pills and you will be, as a rule, safe.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 294 CANAL STREET.
Sold at 4 Lamb's Square, and by all Dealers.
REMEMBER NEW STYLE INSURES THE GENUINE.

BLOOD'S PILLS-NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 275 Broadway, Moffett's Building, cor. Worth Street. Manufacturers of Superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for Circular.

10,000,000 GLEASON'S SAVED

KEROSENE CRATER

Will warm food for the baby, best water or steep herbs, &c., for the sick, make water hot for shaving or bathy, cook a few eggs or fry eggs, make tea and coffee, toast bread, &c., &c., in less time and expense than by any other means known. Send at once without obscuring the light. Price 25 cents; by mail, postage paid, 29 cents.

Also a Patent Lighter, for lighting lamps without removing the chimney. Price 25 cents.

E. F. GLEASON, Manufacturer,
13 Mercer Street, N. Y.

HINTS ON

Health in Armies.

For the use of volunteer officers. By JOHN OSBORNE, M.D., Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in Columbia College, New York. A new Edition, revised with important additions. 18mo, cloth. Price 50 cents. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Just published by

D. VAN NOSTRAND,
No. 192 Broadway, New York.

H. A. Harvey, 84 Maiden Lane, N.Y., Twines, Ropes, Cordage and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, Carpet Warp, Fish Lines, Hooking Cord, Lions Cord and Sargeons' Twine, Writing and Wrapping Paper, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

"PENNY TOKENS" of COPPER.—The best quality, and in any quantity, furnished at $8 per thousand by JOHN GAULT, No. 1 Park Place, 3 doors from Broadway, New York.

All orders by mail or express promptly executed.

Small Pox has already sacrificed some of our best soldiers. Protect them, listen to the voice of reason. Supply yourselves with HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT. The Pills purify the blood and strengthen the stomach, while the Ointment removes all pain, and prevents pit marks. Only 25 cents per box or pot.

Portable

Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 81 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR $1
PORTABLE COPYING PRESS.
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & CO., No. 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 cts. stamp for circular.

TIBBAL'S

Manufacturing Depot for J. A. CRANDALL'S PATENT SPRING STANDING HORSE, BABY TENDER, GIG, and PERAMBULATOR, removed to No. 512 Broadway, directly opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel. Send stamp for illustrated Circular and price list. Also Baby Rockers, Children's Carriages, Velocipedes, &c.

Accordeons and Fifinas.—Best quality, Rosewood case, 10 keys, $3; 13 keys, $4; 18 keys (double), $5; 24 keys (double), $6 to $8; 10 keys (double), $5 to $8; Flutinas, $8 to $10. Sent by Express to any part of country.

FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, New York.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

HAVENS' PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Travelers, Sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from 87 cents to $3. Sample sent free on receipt of $1 25. Send stamp for circular. The fine wholesome frame keeps it away from the face, and the thin elastic, if string, kept it down all round. It don't affect the breathing or singing, and is worth three times its price. J. HAVEN & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, as the Lights or Licenses have been sold. No 95 Nassau St., N. Y. Room No. 23. Agents wanted in all parts.

Mt. Kisco Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 6th. For circulars address Rev. J. WIGGIN, A.M., Mount Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S CHRONOMETER WATCHES NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market! The article justly deserving public attention at this time is their celebrated

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

HEAVY SOLID SILVER HUNTER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep accurate time. Price per case of half dozen, $60. By mail, $1 25 for postage if registered, 20 cents additional. A safe delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the case.

Magic Time Observers,

WITH

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A HUNTING OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it, and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the color or one being fine 18 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. Price, in a handsome morocco silk-lined case, only $35. By mail, postage 25 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Our Watches are novelties, such as are produced by no other house. Wherever offered they meet with most flattering approval, and are now generally used in nearly every portion of the country. The fame of this and our high-toning cities voluntarily contribute to our success.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Fresh Leaves, Feb. 21.

"The prettiest and most reliable Watches in the market."—Tribune, June 3.

"Unsurpassed for accurate time-keepers in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"Superb finished Watches! keep accurate time in all climates."—N. Y. Weekly, July 25.

"Unsurpassed for artistic finish."—N. Y. Scottish Americ.

"Prettiest, neat, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg Chronicle, July 27.

EF Sent by mail IN ADVANCE! Money can be sent by mail or Express. If by Express or mail, in a registered letter at our risk. Orders will also be most promptly and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers. Table Distribution, Bed 30x31. Price $2500.

Apply to ALLEN & HUESTON, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

For September, 1863.

CONTENTS:

AN UNPROTECTED FEMALE IN THE EAST.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Honorable Miss Goshington.—The Ladies' Gate.—Miladi's Return.—Lady Hester's Original Spirits.—A Tale of Horse.—At the Pyramids.—Parting with the Family.—The Family.—The Friendly Arabs.—A Ride on a Camel.—The Arab Sheikh.—A Gentleman by Figure.—Angels of Mercy.—Belinda's Blackbirds.—Belinda's Mysteries.—A Terrible Revelation.—The Die is cast.

THE PENNSYLVANIA COAL REGION.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Washington Rock.—Delaware Water-Gap.—View from Sunset Mountain.—Scranton.—Interior of Coal-Breaker.—Interior of Coal-Breaker.—Wyoming Valley.—Reading.—Sandy Valley.—Mauch Chunk.—Inclined Plane.—Easton.

THE BATTLE AND TRIUMPH OF DR. SUSAN. (Concluded.)

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF THE NEGRO SLAVE.

PAUL HAYNE'S CONFESSION.

THE STATESMANSHIP OF SHAKSPEARE.

ONCE UPON A TIME.

BADOLA. By the Author of "ADAM BEDE."
CHAPTER LXII. The Benefaction.
CHAPTER LXIII. Rippling Stones.
CHAPTER LXIV. The Prophet in his Cell.
CHAPTER LXV. The Trial by Lots.
CHAPTER LXVI. A Masque of the Furies.
CHAPTER LXVII. The Jaws of the River.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Wooden Pulpit.—"Will his Eyes open?"

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.
CHAPTER XXXII. The Wounded Fawn.
CHAPTER XXXII. Pawkins' in Surrey Street.
CHAPTER XXXIII. "I'll be True with you."
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Wounded Fawn."—Won't you take some tea?

MY OPERATION IN GOLD.

MISTRESS GOWAN AND HER SON.

THE MYSTERY OF THE RIVER.

IN MEMORIAM.—F. B. C.

FIVE YEARS AGO.

PARSON RUSSELL'S SECRET.

THE CAPTAIN OF A LONDON YACHT.

HARBOR DEFENSE.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

SOME OF THE SHODDY ARISTOCRACY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Clothing in March, 1863.—Flour in 1860 and 1863.—Broken Bucks in 1860 and 1863.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Riding Dress.—Children's Dresses.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for one Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

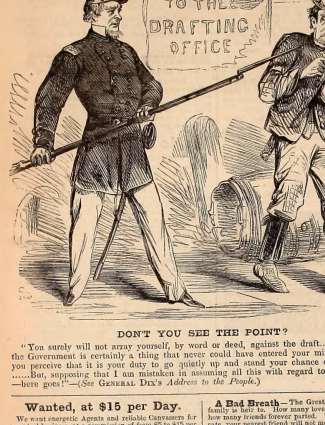
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.



TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

Specimen Numbers.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

DON'T YOU SEE THE POINT?

"You surely will not array yourself, by word or deed, against the draft……Resistance to the Government is certainly a thing that never could have entered your mind……Of course you perceive that it is your duty to go quietly up and stand your chance of being drafted……But, supposing that I am mistaken in assuming all this with regard to you; why, then —here goes!"—(See GENERAL DIX'S Address to the People.)

Wanted, at $15 per Day.

We want energetic Agents and reliable Canvassers for a genteel business, at a commission of from $8 to $15 per day. No humbug! Address U. M. DUNN & CO., Publishers, at Cincinnati, O., Chicago, Ill., or 165 Broadway, N. Y.

WATCHES FREE.

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making nearly $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL and UNIQUE, and unlike all the old styles; containing OIL NEW Articles, and of finest quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Army Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., all in one thing for a few $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friends in the Army. No family should be without one. Prints immense, sales quick. Soldiers can engage one and do goods, and make money fast. Agents, SOLDIERS AND WAITS, interested in a perfect lose-burger, you needed Price to all Agents. Package in sealed envelope, sent to all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing full and true documents. See "15 per day Easy" on inside page.

S. C. HICKADDS & CO., 103 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

LANDS.—To all wanting Farms. Thriving Settlement. Rich soil. Mild climate. See advertisement of Vineland, on previous page.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Agents and Soldiers.

Wanted everywhere. From $5 to $15 a day guaranteed. Send your name and the names of your friends.

$27 I will pay any person $5 for each extra name they send that will act as an agent. Write plain the names, Post-Office, County and State; if a Soldier, the name, company, regiment, and location. Address

P. S. NORTON,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.

10 COLLARS FOR 40 CENTS.

THE GENUINE CLOTH-LINED PAPER COLLAR, At Wholesale and Retail.

Gents Furnishing Goods.

I have the largest and best selected stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars wholesale and retail.

SHIRTS

MADE TO ORDER.

The perfe ct ey establishment. In this department, I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always enabled to give work that will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.

NO FIT! NO SALE!

Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on

CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
675 Broadway, N. Y.

6 for	$13
6 for	15
6 for	18
6 for	21

Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.

Lafarge block.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is a delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. The effect of topical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentrifice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, by clearing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists. H. P. FETRIDGE & CO., 41 and 43 Dey Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

GREAT TRIUMPH.

STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Wither Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. There were two bronze and sixty-nine piano fortes from all parts of the world entered for competition.

The special correspondent of the New York Times says:

"Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by Jaell and Jaeues is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

Gold Pens and Cases, Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' Pens	$ 75	Engraving Pens	$2 00
Med. "	75	Union "	2 50
Large "	1 00	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Commercial Eureka	2 25
Large Pattern "	1 50	Mammoth Eureka	3 00

The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last (10) Ten years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen now in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, below purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact sizes and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.

Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.

C. S. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 15 Maiden Lane,
New York City.

Remington's

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Seiphe's Patent, 616 Broadway, N. Y., are the best substitutes for lost limbs the World of Science has ever invented. (Established 1839.) Send for Pamphlet. Soldiers supplied.

"The Drummer Boy

Is a story of Burnside's Expedition to North Carolina —a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and royal incident. The life and entusiasms of the young boys is painted in vivid colors."—New York Evening Post.

Published by J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all Bookstores.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 50 cts. coin postpaid, magnifying small objects 500 times. Five different powers for $1 60. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 970, Boston, Mass.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses, a charming and perfectly natural color for the cheeks, or lips. Will not wash off, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with vinegar and hot water. Sent to any part of the United States by mail, free from observation for one dollar and 18 cts. HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 119 E. Seventh St., Philad.

$22. WATCHES. $22.

A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.

$22. Genuine. $22.

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, IMPORTER OF WATCHES,
289 Broadway, New York.

Attention, Army and Navy!

50,000 Agents Wanted.

Army Corps and Division Pins.

American Watches, Diamond Sparkling Lockets, Guard and Neck Chains, Bracelets, Seal Stone, Masonic, California Diamond, Plain and Chased Rings, Fine Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Case and Pencil, Gents' Fine Gold California Diamond Pin and Cluster Pins with Chain attached, Coral Ear Drops, Lava, Mosaic, and Jet Enamelled Brooches and Ear Rings, Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, a Solid Silver Cross, and Regiment handsomely engraved upon your Name, Co., and Regiment handsomely engraved upon it. I will send to any one, on the receipt of $1, either of the above articles, together with my wholesale circular to Agents.

H. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
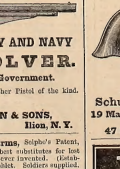
Box 6876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They strengthen the system and cure the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhaustof nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with a pleasure at all times by any one regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE & CO.,
202 Broadway, New York.



$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 28 & 30 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined many very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

National Union League.

League Pins in Silver Plate, Fine Gold Plate, and Solid Silver Plate: from $6 to $12 per doz. Sample doz. sent by mail pre-paid, upon receipt of $5 00, or a single pin in fine gold plate upon receipt of $1 00. Our assortment is very fine. Many of the pins have been adopted by different organizations throughout the country. Also a complete assortment of Army Pins Buttons.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,
Manufacturers Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane and 22 John Street. N. Y.,
15 rue d'Enghien, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to dealers.

Agents wanted throughout the country.

[First Published August 1, 1863.]

Lloyd's Great County Map

OF THE

Whole United States,

Including California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, Colorado, with all the other Territories, and showing the new State of West Virginia, in the largest, latest, and cheapest Map of the United States ever issued to illustrate our whole country and the war. It is colored by counties.

AGENTS MUST SEE FOR THEMSELVES.

Price, in sheets, 50 cents, postage free.

Henry Bound, Patchboard Edition, $1 25.

27 OUR NEW AGENTS' LIST IS READY.

Address H. H. LLOYD & CO.,
21 John Street, N. Y.

DR. C. S. SEA. M.D. with 18 years' success—Rooms for Non-residents. Correspondence confidential. 232 North Bond Street, Baltimore, Md.

"Noses Illustrated."

THE AUGUST DOUBLE Number PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, containing Noses of Americans, Englishs, Irish, French, German, Hungarians, Russians, Indians, Negroes, &c., portraits and characters of General Meade, Commodore Foote and Colbreth, with thirty illustrated engravings on Ethnology, Physiology, Phrenology, and Physiognomy—new volume. Only 15 cents, by first post, or $1 50 a year. FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, N. Y.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Unrivalled Stereoscope and Stereoscopic Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $3; or with 6 Stereoscopic Views, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $8. Address,

HENRY C. LEE,
150 Centre Street, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

Soldiers and Everybody!

A Great Book for you.

"The Soul is Beauty, Health, and Fortune!"

Over 1000 Thousand Sold Already.

Mailed free for 25 cents.

Address "Union Book Association."
Box 303 Syracuse, N. Y.

27 Agents wanted.

AGENTS WANTED for our Popular NEW Mammoth Lithic Print Package. 100 per cent. profit. Sells on Watch free to Agents. $18 per day made. Send for new Circulars. W. H. CALLIS & CO., 6 Ann St., N. Y.

American Watches For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of Britain and Switzerland, now with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for pocketing and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the tin-hanged Aurora and Lepine of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published:

LIFE ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. By "Frances Anne Kemble." 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 12mo. Vol. I. just ready. Price, $1 00.

AFRICAN HUNTING FROM NATAL TO THE ZAMBESI, including Lake Ngami, the Kalahari Desert, &c., from 1852 to 1860. By WILLIAM CHARLES BALDWIN, F.R.G.S. With Map, Fifty Illustrations by Wolf and Zwecker, and a Portrait of the Great Sportsman. Small 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "One of Them," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," "Maurice Tiernay," "The Daltons," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 349.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MOSEBY'S GUERRILLAS DESTROYING SUTLERS' TRAIN.—[SEE PAGE 567.]

WHERE ARE THE COPPERHEADS?

Go look upon the battle-field,
Where shot and shell fly fast—
Where Freedom's stirring battle-cry
Is heard upon the blast:
Go where the lifted sabres flash
And fall on traitor crests,
Where Southern bayonets are dim
With blood from Northern breasts:
Go search amid the loyal ranks—
Among the glorious dead—
Among them all you will not find
A single Copperhead.

Go search the gun-boat's bloody deck
When the dread conflict's done;
The traitor's banner in the dust,
And silenced every gun;
While o'er the hard-won rampart floats
Our flag, yet oh! what pain,
'Neath that dear flag since morning light
How many have been slain!
Among the heroes of the fight,
The living and the dead—
Go search among them—there is not
A single Copperhead.

Go search the crowded hospital,
Where ghastly wounds are seen,
Which tell through what a struggle fierce
Those noble men have been;
But look upon their faces, lo!
They wear through all their pain;
The scars they bear were nobly won—
Their honor has no stain.
Soft hands are ministring—kind words
Are heard around each bed;
Some soothe, some suffer, all are true—
There is no Copperhead.

Go where the look can scarce conceal
The tension of the heart,
And where the tongue would willingly
Defend the traitor's part;
Where Seymour, Wood, and Voorhees are Deemed patriotic men:
Go where they wish Vallandigham
Were safely back again:
Go where desertion is no crime—
Where loyalty is dead—
Where sad disaster gives no pain;
There is the Copperhead.

Go where foul scorn is heaped upon
Our noble boys, who go
To stand a wall of fire between
Us and our traitor foe:
Go where bold Grant's revilers are—
Where Burnside is defamed;
Where Banks and Butler—noble names!—
In scorn alone are named:
Go where true patriotic pride,
Honor, and Truth are dead—
Where our success brings but despair;
There is the Copperhead.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1863.

THE ANGLO-REBEL IRON-CLADS.

WE were months ago forewarned that several powerful iron-clad steamers were building in Great Britain for the rebels. There was every antecedent reason for believing the statement. There is nothing which English manufacturers will not make and English merchants will not sell for money. The shipbuilds of the Himbers are a regular article of manufacture in Birmingham, and if a new car of Juggernaut were wanted it would be got up in Liverpool—for a consideration—on the shortest notice. The cotton-loan, so confidingly taken by British capitalists, placed a large amount of money in the hands of the rebel agents, and every body knew precisely for what purposes these were to be used. We are now assured upon competent authority that three of these vessels are nearly ready for sea. One of them was a fortnight ago in the Graving Dock at Liverpool, fully plated, with almost all of her machinery on board; another had just been launched at Birkenhead, and a third at Glasgow. It was a matter of perfect notoriety for what service these were designed, yet no step was taken to interfere with their construction, and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that any practical obstacle will be thrown in the way of their sailing. Iron-plated and furnished with gun-turrets and ram, as they are, the British Government will have no means of knowing that they are intended for vessels of war; they may be designed for commerce. Or, if they are vessels of war, they may have been built for the King of Dahomey, the Viceroy of Egypt, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, or any other peaceful potentate; certainly not, "as far as Government has any official information," for the so-called Confederate States. Or, even if built for the purpose of making war upon the United States, it is very doubtful whether Her Majesty's Government could interfere with the lawful business of her rebels: and surely the building of ships is a very lawful business. We have nothing to look for from the good faith of the British Government.

When the enterprise was undertaken, it was supposed that these vessels could inflict damage upon us compared with which that inflicted by the Alabama and the Florida are nothing. Our blockading fleets could be destroyed, and our great cities laid in ashes. There was nothing, it was said, which could prevent one of these vessels from steaming in broad daylight into the harbor of New York, and repeating upon a larger scale the exploits of the Merrimac in Hampton Roads. And so far as our fortifications is concerned this is perfectly true. But recent events have shown that we have at our disposal means of rendering our harbors perfectly secure from attack from these vessels. That protection is to be found in "Ericsson batteries." Put to a service for which they were never designed, the severity of the trial to which they have been exposed has demonstrated their perfect availability for harbor defense. The vessels which bore almost unharmed the fire of the hundreds of guns of the Charleston forts can bid defiance to the fire of any vessel that floats. The guns whose first shot disabled the Atlanta may be relied upon for doing a like service to any other vessel, under the far more favorable circumstances in which they will be brought into play.

The harbor of New York can not be entered except through a channel of less than one-third of a mile in width. Unless a single Monitor is quietly moored in mid-channel a hostile vessel must sail, broadside on, within an eighth of a mile from the muzzles of those terrible guns looking grim out from their impregnable and wholly invulnerable tower. The Monitor itself would need no manœuvring. She might lie at rest, the revolving of the turret always keeping her guns trained upon the enemy. Or if by miracle the enemy should pass her, she would hoist anchor and steam alongside of her antagonist, delivering her fire against both sides. Long before the enemy could pass the miles between the Narrows and the city she would lie a mass of harmless iron on the bottom of the harbor.

In building so many Monitors, and arming them with such heavy ordnance, our Government was simply preparing for the future. It will be only when they shall have prevented or repelled an attack upon our commercial metropolis that we shall appreciate the true significance of Timby's revolving turrets, Ericsson's raft-like hulls, and Dahlgren's heavy guns, combined into one harmonious whole. The wise Greek saw that the true protection of Athens lay in her "wooden walls." The true defense of our city lies in our iron walls. The month of September is the time fixed upon for the departure of the rebel iron-clads from the British ports. We trust that long before they can threaten us a sufficient number of the Monitors will be released from their present duty in the South to enable our Government to station several of them in each of our great harbors.

The true peril to us from the rebel iron-clads lies not in the danger of an attack upon our cities, but in their power of destroying our blockading fleet. To obviate this the two or three ports yet in the hands of the rebels must be captured. This done the blockaders may be withdrawn until we can have disposed of the vessels with which our British friends have so inopportunely furnished our enemies. In many respects appearances we may infer that they will not "see their way" to add to these favors. Mean while we must be prepared for them. We shall most likely be able to pay in due time. The "common barrator" of nations will be untrue to all her historical antecedents if she remains long without a bribe in her own hands. And then we shall remember some things which she would like us to forget.

THE LOUNGER.

A RETROSPECT.

THE correspondence which passes many persons in the Free States and Jefferson Davis, before the rebellion, is a most valuable addition to the interior history of the war. It is another link in the chain of evidence that the rebel leaders believed the sentiment of patriotism and loyalty to law to be so utterly destroyed that they could easily take possession of the Government upon their own terms. The plan was for the Slave States to withdraw—to have clear breathing room—and then, tone up the domestic strife, to crave admission into the new confederacy. Then, as Mr. Hunter remarked, New England could be left out altogether, or admitted as a single State.

It was in this view that certain papers recommended the Montgomery Constitution as superior to that of 1787. It was with this intention that private meetings were held in the city of New York, among those who are now notorious Copperheads, to secure the co-operation of the "conservatives" in the North with the "secessionists" of the South, knowing, as they knew very well, that "abolitionism" could not be counted upon for deliberate treason. It was this conviction which explains the equanimity of the gentlemen of property who hastened to take possession of Mr. Russell upon his arrival in this country, and told him that the revolution was virtually accomplished. It was this that explains such letters as that written by Mr. Barlow, of New York, to a slave Senator, during the secession movement, warning him against any overt attack upon the Government. The feeling which inspired such letters governed Jeff Davis in refusing to seize Washington when it was at the mercy of five hundred men. The confident expectation of all these persons and correspondents of Davis, who are now either rebels or Copperheads, was that the Government of the United States would tumble down as that of Louis Philippe did in France, and that an immediate reconstruction would follow, upon conditions to be dictated by the Seceders and ratified by the "Conservatives," in which class were included all Democrats of every hue, the conservative Republicans, and the mass of timid citizens, who were held to be the vast majority in a community of traders.

The tacit collusion with Davis and his confederates of those gentlemen in the city of New York who are now notorious Copperheads has been long in evidence. That of similar persons in other parts of the country is now proved by the correspondence which Davis in exile—so wily a conspirator as not to have destroyed. And it is not surprising that he believed his task would be both easy and speedily accomplished. He and his confederates had labored long and hard to corrupt the conscience and common sense of the country, and they had every reason to believe that they had the proof of general assent to national dishonor and ruin. That history and human nature should not have warned them to beware is again not surprising, for among the leading rebels and Copperheads there is not a single man of great intellectual grasp or moral perception. Mr. Douglas, who was unquestionably the ablest man of their political fraternity, was totally incapable of divining the meanness of their plot, or he would have been at the head of it. The assertion of Senator like Douglas for leaders like Wood, Vallandigham, Pendleton, and Sidell, was a fatal error for any party which aimed at peaceful subversion of the Government. But it is not surprising that these men did not see it. They believed only in political chicane. They scorned principle. They repudiated all ideas except that men would under all circumstances be governed by a selfish desire of quiet; and they were very sure that the mass of people at the North hated something else. So they called them, and Copperheads call now, Abolitionism, more than they loved their country or its government. Like all boasting folly" prudence they omitted common sense in their calculations. They saw trade, corruption, servility, and craven fear, but they did not see human nature. With the contempt which Metternich in Belgium they thought the "sumon" of the Reverend Van Dyke, of Brooklyn, a marvelous production, but the writing on the wall was plain and conciseas was nonsensical scribbling.

Let Davis and his friends learn the lesson which this correspondence teaches. They have found that the Copperheads did not then represent the spirit and interest of the people. They do not represent them now. They are the desperate, wrecked, struggling men who would willingly capsize the boat. But let Davis remember that they are overboard.

THE FABLE OF THE BATS.

We had not heard of our "Conservative" friends since they elected Mr. Seymour last autumn until the riots in New York, during which a merchant wrote to a friend in another city: "The Conservatives had the upper hand here for a day or two, but we hope to have them under by to-morrow night." It was a strictly correct statement, because, of course, every man among the rioters who voted last autumn voted for the "Conservative" ticket; and if the mob had been polled at the moment of quelling the riots the Orphan Asylum would have declared itself unanimously for the "Conservative" platform.

Supposed in New York "Conservatism" has raised its head in Rochester, and proposes to arrange for the next Presidential election. Its resolutions are a fair index to its total want of sympathy with "secession, abolitionism, or nativism of any kind." General Leslie Coombs, whose name is also conspicuous for unconditional patriotism, is reported to have manipulated and "modified" the resolutions. Probably General Leslie Coombs is the "Conservative" friends, who were ardent supporters of the eminent patriot, and enforcer-of-the-laws, John Bell, at the last election, pronounced the "unconditional" friend of the same kind of "fidelity to the Government" as Mr. Bell. Can "Conservative" friends, who eschew "secession and abolitionism," have possibly begotten a little fable of which we beg respectfully to remind them?

A company of bats once found themselves in broad daylight in disagreeable proximity to two belligerent parties grinding corn. "What a confounded clatter!" cried they. "Why don't the stones stop and let us have some peace? We want no such noise." But they were answered as noisily as ever. The poor bats, bumping and fluttering wildly between them, at last cried in chorus, "We wish it to be understood that we are not responsible for this din. We declare to all the world that we have, have had, and will have nothing whatever to do with either of these stones, and we protest against such great, loud, gritty things." But while they were still crying and fluttering they fell against the lower stones and were ground to powder in an instant. "Poor little bats," said the eagle who had overheard them, "they did not know that it is the whirring of millstones that corn is ground into food."

THE CONSCRIPTION.

THERE is a way of speaking of the Conscription Act as if it were something monstrous and tyrannical. This strain was a favorite one in Mr. Fernando Wood's rhetoric before he came to the wise conclusion that if there were to be a war it must be conducted upon warlike principles. But a very few words will show exactly the character and intent of the act.

The nation is engaged in a tremendous struggle to save its life. The struggle can be maintained in one way only, namely by armies. In the salvation of the country and Government every citizen is equally interested, and the duty of each is the same. Upon all sides the Government hears and has heard, with few exceptions, the expression of the most unswerving devotion and the strongest resolution to subdue the rebellion by arms. It therefore says to the loyal people of the country: "We hear you, and we believe you. We take you at our word, and we will arrange a plan by which every man can give his personal aid in securing victory. All fighting men shall be enrolled and held subject to active duty, with such exceptions as careful and humane consideration may prescribe."

That is the spirit of the Conscription Act. It assumes that the people are willing to save themselves at any cost and risk. If Congress had not believed that, and therefore assumed it, it should have frankly confessed that we were conquered, and have proposed submission to the victors. But not believing that we were conquered it would not say so. If Congress were mistaken, the mistake will appear in resistance to the conscription. If we are conquered, our defeat will be shown by refusal to obey the call of necessity and duty. But if we are resolved that civil order, a just government, and a great nation shall be preserved, every man will gladly go and do wherever and whatever the lawful authorities may require.

GENERAL DIX.

THE address of General Dix upon occasion of the draft in the city of New York is worthy of the man who, as Secretary of the Treasury, ordered the man who pulled down the United States flag to be shot upon the spot. Its calm and judicious exposition both of the particular facts and of the general principle of the draft make it a document to be preserved and remembered. The law, he says, under which the draft is made is founded on the principle that every citizen who enjoys the protection of the Government may be summoned in seasons of great public danger to take up arms for the common defense. No political society can exist unless this principle is acknowledged, and there is no civilized country in which it is not recognized. The law, by permitting to furnish a substitute or to purchase exemption is designed to provide for cases of hardship, and if either provision were stricken out those cases would be multiplied.

In regard to riots General Dix says most truly, that the only security of those who have little more than their life at stake lies in their ability to protect lies in the supremacy of the law. And this truth applies especially to us, for the Government is the will of the people. Our supreme where the law is the will of one man, or of one class, it is conceivable that it may come to bear so unjustly upon other classes as to leave them reasonable hope of redress but in forcible resistance. But that can not be the case with us.

General Dix's record in this war has been most honorable. His course has been quiet, consistent, and firm. His experience in Baltimore has taught him the substantial facts of the Southern allies of the rebellion, and revealed to him the radical nature of the contest. His appointment to the Department of the East was conclusive evidence of the discretion and determination of the Government.

STATE RIGHTS.

THERE is a plausible objection made to emancipation as a necessary result of the war, upon the ground that slavery is a State institution, and to destroy it by the national will is to invade the rights of States, which nobody wishes to see overthrown.

But, without urging the right of any imperiled people to suspend any law and every right for the sake of the common safety, it is plain that such emancipation does not limit any State right, except in declaring that no State can be allowed to maintain a system upon which overturns menaces the national peace. There can be no right to hold slaves, whatever the State law may be, any more than there can be any right to hold a man harmless to death, although the State law might allow it. The power of a majority to declare that any thing is right, and to do it, must be always possible; but no power can beget the right to do wrong. The corroding vice of Douglas's famous squatter-sovereignty doctrine was that it empowered State force and the vote of a majority to dispose of natural rights, which are indienable.

Slavery is a wrong recognized and sustained by State law. Its necessary development presently brings the whole nation into mortal danger. How, then, stating altogether the constitutional right to destroy it as a measure of public safety, a nation which had once declared slavery to be piracy could prevent the danger might obviously do whatever was necessary to avoid a recurrence of precisely the same peril. Nor could any State complain of its injured rights. No State can have a right to threaten the nation. A man upon a steamboat has no more right to be in possession of a loaded barrel of gunpowder in his cabin, but he has no right to stow a keg of gunpowder under his berth. Now that we have practically discovered that slavery is gunpowder, we shall be guilty of suicide if we permit ourselves to be blown up.

TO THE BITTER END.

WHEN the war began we certainly did our share of boasting. But the rebels are better Gascons than we. When we reshaped our policies when we found that the task was stubborn. But the rebel rhetoric rises with disaster. Just now, when the prospect of the rebellion is not promising, the celebrated last ditch is incessantly brought forward. "Let Sumter fall," cry the rebel papers—"Charleston shall be defended street by street, and house by house, and at last it shall be blown up, and the invader welcomed to smoking ruins." If it should be it would be one of those catastrophes to which there is very general resignation. The loyal people of this country do not, as do poor Simms lately sings, "hate" the city of Charleston; but as they do not hate the ancient Sodomite, yet regard the fate of the city of Sodom with equanimity, so the destruction of the city of Charleston would be so symbolical that they would contemplate its smoking ruins in a just judgment.

But it is a symbol which we should not make for our own satisfaction, despite the lyric assertions of the poet Simms, and our Gascon friends the enemy have given us no reason to suppose that they will keep their valorous word. Why did they not blow up New Orleans, or Nashville, or Newbern, or any of the cities which old Abe's minions have actively invaded and occupied? Simply because they knew it would be an extremely foolish and even perilous thing to do. It is possible that the paper make an exception of Charleston, the fostering head of secession. But it is not probable. He is doubtless a wise prophet who writes—"The rebels will not surrender either Charleston or Savannah to the Union forces, but will commit them to the flames and destruction," precisely as they have done in the cases of Vicksburg and Port Hudson."

A SIDE-LIGHT.

We can not too constantly bear in mind the real sympathies of public men at this time, and a little repetition is of the utmost service. Thus it is instructive to observe the precise position occupied by the worthy Mr. Seymour, and a side-light of great brilliancy is occasionally thrown upon it, as recently by Mr. S. Cox of Ohio, familiarly known as Sunset Cox. Mr. Cox is the special friend of Mr. Vallandigham, whose position has the effect of being perfectly defined; and in urging the election of his friend as Governor of Ohio he said that if, after his election, Governor Vallandigham could not appeal, Lieutenant-Governor Pugh would march at the head of the militia, a hundred and fifty thousand strong, to the Columbus Statehouse, bring home the patriot to his chair, "and none will dare to hinder him." "Then," continued the florid orator, with McClellan's vote for elected in 1864, we will put the Government again upon an honorable footing." He meant, of course, under an honorable footing, namely, the feet of Davis and Company.

It appears, then, that the next friend of Mr. Vallandigham for Governor is also the advocate of Mr. Seymour for President—a fact which is more instructive than interesting.

FAIR WAGES FOR FAIR WORK.

It is stated that the troops of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts regiment decline to receive wages of ten dollars a month when other soldiers get thirteen. It seems that there is some interpretation of some law by which these men are held not to be soldiers if contraband, or some kind of something which is not to be paid full wages for its services.

That this absurdity will continue is, of course, impossible. That the Government means honorably to the soldiers of every kind and color, we know; and that some snarl of red tape must be untied before we can act simply and honestly in this matter is very possible. But the point is the very plain. If we gravely propose to pay such soldiers as assaulted Port Hudson and Fort Wagner, and charged upon the rebels at Milliken's Bend, less than other soldiers, we propose to insult them and to dishonor ourselves. It is idle to suppose that such men are to be bamboozled. They know quite as well as we whether their fighting is worth as much as that of other soldiers or not. If it is, and they are not paid as much, they will naturally object.

The thing to be done is to remove immediately every imputation to their fair payment. The greater thing to be done is to show the men who so bravely dare and die for us, that we are worth fighting for, that we do cordially acknowledge their services, and that whatever the difference of our complexion and capacity may be, our manhood is equal to theirs. The slowness, the delay, and the bitterness with which we have accepted the assistance of such soldiers will be recorded with shame and sorrow hereafter. "The question," said General Mitchell, just before he went to Charleston, "is not as to whether we should call upon the blue people, as whether they will believe we mean honestly by them when we do call." The least we can do is to pay fairly for fair work.

THE NEW GOSPEL OF PEACE.

THE authorship of the new "Gospel of Peace," one of the most political republications of the week, is well-kept secret. It is a broad, popular, humorous burlesque upon the Copperhead faith and practice, as exemplified in the career of Pharaoh and the followers of that Brummagem Prince of Peace. It is done so well that nobody can escape the point; and as it is done in the very few sixties which editor themselves to the universal public. A Paddee can enjoy it as fully as a cultivated scholar, and it is consequently of the greatest service to the good cause. The authorship is attributed to many well-known literary gentlemen, as "The Lorgnette" was at the time of its appearance; and the writer must take care that his laurels are not disputed to the end. The reviewing controversy as to the authorship of "Nothing to Wear" is yet freshly remembered, and long after Mr. Putnam, the publisher, had negotiated with the gentlemen whom he supposed to have written "The Fetishar Papers," he received a very urgent and persistent claim from the literary executor of a gentleman in Buffalo, who declared that he had found the manuscript among the papers of his deceased friend, and insisted that the reputed author must be an impostor.

Public rumor points most persistently to a well-known and accomplished scholar, whose reputation has been made in quite other directions, as the author of the new "Gospel of Peace." He may be congratulated upon a signal success, and the public upon a capital and timely satire.

WIGFALL.

A CORRESPONDENT, "NEK," asks, "What has become of Wigfall?" His last public performance in our knowledge was waving his white handkerchief to Major Anderson on the day of the rebel bombardment of Sumter, entering the fort, drinking a glass of liquid with which he had entirely engulfed, the surgeon of the fort politely, but in pure jest, informed him was rank poison, then entreating physicians to save the stomach pump applied, to which the surgeon generously assented. History takes leave of Wigfall at an unprecedented moment in his career—the stomach pump was coming out of his mouth instead of going into it. The appearance, performance, and disappearance of Wigfall upon the scene of public affairs in this country are all equally absurd. In the Senate of the United States he was the merest cumberer, for the rebel councils and army he has made no mark whatever. Like many of the other leaders of this rebellion, a second-rate fop, he is Yancey, Pryor, Floyd, Wise, Spratt, Rhett, Keitt, and Orr, he has been practically obliterated by its development. The admirers of the statesmen of 1861, however, may console themselves by reflecting that he has made himself even more contemptible than infamous.

COPPERHEAD LOGIC.

"In this great crisis of the country's history" says a newspaper of that class that the policy of the war shall be abandoned, and the rebels be permitted to return unconditionally to their places in the Union, "the Constitution as it is, and preserves the republic, who is most free from the taint of selfishness." Therefore, it argues, let us make Fernando Wood Speaker.

The grounds are three-fold: first, his patriotism; second, his sweet reasonableness; third, his freedom from the taint of selfishness. Not to put too fine a point upon it, if these are the reasons for electing him, we do not see why he is not elected. The truth is, if Jefferson Davis has taught us in these bloody years nothing more than to confide in Fernando Wood, we deserve to have him for Speaker.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL JOE JOHNSTON, on a recent visit to Mobile, declared it to be "one of the most important points in the Confederate States," and that "Mobile is to be defended to the last."

From the Southwest we hear that the mountains Northern Alabama are filled with deserters from the Army of Braxton Bragg, and that Huntsville is utterly cleared of guerillas.

Colonel Carpenter, commanding a Missouri regiment of artillery, telegraphs to head-quarters at St. Louis, from Greenville, Wayne County, that he was attacked by the rebel Colonel Coffee August 18, and that the rebels were severely handled. Coffee's force was completely routed, with the loss of thirty or forty killed and a number wounded.

A considerable number of rebel conscripts have recently reported at Corinth for duty in the National army. This is a cheap way for Uncle Sam to get his hands.

A messenger from General GRANT has reached Washington, with dispatches announcing the capitulation in the Mississippi. The General is said to favor the opening of the cotton trade to all loyal citizens, under proper restrictions, and to recommend the authorities to adopt this policy, which would, he thinks, bring an immense influx of loose cotton away.

A small squad of rebels made a dash into Poolesville, in Maryland, August 14, and captured the telegraph operator and his instruments, which they carried away with them. They proceeded to rob some of the stores, when the operator made his escape. The rebels then left Poolesville, and came from Virginia, but belong in Maryland, and do not live far from Poolesville. They were about six miles in the day time, and practice midnight robberies under the cloak that they belong to the Army of Virginia. A small number of Mosby's guerrilla attempted to attack one of the pickets stationed at Alexandria for the purpose of stealing some horses, but being fired upon by the pickets they ingloriously skedaddled. The rebels were commanded by Mosby in person.

A dispatch to the Chicago Times, dated Winchester, Tennessee, August 25, says that the rebel Gen. Bell has hurried retreat over the Tennessee River fired the suspension bridge, and destroyed the railroad track, completely two spans on this side of the river. Discovering this preparations were made to cross the river with a strong force advanced, on the night of August 14, and destroyed the bridge.

General HOOKER is expected soon to resume active service. He will be assigned to the command of a corps in the Army of the Potomac. He has of late been busily engaged in the preparation of the reports of operations as the commander of the Army of the Potomac.

A Court of Inquiry is to meet at Montgomery to investigate the conduct of Generals Bragg, Polk, Hardee, Hindman, May, June, and July, and especially to inquire into the causes of the defeat at Chickamauga.

Advices were received at head-quarters in St. Louis on the 25th from Fort Smith, Arkansas, stating that General DAVIDSON had crossed the White River at Clendenin, and that rebels were scattering in every direction. He already arrived in sight of "Daddy" Pearce's rebel picket.

A memorial of Colonel ELLSWORTH was made by the First New York Mounted Rifles and two companies of the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania recently encamped near General GOLDSBOROUGH. A party of guerillas were encountered by Lieutenant-Colonel Farnum, in which several guerillas were killed. The expedition returned to Fort Corcoran, in Virginia, on the 18th.

Friday, the 14th, was the day set for hanging the two Union prisoners in Richmond, Captains Sawyer and Flinn. Subsequently, advices were received that the hanging two rebel officers caught in disguise within the lines, and, above, liable to be executed as spies and not military law. It is safe to say that they were not hung.

A correspondent of the Richmond Examiner of last week, published in the Charleston Mercury, announces that the Confederate Government has appointed a commission, subject to the order of the Governor of South Carolina, in accordance with the act of the rebel Congress relative to the delivery of such captured negroes to the Governors of the States in which the captures might be made.

General HUNTER, a few weeks ago, sent an expedition into Central Mississippi, which returned to Lagrange, Tennessee, on the 20th ult., after accomplishing many important results. Having their there was a large amount of railroad stores at Grenada, he sent a portion of his command to destroy it, under Lieutenant-Colonel PHILLIPS of the Ninth Illinois Mounted Infantry. This force reached Grenada on the 17th, destroyed the depot, under ground at SUMNER, and destroyed sixty-seven locomotives, upward of four hundred cars, the machine shops and blacksmiths' shops, and a large quantity of ordnance and commissary stores, besides capturing about fifty railroad men and a number of other prisoners. After this work was accomplished, Colonel PHILLIPS was joined by Colonel WINSLOW, with a detachment from General GRANT'S force, which had been sent out to divert the enemy's attention, and the whole force returned in safety. This loss of rolling stock will most seriously cripple the rebels in their railroading operations.

The expedition to Ossala, captured at Falling Waters and incarcerated in a prison in Baltimore, left that city the other day for Point Lookout. This point nine miles from Baltimore, now at Point Lookout, captured at the battle of Falling Waters, and which we never forgot!

Three privates from Rhode Island, who had just arrived at the army of the Potomac, were shot while in the act of deserting. Two of them were recruits landed from the cars on the road to Warrenton, and succeeded for a time in making their escape from the stomach pump applied, to which the surgeon generously assented. History takes leave of Wigfall at an unprecedented moment in his career—the stomach pump was coming out of his mouth instead of going into it. The appearance, performance, and disappearance of Wigfall upon the scene of public affairs in this country are all equally absurd. In the Senate of the United States he was the merest cumberer, for the rebel councils and army he has made no mark whatever. Like many of the other leaders of this rebellion, a second-rate fop, he is Yancey, Pryor, Floyd, Wise, Spratt, Rhett, Keitt, and Orr, he has been practically obliterated by its development. The admirers of the statesmen of 1861, however, may console themselves by reflecting that he has made himself even more contemptible than infamous.

The gunboats are three-fold: first, his patriotism; second, his sweet reasonableness; third, his freedom from the taint of selfishness. Not to put too fine a point upon it, if these are the reasons for electing him, we do not see why he is not elected. The truth is, if Jefferson Davis has taught us in these bloody years nothing more than to confide in Fernando Wood, we deserve to have him for Speaker.

The gunboat Pittsburg, which was "War Democrate" of Indiana was held at Indianapolis August 29. The proceedings were marked by much unanimity, and every speech breathed a determination to uphold the Government irrespective of party, at all hazards, and to the last extremity. It was hoped that the veteran Lewis CASS would be present, but the committee appointed to wait upon him reported that he was utterly unable to leave his room. Much to be wished for was the voice in behalf of the good cause, he did not believe that he could survive the journey from Detroit to Indianapolis. A dispatch was received from Hon. DANIEL S. DICKINSON, of New York, stating that he regrets the country from rebellion, and the Democratic name from disgrace."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHARLESTON.

From Charleston our latest intelligence comes down to August 31. The formal attack on Fort Sumter was opened on the morning of the 26th by General Gillmore, the troops operating mainly by a bombardment of Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg, which latter position was soon silenced. The details of the naval action of the first day will be found in the following extract from the log of the Ironsides. On the evening of the 21st the entire top of the fort was gone, and the parapet was demolished to the south side demolished almost to its base, presenting nothing but a heap of ruins. The fire of the Ironsides was very accurate, graphic advices four days later.

The following is the log:

"The fire of the enemy's land batteries has been kept upon Sumter, and more guns have been added to the number engaged against her. There was also a heavy fire kept up on Battery Wagner, both from the land and the two iron-clad gunboats lying there. The casemates at Fort Wagner were one officer and four privates. Some skirmishing occurred on the outer ridge of Fort Sumter and Morris Island, with a threat to shell Charleston in retaliation for the firing of the guns of Fort Wagner, was received and returned at seven o'clock this morning. The rebels have thus far, strangely enough, inhumanity and violation of the laws of war against General Gillmore's officers. But this silence he respects. He will employ stringent measures of retaliation. Up to this time the fire from the rebels has been very accurate."

The dispatch of the 23d says: "On Saturday six hundred and four shots were fired at Sumter, of which four hundred and seventy-seven struck the fort. The southeast wall is much cracked and battered in, and the parapet demolished. The gorge wall is also battered, and has fallen in. The guns are all dismounted. One private was killed. The enemy's batteries opened upon Gregg to-north, and the Monitors from east to west, coming close up. The fire was very accurate. The east wall was cracked and breached, and the shot swept through the fort. The fort is now in ruins, and it will be impossible to hold his output, even as a forlorn hope, until he is relieved or the fort is repaired. General Gillmore sent a communication at eleven o'clock on Sunday, giving notice that he would open at eleven o'clock (Monday, 24th,) but would open fire on Charleston, and in the mean time non-combatants could leave the city."

The dispatch of the 25th says, briefly: "Last night, at half-past eight o'clock, we opened fire on the city from 8-inch Parrott shells. Non-combatants are leaving the city in a continuous stream."

ROSECRANS'S ARMY

Has advanced from Tullahoma upon the rebel strong-hold of Chattanooga, the position which he has traveled and shown in the map on page 567. He appeared before Chattanooga on the 21st, and on the 22d the rebels left it, at 10 o'clock A.M. with good effect. The rebels replied, but our artillery soon silenced them, and very little fire was kept up. The works were found to be very strong. Two batteries were found on the north side of the Tennessee River, and the other disabled by our fire. There was also a pontoon bridge, which was destroyed by rebel bloody shooters. It was ascertained that there were two divisions of rebel troops at Chattanooga, and Hill's corps (late Hardee's) were dispersed along the railroad in the direction of Cleveland, and Bragg was lying in camp on the south side of the whole, he having superseded Bragg. On the night of the 23d the rebels set fire to the railroad bridge, and burned a small railroad bridge near Shellmound, thus severing communication between the right and left wings of the rebel army, and recrossed the river in safety. Deserters and citizens confirm the repeated reports of great demoralization among the rebel troops, not only as Chattanooga, but every where in the Southwest. The Richmond papers say that on the 22d Rosecrans commenced shelling the town of Chattanooga.

BURNSIDE'S ARMY

Had advanced toward Knoxville on the 17th. It was expected that the point would be reached in about two weeks.

THE ARMIES OF THE POTOMAC.

The position and movements of General Meade's army are kept a profound secret; the location of the head-quarters even not being suffered to be made public. Conflicting accounts are given of the strength, position, and designs of Lee's army. According to some reports he has 150,000 men, and is preparing for another campaign against Washington; according to others he is in full retreat upon Richmond. The most probable accounts give him a force of 70,000 men, located on the general line of the Rappahannock.

GUERRILLAS.

Generals Grant and Rosecrans have issued orders in relation to guerillas in the same general purport. They announce that as all regularly organized bodies of the rebel army have been driven from organized territory, the most rigorous penalties will be inflicted upon all irregular bands which are not mustered and paid by the Confederate authorities—upon all concrete officers and all their subordinates, and upon all persons who shall be found giving upon unarmed transports. It is not contemplated that this order shall affect the treatment due to prisoners that war captured within the districts named, when they are found associated with organized companies, and that their acts are in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare.

THE SACK OF LAWRENCE.

This bloody transaction is described on page 564. Later accounts represent that Quantrell's white force amounted to about 300 men, and deserted from the counties of Missouri. Having accomplished their work of destruction they separated into small squads and endeavored to regain their homes. They were pursued by the people of Kansas, gathered into small bands, and most fatally of them have been killed, and a considerable amount of plunder recovered; but the greater number of murderers and incendiaries which they had stolen, probably made good their escape.

THE SIOUX WAR.

General Sibley is pursuing the expedition against the Sioux, advanced in pursuit of the Indians into the Territory of Dakota, and toward the close of July had several sharp encounters with the enemy. On the 25th the command was attacked by about 1,000 Sioux warriors, who came on apparently determined to carry every thing by storm; but they were soon repulsed and put to flight, crossing the Missouri River in haste, and leaving their dead and wounded in considerable numbers, the rude machinery used in the preparation of their pemmican, and 250 lodges, killed and wounded, of which 100 warriors, besides many women and children drowned in crossing the river, and many more killed and left to be wounded. Among these was Lieutenant Beaver, an Indian Chief, who was killed by a shot from the rifle of General Sibley. He had served on Lord Raglan's staff during the Crimean War, and was engaging the Sioux in the hostile massacre of last year, was killed some time since while trying to steal horses. Another Chief of Sioux War, beyond Missouri, General Sibley's expedition, finding their horses and mules fast giving out, and their provisions nearly exhausted, announced their return to Fort Snelling, at the expedition was only partially accomplished.

The correspondent of the St. Paul Press says: "There is no reason why these same Indians should not retrace the Missouri, and fall upon the upon our frontier settlements. The loss of a few hundred men will not intimidate them, nor will the fact that they have been defeated in battle. In what cause, will only embolden them. Their necessities will drive them upon our borders. Their crops were not burned up all provisions and their machinery for putting up their pemmican remains. They are still masters of the region now, and they will not starve if they can help it. They have plenty of ponies sufficient to move our whole, and they are not cumbered with transportation. Undoubtedly they contemplate a raid upon our settlements, and will do so this season. Our crusade against the red devils has already cost more than fifteen millions of dollars.

NAVAL DISASTERS.

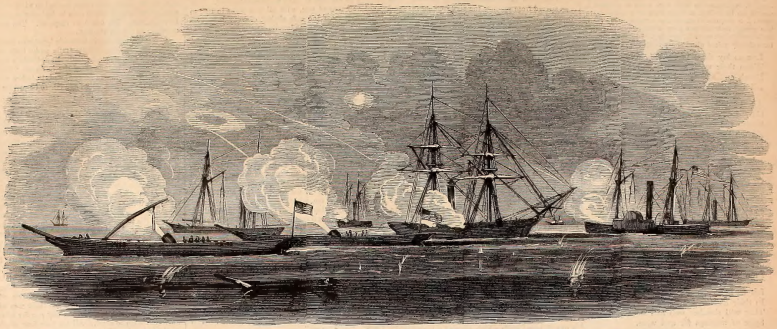
On the 24th a boat was picked up at sea, in latitude 37°, longitude 74°, containing a colored woman named Smith, who stated that on the previous day the United States frigate Ethiopia had struck on a reef off Hatteras Inlet, and that all hands had perished on board except himself and wife. He got off in the boat, and left his wife in the latter becoming crazy, had jumped overboard. The Ethiopia was a large steam frigate, and was last seen by the New York on the 18th of August for Fort Royal, with a crew of seventeen men. The Ethiopia was formerly the navy building with ammunition at Vicksburg, a negro who was carrying a lighted candle fell into the hold, the powder took fire to the ammunition, and blowing the steamer to pieces. Of 160 men on board only four or five are known to have escaped.

THE DRAFT IN NEW YORK.

The draft, which was temporarily suspended in consequence of the riots in this city, was resumed, by the opposition of Governor Seymour, on the 19th of August, and proceeded without interruption. The new regulations had been made to put down any attempt at riot. Heavy military forces were ordered to the localities, troops of Vermont and Massachusetts volunteers fresh from the battle-fields of Gettysburg, were stationed around the public squares. The whole passed off perfectly quietly, and every thing was in readiness to resume the draft in October, and the camp-like aspect of the squares, no one would have supposed that there had been any riots in the city. The Common Council of the city passed an ordinance appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of paying the $300 required for exempting a conscript from service. The ordinance provides that the Mayor and Comptroller shall, upon the order of said Committee, to every citizen and to every alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen in the manner provided by law, who shall be ordered to do military duty in the city of New York under the provisions of the provisions of the act of Congress known as the Conscription Act, the sum necessary to serve shall have become fixed by the action of the Board of Enrollment of the District in which he resides, and the said Committee shall certify that the person so drafted is in indigent circumstances, or is a member of the Fire Department, the sum of three hundred dollars for the relief of the families of the drafted persons. The money is appropriated to be paid to the Mayor; but the Board of Councilmen, by a vote of 19 to 1, passed a resolution that the money be placed in the Mayor's vote, at the expiration of the legal period of ten days, unless the Common Council, acting in the interim, pass a million and a half of dollars, have been presented for damages during the late riots.

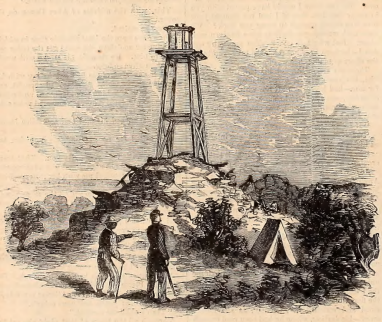
FOREIGN NEWS.

APART from the Polish question—which is still the subject of voluminous correspondence, diplomatic exchanges, and apparent approximation to any definite result, and the movements of the Spanish fleet, which has been ordered to accept the Imperial crown of Mexico, provided the new Emperor shall have been under the control of the Three Powers of Europe—our foreign advices for the week present little of general interest. The most important item relates to the fitting out in England of



NEW ANGLO-REBEL IRON-CLADS.

Of these preparations the London Times says, under date of August 10: "The first of these is now in the graving dock at Birkenhead, completely roofed in, her keel and bottom in and on board, and also a large part of her armament. She is intended to be ready for sea by the end of the 15th of August. Her consort was launched on the 24th of last month, and is expected to be ready for sea by the 15th of September. The speed of these vessels will be greater than any of your iron-clads. It is generally supposed that the breakdown experiments will be their first prey. This is not impossible, but my own impression is that a dash at New York will be made; and I have no hesitation in saying, that with these three iron-clads, in broad daylight, they could enter New York Harbor by way of Sandy Hook, and burn and destroy all your ships of war as the stocks and afloat, and block-up the harbor and keep it in a state of the result, without receiving any material damage."—We have made this statement and explained a subject of special comment in another column.



THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY OF LAWRENCE, KANSAS, AND THE MASSACRE OF ITS INHABITANTS BY THE REBEL GUERRILLAS, AUGUST 21, 1863.—[See Page 566.]

MORRIS ISLAND SKETCHES.—[SEE PAGE 567.]

I.—THE MORTAR SCHOONERS AND WOODEN GUN-BOATS BOMBARDING FORT WAGNER AND BATTERY GREGG.

II.—RUINS OF LIGHT-HOUSE AT THE INLET, DESTROYED BY THE REBELS.

III.—EXAMINING PASSES ON THE BEACH, MORRIS ISLAND.

IV.—THE GRAND GUARD MARCHING TO, AND NEGRO FATIGUE-PARTY RETURNING FROM, THE TRENCHES IN FRONT OF WAGNER.

THE GRAVES OF GETTYSBURG.

[NATIONAL CEMETERY AT GETTYSBURG.—Harrisburg, July 31. Arrangements have been made to purchase a part of the battle-field at Gettysburg for a cemetery, in which it is proposed to gather the remains of our dead. The ground embraces the point of the desperate attack made upon the left centre of our army. Eight other States have already united with Pennsylvania in this project.]

LET us lay them where they fell,
When their work was done so well!
Dumb and stricken—leaving others
All the glorious news to tell.

All the yellow harvest-field,
Cursed with a crimson yield,
'Neath the thrusting in of sickles,
As the battle waxed or reeled!

They, with faces to the foe,
Lost to pain, and peace, and woe;
Armored in the inspiration
Of the old heroic glow:

Rushing grandly unto death!—
Eyes ablaze and hated breath—
Second-sighted for the future—
Here they died the trampled heath!

Here for Liberty they stood,
Writ their records in their blood,
On the forehead of the epoch,
In a grand historic mood!

Let us lay them side by side,
In their awful martyr-pride:
They will slumber well and sweetly,
Spite of wailings far and wide.

And their story shall be told
When this Present, gray and old,
Loses each distinctive feature
In the Future's ample fold.

Well, the work was fitly done!
Well, the day was proudly won!
But—this nook that bloomed with battle—
There's no rarer 'neath the sun!

Let us lay them where they fell,
When their work was done so well!
In the nation's noble silence,
Leaving us the tale to tell.

HOWARD GLYNDON.

WASHINGTON, August 2, 1863.

THE BLUE FLOWERS.

"There's a blue flower in my garden
That has love more than all—
The less and I, we love it both,
Though it is frail and small."

"OH, jolly, jolly!"

That was Aggie French's way of expressing satisfaction, and her companion looked up, expectant of more.

"My letter is from Georgina Ash," she explained. "It was most hard hearted of her—the handsomest blonde you ever saw; eyes half blue, half amber; and hair neither brown, nor yellow, nor red, but just exactly gold. The fun is, Thorne used to be in love with her before he knew little Alice Devon, and they said she jilted him—it was before he came to his fortune—for a richer sailor. Any way she isn't married, and it will be curious to see how Thorne will take her presence, here in this house, when there are so few of us that it will help being intimate. Of course he can't run away and leave Alice, and we shall see what we shall see when my Lady Magnificent comes. For my part, I never did believe first love a disease quite so easy to get over as mumps and measles. I'm told Thorne led it hard. I like stories in real life a great deal better than cut of books—they're twice as spicy. I promise myself rare fun in watching the comedy."

Quiet Mary Everett sighed, a little sadly, but did not answer. She loved Alice Devon, though their friendship had been of weeks only, and the prospect of the coming "fun" was far from exhilarating.

Just then Alice came in, so radiantly happy. Her brown hair tossed about her primrose cheeks, her soft, innocent eyes sparkling with pleasure, and a few rare wild flowers in her hand. Thorne was behind her, looking on as she exhibited her treasure with a smile and an eye-glance which revealed more than he was aware of love and pride.

"See," cried the soft, clear tones, "you've been hunting in vain for these little beauties all summer and we've found them. Do you smell the sea-breath in them? We got them among the rocks, where they look forever out toward the waves, and at high tide the water comes up among the roots. They blow that way, too, just a bit of the summer sky! I'm going for them often, and since they are mine by right of discovery, I'll call them treasure-trove, for I don't like those polysyllable lotnay names."

She was a pretty picture, in her delicate morning dress, with her young, innocent girl's face, the round hat, with its bunch of wild roses and meadow grass swinging from her arm, and the blue flowers in her hand.

She and Thorne were happy enough, both of them, to have no thought of any tender bearing to let them dream on. But Aggie French's heart was not tender. Not that she was so very cruel, only thoughtless, fond of fun, and a little careless what wounds her self-indulgence might inflict. She looked wickedly into Thorne's eyes and said—

"I had a letter from an old friend of yours this morning—Miss Georgina Ash. She is coming here to-day or to-morrow. She does not know she will meet you. What a pleasant surprise it will be!"

It was fortunate that Alice Devon was busy just then with Mary Everett, who was asking her some question about their morning ramble. She was spared from reading the signs which revealed so much to Aggie French—the sudden quiver of Thorne's mustached lip, the bronzed face a few shades paler, the set look that tried to be careless and failed. Little Alice only heard the cool answer:

"Ah, I haven't seen her for five years. She used to be a stylish, handsome girl. I wonder if she's faded?"

She thought to herself that, for old friends, her lover seemed to take very slight interest in the prospective new comer.

When they came in together again from their afternoon walk, Thorne and Alice, some trunks were in the hall, with G. A. painted in black letters upon their covers.

"The new guest, I suspect," Alice said, lightly. Thorne was now self-conscious to reply. He bit his lip and was silent.

When Aggie French heard him going by her door, after he had left Alice, she put her head out with a malicious whisper:

"She's come—been with me a couple of hours. Now she's in her own room dressing for tea."

It was just at sunset when all the party before-mentioned and a half dozen more were gathered in the low, old-fashioned parlor waiting for tea to be upper. Mary Everett, who had never before met Miss Ash, looked at her critically as she stood beside little Alice Devon. The two had been just been introduced to each other by Thorne, who, whatever he might have betrayed when taken by surprise was perfectly self-possessed now.

There was no disputing that the new-comer was the handsomest woman at "The Shoals." It was a grand, regal style which swayed a power all its own. The tall, full figure; the matchless complexion, with its coloring clear and bright as dawn; the great, magnetic eyes; the tawny gold hair, filling the silken net full; the mouth so ripe and tempting—all combined to make a self-understanding, the spiritual of twenty-five years. In that stately presence little Alice Devon, with her seventeen years and her primrose cheek, looked softened and childish. But there was something about her most sweet and tender and touching, which made Mary Everett think of a rose-bud with the morning dew still on; and glancing back to the other she honored, half under her breath, a snatch of an old nursery rhyme:

"The sunflower with her brilliant crown
Looked lovely and tempting to the bee;
Yet not one drop of honey fed
In her wonder cup of gold and brown—
She was false at heart, though fair to see."

Aggie French had not arrived at the entire truth about the separation between Miss Ash and Thorne. She had not jilted him. They had given each other up mutually. It was the fortieth lover's quarrel, perhaps; for Miss Ash was a most capricious temperament, and Thorne not over-patient. It was the one too many, at any rate; for they had never made it up, and five years had passed without their seeing each other. In the mean time some of Thorne's relations had died and left him a fortune, making him the richer match of the two. Aggie was mistaken, too, in thinking that her friend came to "The Shoals" without knowing that her old lover was there. Miss Ash had received Aggie's had escaped her in her letter; but the certainty of meeting him had been her motive for coming. To do her justice she did not know of his engagement. She learned that for the first time in her two hours with Miss French before her. She looked for one old lover. It was an obstacle she had not foreseen, and she did not feel entire faith now in the success which had seemed so certain.

When they were introduced she had looked at Alice anxiously. She was not blind to the youth and freshness and beauty of her rival. When any thing brought her in contact with them she was playful sometimes, sometimes a little reserved and cold, though kind always. She was so much her variety in her moods that Thorne grew interested before he knew it in watching them. He began to realize, now that he saw them together, how royally beautiful she was. She had been far less so in the old days when he had thought the whole universe bounded by her love. She herself was changed too. She had been imperious then—she was so still at times; but oh! her there was a tender, half-pathetic appeal to world and to man which made him think she had grown sadder with the sad years. Had her life missed him? There was a subtle flattery in the thought against which his vanity was not proof.

He was not untrue toward his little love in all these speculations, and he was unconscious that they were dangerous. Very dangerous when, one day, he suffered himself, sitting silly and alone on the rocks for the treasure-trove he would have been the result of his meeting again with Miss Ash if he had never seen Alice.

Just then she came up the walk in her loveliest mood. Tenderness in a person to whom Nature has given the seal of sovereignty moves us far more than in those greater persons to whom it seems indigenous. She looked sad, this Lady Magnificent, as Aggie French had dubbed her. She was simply dressed, in a robe of fleecy white, with a few flowers stuck for sole ornament in belt and bosom. Her eyes were downcast. There was a stain as of tears on her cheek. Some impulse he should have resisted drew Thorne to her side. Are there moments in all lives when our good angel forsakes us? Half unconsciously he said to her,

"Miss Ash—Georgina, we were friends once I do not like to see you sad."

The great amber eyes turned on him a look of mute reproach. After a moment she said, with a trifle of the old petulance,

"I do not like to have my moods noticed. It is not generous of you, with all you want in life, to look out from the safe shelter of your happiness and watch how I bear loneliness and heartache."

"All I want in life!"

He repeated the words after her dreamily, as if he were questioning himself whether indeed he had what he most wanted in life. The past seemed to throb again in his heart—tingle in his pulses. Were the days dead in which he had been this woman's lover? They had turned, mechanically as it were, and were passing down the shaded path which she had walked up alone. For a while neither spoke. What subtle magnetism was in her presence that made it thrill him so just to walk by her side? He asked her at last, abruptly. She was pale to the lips, and slow tears were stealing from under drooping lids. A sudden mad impulse swayed him—he would unsay the words he had spoken. He put out his hand and touched hers. He spoke with a tone that would be obeyed.

"What is it? I will know what it is. Is it any thought of the past, of me, which moves you?"

She turned her eyes full of reproach upon him.

"What right have you, Alice Devon's lover, to the past or me? Be content with your own joy. It should be piguant enough without the zest of enhancing it by contrast with my misery."

The mention of Alice Devon struck a pang, fierce-keen, to his heart. He was not a bad man; nay, he was perhaps better than most men. He respected his plighted word—he loved Alice. Still he had not strength enough to escape from the baleful spell which now enveloped him.

"Your misery!" he cried. "Do you, whom all the world adores, know what misery means? Tell me. I will know."

Again that long, reproachful look from out those amber eyes.

"Howard, for shame! You must not, you shall not torture me, now when all ties between us are at an end. It would be as if we should have parted with pain in anger that last time if I had not thought your love was strong enough to bring you back? We have both been punished, and I to have forgiven each other. But why talk of it? You are better off; and I—perhaps I am not punished too severely for the share of blame with the morning dew still on; and glancing back to the other she honored, half under her breath, a snatch of an old nursery rhyme:

"The sunflower with her brilliant crown
Looked lovely and tempting to the bee;
Yet not one drop of honey fed
In her wonder cup of gold and brown—
She was false at heart, though fair to see."

Aggie French had not arrived at the entire truth about the separation between Miss Ash and Thorne. She had not jilted him. They had given each other up mutually. It was the fortieth lover's quarrel, perhaps; for Miss Ash was a most capricious temperament, and Thorne not over-patient. It was the one too many, at any rate; for they had never made it up, and five years had passed without their seeing each other. In the mean time some of Thorne's relations had died and left him a fortune, making him the richer match of the two. Aggie was mistaken, too, in thinking that her friend came to "The Shoals" without knowing that her old lover was there. Miss Ash had received Aggie's had escaped her in her letter; but the certainty of meeting him had been her motive for coming. To do her justice she did not know of his engagement. She learned that for the first time in her two hours with Miss French before her. She looked for one old lover. It was an obstacle she had not foreseen, and she did not feel entire faith now in the success which had seemed so certain.

When they were introduced she had looked at Alice anxiously. She was not blind to the youth and freshness and beauty of her rival. When any thing brought her in contact with them she was playful sometimes, sometimes a little reserved and cold, though kind always. She was so much her variety in her moods that Thorne grew interested before he knew it in watching them. He began to realize, now that he saw them together, how royally beautiful she was. She had been far less so in the old days when he had thought the whole universe bounded by her love. She herself was changed too. She had been imperious then—she was so still at times; but oh! her there was a tender, half-pathetic appeal to world and to man which made him think she had grown sadder with the sad years. Had her life missed him? There was a subtle flattery in the thought against which his vanity was not proof.

He was not untrue toward his little love in all these speculations, and he was unconscious that they were dangerous. Very dangerous when, one day, he suffered himself, sitting silly and alone on the rocks for the treasure-trove he would have been the result of his meeting again with Miss Ash if he had never seen Alice.

Just then she came up the walk in her loveliest mood. Tenderness in a person to whom Nature has given the seal of sovereignty moves us far more than in those greater persons to whom it seems indigenous. She looked sad, this Lady Magnificent, as Aggie French had dubbed her. She was simply dressed, in a robe of fleecy white, with a few flowers stuck for sole ornament in belt and bosom. Her eyes were downcast. There was a stain as of tears on her cheek. Some impulse he should have resisted drew Thorne to her side. Are there moments in all lives when our good angel forsakes us? Half unconsciously he said to her,

"Miss Ash—Georgina, we were friends once I do not like to see you sad."

The great amber eyes turned on him a look of mute reproach. After a moment she said, with a trifle of the old petulance,

"I do not like to have my moods noticed. It is not generous of you, with all you want in life, to look out from the safe shelter of your happiness and watch how I bear loneliness and heartache."

"All I want in life!"

He repeated the words after her dreamily, as if he were questioning himself whether indeed he had what he most wanted in life. The past seemed to throb again in his heart—tingle in his pulses. Were the days dead in which he had been this woman's lover? They had turned, mechanically as it were, and were passing down the shaded path which she had walked up alone. For a while neither spoke. What subtle magnetism was in her presence that made it thrill him so just to walk by her side? He asked her at last, abruptly. She was pale to the lips, and slow tears were stealing from under drooping lids. A sudden mad impulse swayed him—he would unsay the words he had spoken. He put out his hand and touched hers. He spoke with a tone that would be obeyed.

"What is it? I will know what it is. Is it any thought of the past, of me, which moves you?"

She turned her eyes full of reproach upon him.

"What right have you, Alice Devon's lover, to the past or me? Be content with your own joy. It should be piquant enough without the zest of enhancing it by contrast with my misery."

The mention of Alice Devon struck a pang, fierce-keen, to his heart. He was not a bad man; nay, he was perhaps better than most men. He respected his plighted word—he loved Alice. Still he had not strength enough to escape from the baleful spell which now enveloped him.

"Your misery!" he cried. "Do you, whom all the world adores, know what misery means? Tell me. I will know."

Again that long, reproachful look from out those amber eyes.

"Howard, for shame! You must not, you shall not torture me, now when all ties between us are at an end. It would be as if we should have parted with pain in anger that last time if I had not thought your love was strong enough to bring you back? We have both been punished, and I to have forgiven each other. But why talk of it? You are better off; and I—perhaps I am not punished too severely for the share of blame with the morning dew still on;

Thoughts swam through his brain deliriously. She, his youth's love, loved him—was suffering for him—had never loved all the while. He looked at her, more beautiful than ever in her sorrow, her tenderness. After all, was not the old love the true love?

"If I were free—" he began.

"Of what use would be freedom?" she interrupted him, passionately. "I do not ever free you're."

"But I did not see you. Oh, Georgie! this is cruel. You should have come before, or not at all."

He was angry with himself and with her now. Around a sudden turn in the winding path came Mary Everett, with Alice, Alice, clinging to her arm.

"We heard a few words—we could not help it," Miss Everett said, with eyes of stern rebuke, leading her friend away.

Howard Thorne cursed his fate as he saw his little love sink into her lover's breast-break suddenly over it, almost like the shadow of death. He knew now where his heart was—saw what brief madness had possessed him. He would have given half the universe to be able to go to Alice's side and tell her the truth. But he dared not approach her. For the first time in his life he felt like a coward. He stood and watched her, silently, as she moved away—his darling, whom he had been mad enough to lose. Then she turned a look in his eyes that made Georgina Ash tremble.

"I am free now; and, as you said, of what use is freedom?"

Neither spoke again until his cool good-by, when he had gone up the path with her to the house-door.

Then he rushed back into the thick shrubbery, among the rocks, across to the sea. He was almost wild in his agony all, wrong, sorrow, shame, in those treacherous waters. He knew his fate was sealed. There would be no hope for him. He had cast away the only love he was true, and claimed truth—a woman, and would accept no divided heart. Explain as he would he knew she would never believe him or understand him. She never could know how it all came; and if he offered such explanation it would betray that only love, or, only sorrow for her, held him; and those mad moments could never be atoned for.

Last that night, as he was standing in the very nook where they had gathered the blue flowers. Some others, their sisters, were nodding in the cleft. He took one with a smile and laid them carefully in a pocket-book, which he carried in his breast.

"They shall go with me into other scenes," he said, his sad eyes kindling again with the gleam of a new resolve. "I have held back from giving my love to my country—from offering my life—from offering too costly. Now I will go. It will be better for her if I die."

He found a note on his table when he went home, and in it these words only:

"In merciful enough not to write to me, or ask to see me. It would be of no use. What I heard, what I saw, can never be explained out of memory. I forgive you. I do not think you meant to be false. Wrong as I feel that you loved me I believe you thought so. I shall go away to-night, and leave you to the love you have found again."

He obeyed her wish, and no useless attempts at explanation; and watched from his window to see her go away with a calmness more terrible and despairing than any passion of agony.

Later in the evening came another note: from Miss Ash this time. It was worded, oh! so shillfully; begging his pardon; telling him how innocent she was of wrong design; blameless of every thing but the love and sorrow she could not help, and the last line spoke to her of all.

Howard Thorne smiled grimly as he twisted her soft words and lighted his cigar with them. All her blandishments were powerless now. No device of hers could move him, steeled to vindictiveness by the look of white pain he had seen on Alice Devon's face. He made no response. The next morning he too went away.

Somehow even Aggie French's heart was touched by his hopeless, dreary smile as he bade her good-by. Certainly the Lady Magnificent's visit had not been productive of the expected "fun." Miss Everett had gone away the night before with Alice; and "The Shoals" bade fair to be presently deserted.

All that was last year—the summer of '62. It was September when Howard Thorne found himself a soldier, with the commission, urged upon him by staff against his will, of First Lieutenant. He was with the Army of the Potomac, and before the summer came again he had seen hard fighting, and held a Colonel's rank by virtue of his cool courage. Courage, did I say? Recklessness, perhaps, would have told the truth more nearly. He wanted to die, and so took every possible opportunity to throw away the life of which he was weary. For that reason, perhaps, shot and shell passed him by. Ever in the front, and no hall him. They began to say that he bore a charmed life when they saw him with no scar on his bronzed handsome face.

At last came Gettysburg and the bullet which sought his heart! It was turned aside a little by a book he wore—the book which held the blue flowers, pressed and flat, that ghastly field as was his wound, it was not instantly mortal. There was small hope for him, however; and one who loved him as a brother asked, when there was leisure after the fight, if there was any one for whom he would send. He had his pale face brightened gloriously. This was the hour for which he had longed and waited. He dictated only these words:

"Come to me before I die. You will believe what I have to say when you know it is my last words."

This, with the address of Alice Devon the cover.

Then he waited.

Five days were the least possible time in which, allowing for no delays, she could get the letter and come to him. He thought his strong will would keep him alive so long.

On the evening of the fifth day he lay with his face toward the wall. Wrapped in thought, and tortured with searching pain, he heard no footfall, heard nothing, until a low, remembered voice said,

"I am here."

Then he turned his face and saw Alice Devon at his pillow.

He waited for no greeting, no inquiries, but spoke the uppermost thought of all:

"Alice, I did love you—only you. That scene which you could not understand was a momentary madness. Only you—only you. Those few hints of the long, hopeless love she had cherished for me all those years. I was moved on the surface only. I tell you, as a dying man, that my heart never wavered. It was yours then, as it is now—as it will be when I go back whence I came, to darkness and mystery."

"I believe you," said the low, sweet tones. "I began to believe it when I heard of her marriage, she months after. I knew she had been disappointed, and I had been wrong and hasty."

"No, not wrong; you had every right to doubt. You shall not blame yourself. I never blamed you. But are you free? Is this my Alice at my side?"

"Your Alice—yours, and none other's."

"Then I shall die content."

Through all the hours of that night she sat beside him, holding his hand in hers, hearing not away his pain by her voice and her touch. When the dawn crept softly up the slopes, and kindled the eastern sky to flame, he was conscious of rest, peaceful sleep, for the first time in all those days since he was wounded; and the nurse coming in, and standing wonderingly beside him for a while, said, as he turned away,

"I dare not give you much hope—but I begin to think it is not that he must live."

A little later he awoke, and still Alice's hand was in his. He turned to look at her dear face, and saw a smile in the tender brown eyes. She bent over him and kissed him, in the morning twilight through which he could not yet broken, with her kiss she whispered,

"The surgeon has been here, and he says it is possible you may live. Will you live for me?"

"Ay, that I will," answered his deep tones, fervently. "Life, that I was so ready to throw away, is dear enough now. It must be that God will get well now I have Alice to live for. Pray for it, my darling! God will hear such lips as yours."

Last week an invalid came back. His face was thin and pale, but his eyes were bright; and on that week Alice was by his side. Impossible. By easy stages he journeyed—he and the one friend with him—to the sea-coast; and took his old room at "The Shoals" once more. He found there old friends and new ones, all ready to give Colonel Ash glad welcome. It was Alice's care which had won him back from death. He was all hers now, and between them could never a wrath come any more.

To-morrow at "The Shoals" will be a wedding, and the bride will wear a wreath of little blue flowers.

THE MASSACRE AT LAWRENCE, KANSAS.

THE city of Lawrence was, on the evening of August 20, 1863, one of the most thriving towns between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains. At daybreak on the next day it was a heap of ruins. A gang of guerrillas, 800 strong, under Quantrell, crossed the Missouri River on the evening of the 20th, and pushed forward to Lawrence, where they arrived just before daybreak. Guards were posted around the town so as to prevent all escape, and the work of pillage and murder at once commenced. The attack was wholly unexpected, and there was not the least show of resistance. The citizens were massacred by the light of their burning homes, and their bodies flung into wells and cisterns. In one case twelve men were driven into a building, where they were shot down, and the house burned over their bodies. The number of victims is stated at 180, including the Mayor and the principal citizens. Only one hotel was left standing, and this was spared because the guerrilla chief had been formerly entertained there free of expense. Two of the banks were plundered, and the third escaped because the marauders could not force the safe in time. The total loss of property is put down at two millions of dollars. No other such instance of wanton brutality has occurred during the American war. The names of Nena Sahib in India, Cut-Nose in Minnesota, and Quantrell in Kansas will go down in history together.

MORRIS ISLAND SKETCHES.

Our special correspondent before Charleston sends us a series of sketches from Morris Island which we reproduce on page 565. No 1 shows the Mortar Schooners and Wooden Gun-boats bombarding Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg. No. 2 is a view of the Light-house at Light-house Inlet, destroyed by the rebels in February, 1862. The lower part of the Light-house was of brick: this was blown up, and the débris of the structure lay scattered around, as shown by our artist. No. 3 represents the Examining of Passes on the beach at Morris Island, our iron-clad fleet being visible in the distance. No. 4 represents the Grand Guard marching to, and the Negro Fatigue-Party returning at dark from, the trenches in front of Fort Wagner. The Grand Guard are in full uniform without knapsacks. The Fatigue-Party, in shirt sleeves, with trousers rolled up, have their blankets slung over the right shoulder, and carry their canteens and haversacks. The officer is white.

MOSEBY'S GUERRILLAS.

INSTEAD of "Stonewall Jackson" with his dashing achievements, the rebel cavalry in Virginia have now nothing better to show than the performances of Moseby and his guerrillas, "citizens by day and soldiers by night." Aided by a perfect knowledge of the country and by information furnished by their sympathizers, they have succeeded in capturing quite a number of outlers' trains, and escaping with a portion of their booty. These guerrilla enterprises, while they exert no influence upon the issue of the war, are annoying, and must be prevented. They are only possible through the connivance of the inhabitants of the region where they take place, and these should be held accountable for all the damage done by their friends. If this rule is strictly enforced, the aiders and abettors of these marauding gangs will find that they are carrying on a losing business.

BOMBARDMENT OF CHARLESTON FORTS.

THE formal attack upon Fort Sumter was commenced on the 17th of August. The results of the first day's work is given in the following extracts from the official report of Admiral Dahlgren, dated on the 18th:

Yesterday was begun another series of operations against the enemy's works. Early in the morning General Gilmore opened all his batteries upon Fort Sumter, firing over Fort Wagner and the intervening space. About the same time I moved up the entire available naval force, leading with my flag in the Richmond, followed by the Keokuk, Nahant, and Montauk, the Passaic and Patapsco in rear of the Sumter—the Ironsides in position opposite to Wagner, and the gun-boats at long range.

As the tide rose the Ironsides was closed to about 450 yards off Wagner; the other three Monitors followed, and the Ironsides was taken as near as her great draft of water permitted. After a steady and well-directed fire Wagner was silenced about 9.15 A. M., and that of our own vessels was slackened in consequence. Meanwhile the fire of our more batteries was working effectually upon the gorge of Sumter, which appeared to have been strengthened in every possible manner.

At this time the flag was shifted to the Passaic, which, with the Patapsco, both having rifle-guns, steamed up the channel until within 1000 yards of Fort Sumter, when fire was opened on the gorge, angle, and southeast front of the work. The Patapsco fired very well, and is believed to have struck the southeast front nine consecutive times. To all this Sumter scarcely replied. Wagner was silenced, and Battery Gregg alone maintained a deliberate fire at the Passaic and Patapsco. It was now noon; the men had been hard at work from daybreak, and needed rest; so I withdrew the vessels to give them dinner.

During the afternoon our shore batteries continued the fire on Sumter, with little or no reply from the enemy, and I contented myself with sending up the Passaic and Patapsco to prevent Wagner from repairing damages. The fort replied briskly, but in a short time left off firing. I am not able to state with exactness the result of the day's work, but I am well satisfied with what a distinct view of Sumter allowed me. Our entire power is not yet developed, as it will be daily, while the enemy is damaged without being able to repair.

The officers and men of the vessels have done their duty well, and will continue to do so. All went well with us, with one sad exception. Captain Rodgers, my Chief-of-Staff, was killed, as well as Pay-master Woodbury, who was standing near him.

It is not natural that I should feel deeply the loss thus sustained, for the close and confidential relations which the duties of flag-ship necessarily occasioned impressed me deeply with the worth of Captain Rodgers. Brave, loving, ma... of highly public, devoted to his duty and to the flag w... ar which he poured his life, the country can not afford to lose such men. Of a kind and generous nature, he was always prompt to give relief when he could.

I have directed that all respect be paid to his remains, and the country will not, I am sure, omit to honor the memory of one who has not spared his life in her hour of trial.

Any further details of the siege of Charleston that come to hand will be found in the column of general news on page 563.

MAP OF THAT PART OF TENNESSEE THROUGH WHICH GENERAL ROSECRANS ADVANCED FROM MURFREESBORO TO TULLAHOMA AND CHATTANOOGA.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS SUMTER AND WAGNER IN CHARLESTON HARBOR, AUGUST 17, BY THE UNITED STATES MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCES, UNDER GENERAL GILMORE AND ADMIRAL DAHLGREN—[See Page 567.]

VERY HARD CASH.

BY CHARLES READE, ESQ.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE spirit of dissension in Musgrove Cottage penetrated to the very kitchen. Old Betty sided with Alfred, and combated in her place the creed of the parlor. "Why, according to miss, the young sparrows are bound never to fly out of the nest, or else have the Bible flung at 'em. She do go on about God's will: seems to me 'tis His will the world should be peopled by body and beast—which they are both his creatures—and, by the same token, if they don't marry they does wus. Certainly while a young man bides at home, it behooves him to be dutiful; but that ain't to say he is to bide at home forever. Master Alfred's time is come to leave we, and be master in a house of his own, as his father done before him, which he forgets that now. He is grown to man's estate, and his mother's money, and no more bound to our master than I be." She said, too, that "parting slights more quarrels than it breeds:" and she constantly invited Peggy to speak up and gainsay her. But Peggy was a young woman with white eyelashes, and given to looking down, and not to speaking up; she was always watching Mr. Hardie in company, like a cat cream; and hovering about him when alone. Betty went so far as to accuse her of colloguing with him against Alfred, and of "setting her cap at master," which accusation elicited no direct reply, but stinging innuendoes hours after.

Now, if one looks into the thing, the elements of discord had attacked Albion Villa quite as powerfully as Musgrove Cottage; but had hitherto failed signally: the mutual affection of the Dodds was so complete, and no unprincipled person among them to split the good.

And now that the wedding drew near there was but one joyful heart within the walls; but the others were too kind and unselfish to throw cold water. Mrs. Dodd's own wedding had ended in a piteous separation, and now to part with her darling child, and launch her on the uncertain waves of matrimony! She heaved many a sigh when alone: but, as there were no bounds to her maternal love, so there were no exceptions to her politeness: over her aching heart she forced on a wedding face, subdued, but hopeful, for her daughter, as she would for any other young lady about to be married beneath her roof. It was a heroic effort; and partially successful; not wholly, because Julia loved her mother in earnest, and all true love is vigilance.

It wanted but six days, when one morning after breakfast, the bereaved wife, and mother about to be deserted, addressed her son and Viceroy thus: "Edward, we must borrow fifty pounds."

"Fifty pounds? what for? who wants that?"

"Why, I want it," said Mrs. Dodd, stoutly.

"Oh, if you want it!—what to do, please?"

"Why, to buy her wedding-clothes, dear."

"I thought what her 'I' would come to," said Julia, reproachfully.

Edward shook his head and said, "He who goes a borrowing goes a sorrowing."

"But she is not a he:" objected Mrs. Dodd with the subtlety of a schoolman: "and who ever heard of a young lady being married without some things to be married in?"

"Well, I've heard nudity is not the cheese, on public occasions: but why not go dressed like a lady as she always does, only wear white gloves; and be married without any bother and nonsense."

"You talk like a boy," said Mrs. Dodd. "I could not bear it. My poor child!" and she cast a look of tenderest pity on the proposed victim. "Well, suppose we make the poor child the judge," suggested Edward. He then put it to Julia whether, under the circumstances, she would wish them to run in debt, buying her finery to wear for a day. "It was not fair to ask her," said Mrs. Dodd, with a sigh.

Julia blushed and hesitated, and said she would be candid; and then stopped.

"Ugh!" ejaculated Edward. "This is a bad beginning. Girls candor! now for a masterpiece of Duplicity."

Julia inquired how he dared; and Mrs. Dodd said warmly that Julia was not like other people, she could be candid; had actually done it, more than once, within her recollection. The young lady justified the exception as follows: "If I was going to be married to myself, or to some gentleman I did not care for, I would not spend a shilling. But I am going to marry him; and so—oh, Edward, think of them saying 'what has he married? a dowdy: why she hadn't new things on to go to church with him: no bonnet, no wreath, no new white dress!' To mortify him the very first day of our—" The sentence remained unfinished, but two lovely eyes filled to the very brim without running over, and completed the sense, and did the Viceroy's business though a brother. "Why you dear little goose," said he: "of course I don't mean that. I have as good as got the things we must buy; and those are a new bonnet—"

"Ah!"

"A wreath of orange blossoms—"

"Oh you good boy!"

"Four pair of gloves: two white—one is safe to break—two dark; very dark: invisible green, or visible black; last the honey-moon. All the rest you must find in the house."

"What, fit her out with a parcel of old things? Can you be so cruel, so unreasonable, dear Edward?"

"Old things! [illegible]y, where is all your gorgeous attire from Oriental climes? I see the splendiferous articles arrive, and then they vanish forever."

"Now, shawls and Indian muslins! pray what use are they to a bride?"

"Why what looks nicer than a white muslin dress?"

"Married in muslin? The very idea makes me shiver."

"Well, clap her on another petticoat."

"How can you be so childish? Muslin is not the thing."

"No more is running in debt."

He then suggested that a white shawl or two should be cut into a bridal dress. At which both ladies' fair throats opened on him with ridicule: cut fifty-guinea shawls into ten-pound dresses; that was male economy; was it? Total; a wedding was a wedding: new things always had had to be bought for a wedding, and always would, in secula seculorum.

"New things? Yes," said the pertinacious wretch. "But they need not be new-bought things. You ladies go and confound the world's eyes with your own in the drollest way: if gorgeous attire has lain long in your drawers, you fancy the world will detect on its glossy surface how long you had it, and gloated over it, and made it stale to your eye, before you could bring your mind to wear it. That is your delusion, that, and the itch for going out shopping, oh, I'm down on you. Mamma dear, you open that gigantic wardrobe of yours; and I'll oil my hair, whitewash my mug (a little moan from Mrs. D.), and do the counterjumping business to the life; hand the things down to you, unroll 'em, grin, charge you 100 per cent. over value, note them down in a penny memorandum book, sing out 'caesh! caesh!' etc., etc.: and so we shall get all Julia wants, and go through the ritual of shopping without the substantial disgrace of running in debt."

Mrs. Dodd smiled admiringly, as ladies generally do at the sauciness of a young male; but proposed an amendment. She would open her wardrobe, and look out all the contents for Edward's inspection; and, if the mere sight of them did not convince him they were inappropriate to a bride, why then she would coincide with his views, and resign her own.

"All right!" said he. "That will take a jolly time, I know; so I'll go to my governor first for the bonnet and wreath."

Mrs. Dodd drew in at this last slang word; she had heard young gentlemen apply it to their fathers.

Edward, she felt sure, would not so sully that sacred relation: still the word was obnoxious for its past offenses; and she froze at it: "I have not the honor to know who the personage is you so describe," said she, formally. Edward replied very carelessly that it was an upholsterer at the North end of the town."

"Ah, a tradesman you patronize."

"Humph? Well, yes, that is the word, mamma: haw! haw! I have been making the bloke a lot of oak candlesticks, and human heads, with sparkling eyes, for walking-sticks, etc. And now I'll go and draw my—protégé's—blunt." The lady's hands were uplifted toward pitying Heaven with one impulse: the young workman grinned [illegible]vons de notre siècle," said he, and depar[illegible]ling, in the tenor clef. He had the m[illegible]whistle in England.

After a few minutes well spent in deploring the fall of her Oxonian, a[illegible]ently denouncing his motto, and his centu[illegible]ays, and, above all, its words, Mrs. Dodd [illegible] Julia to her bedroom, and unlocked drawers, and doors, in her wardrobe; and straightway Sarah, who was hurriedly flogging the chairs with a duster, relaxed, and began to work on a cheval-glass as slowly as if she was drawing Nelson's lions at a thousand pounds the tail. Mrs. Dodd opened a drawer and took out three pieces of worked Indian muslin, a little discolored by hoarding: "There, that must be bleached and make you some wrappers for the honey-moon, if the weather is at all fine; and petticoats to match;" next an envelope consisting of two foolscap sheets tacked. This, carefully undone upon the bed, revealed a Brussels lace flounce and a veil: "It was my own," said Mrs. Dodd, softly. "I saved it for you. See here is your name written on it seventeen years ago. I thought—'This dear little toddler will have wings some day, and then she will leave me.' But now I am almost afraid to let you wear it; it might bring you misfortune: suppose after years of wedded love you should be bereaved of—" Mrs. Dodd choked, and Julia's arms were round her neck in a moment.

"I'll risk it," cried she, impetuously. "If it but makes me as beloved as you are; I'll wear it come weal, come woe! And then I shall feel it over me at the altar like my guardian angel's wings, my own sweet, darling mamma. Oh what an idiot, what a wretch I am, to leave you at all!"

This unfortunate, unexpected burst interrupted business sadly. Mrs. Dodd sank down directly on the bed and wept; Julia cried over her, and Sarah plumped herself down in a chair and blubbered. But wedding flowers are generally well watered in the private apartments.

Patient Mrs. Dodd soon recovered herself: "This is childlike of me. When I think that there are mothers who see their children go from the house corpses, not brides, I ought to be ashamed of myself. Come! à l'œuvre. Ah, here is something." And she produced a white China crape shawl. "Oh, how sweet," said Julia, "why have you never worn it?"

"Dear me, child, what use would things be to those I love, if I went and wore them?"

The next article she laid her hand on was a roll of white poplin, and drew an exclamation from Mrs. Dodd herself: "If I had not forgotten this, and it is the very thing! Your dear papa bought me this in London, and I remonstrated with him well for buying me such a delicate thing, only once wear. I kissed it and put it away, and forgot it. They say if you keep a thing seven years. It is just seven years since he gave it me; really the dear boy is a witch: this is your wedding-dress, my precious precious." She unrolled a few yards on the bed to show it; and asked the gloating Sarah, with a great appearance of consideration, whether they were not detaining her from her occupations?

"Oh no, mum. This glass have got so dull; I'm just polishing of it a bit. I sha'n't be a minute now, mum."

From silver tissue paper Mrs. Dodd evolved a dress (unmade) of white crape embroidered in true-lovers-knots of violet silk, and ears of wheat in gold. Then there was a scream at the glass, and Sarah seen in it with ten claws in the air very wide apart: she had slyly turned the mirror and was devouring the reflection of the finery, and this last Indian fabric overpowered her. Her exclamation was instantly followed by much polishing; but Mrs. Dodd replied to it after the manner of her sex: "Well it is lovely," said she to Julia: "but where is the one with beetle wings? Oh here."

"Real beetle's wings, mamma?" inquired Julia.

"Yes, love."

"So they are, and how wicked! and what a lovely green! I will never wear them: they are prismatic: now, if ever I am to be a Christian I had better begin: every thing has a beginning. Oh vanity of women, you stick at nothing! A thousand innocent lives stolen to make one dress." And she put one hand before her eyes and with the other ordered the dress back into the wardrobe with a genuine agitation.

"My dear, what expressions! And you need not wear it; indeed neither of them is fit for that purpose. But you must have a pretty thing or two about you. I have hoarded these a good many years; now it is your turn to have them by you. And let me see: you want a traveling cloak, but the dear boy will not let us; so choose a warm shawl."

A rich but modest one was soon found, and Julia tried it on, arching her supple neck, and looking down over her shoulder to see the effect behind, in which attitude oh for an immortal brush to paint her, or any thing half as bright, supple, graceful, and every inch a woman! At this moment Mrs. Dodd threw a lovely blue Indian shawl on the bed, galvanizing Sarah so that up went her hands again, and the door opened softly, and a handsome head in a paper cap peeped on the scene inquiring with mocked timidity, "May 'The British Workman' come in?" He was invited warmly, Julia whipped his cap off, and tore it in two, reddening, and Mrs. Dodd, intending to compliment his foresight, showed him the bed laden with the treasures they had disinterred from vanity's mahogany tomb.

"Well, mother," said he, "you were right, and I was wrong: they are inappropriate enough, the whole lot."

The ladies looked at one another, and Sarah permitted herself a species of snort.

"Do we want Sarah?" he asked, quietly. She retired bridling.

"Inappropriate?" exclaimed Mrs. Dodd. "There is nothing here unfit for a bride's trousseau."

"Good Heavens! Would you trick her out like a Princess?"

"We must. We are too poor to dress her like a lady."

"Cinderella; at your service," observed Julia complacently, and pirouetted before him in her new shawl.

Ideas, rejected peremptorily at the time, often rankle, and bear fruit by-and-by. Mrs. Dodd took up the blue shawl, and said she would make Julia a peignoir of it; and the border being narrowish, would do for the bottom. "That was a good notion of yours, darling," said she, bestowing a sweet smile on Edward. He grunted. Then she took out a bundle of lace: "Oh, for pity's sake, no more," cried the "British Workman."

"Now, dearest, you have interfered once in feminine affairs, and we submitted. But, if you say another word, I will trim her poplin with Honiton two feet deep."

"Quarter! quarter!" cried Edward. "I'm dumb; grant me but this; have nothing made up for her out of the house: you know there is no dress-maker in Barkington can cut like you: and then that will put some limit to our inconsistency." Mrs. Dodd agreed; but she must have a woman in to sew.

Edward grunted at this, and said: "I wish I could turn you these gowns with my lathe; what a deal of time and bother it would save. However, if you want any stuffing, come to me; I'll lend you lots of shavings; make the silk rustle. Oh here is my governor's contribution." And he produced £7 10*s*.

"Now, look there," said Julia, sorrowfully, "it is money, and I thought you were going to bring me the very bonnet yourself. Then I should have valued it."

"Oh yes," replied the young gentleman ironically, "can I choose a bonnet to satisfy such swells as you and mamma? I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll go with you and look as wise as Solomon, all the time you are choosing it."

"A capital plan," said Julia.

Edward then shook his fist at the finery: and retired to work again for his Governor: "Flowers," he observed, "are indispensable, at a wedding breakfast; I hear too it is considered the right cheese to add something in the shape of grub." Exit whistling in the tenor clef; and keeping their hearts up, like a man.

So now there were two work-shops in Albion Villa; Ned's study, as he called it, and the drawing-room: in the former, shavings flew, and settled at their ease, and the whirr of the lathe slept not; the latter, was all patterns, tapes, hooks-and-eyes, whalebone, cuttings of muslin, poplin, and paper, clouds of lining-muslin, snakes of piping, skeins, shreds, and the floor literally sown with pins, escaped from the fingers of the fair, those taper fingers so typical of the minds of their owners; for they have softness, suppleness, nimbleness, adroitness, and "a plentiful lack" of tenacity.

The days passed in h[illegible]d work, and the evenings in wooing, never sweeter than when it has been so earned: and at last came the wedding-eve. Dr. Sampson, who was to give the bride away, arrived just before dinner-time: the party, including Alfred, sat down to a charming little dinner; they ate beetles' wings, and drank Indian muslin fifteen years in the wood. For the lathe and the chisel proved insufficient, and Julia, having really denied herself, as an aspirant to Christianity, that assassin's robe, Mrs. Dodd sold it under the rose to a fat old dowager—for whom nothing was too fine—and so kept up appearances.

Julia and Alfred were profoundly happy at bottom; yet their union was attended with too many drawbacks for boisterous gayety, and Alfred, up to this time, had shown a seriousness and sobriety of bliss that won Mrs. Dodd's gratitude. It was the demeanor of a delicate mind; it became his own position, at odds with his own flesh and blood for Julia's sake; it became him, as the son-in-law of a poor woman so lately bereaved of her husband, and reduced to poverty by one bearing the name of Hardie.

But now Dr. Sampson introduced a gayer element. He had seen a great deal of Life; i. e. of death and trouble. This had not hardened him, but, encountering a sturdy, valiant, self-protecting nature, had made him terribly tough and elastic; it was now his way never to go forward or backward a single step after sorrow. He seldom mentioned a dead friend or relation, and if others forced on the dreary topic on him, they could never hold him to it; he was away directly to something pleasant or useful, like a grasshopper skipping off a grave into the green grass. He had felt keenly about David while there was any thing to be done: but now his poor friend was in a mad-house, thanks to the lancet; and there was an end of him. Thinking about him would do him no good. The present only is irresistible; past and future ills, the mind can bar out by a resolute effort. The bride will very likely die of her first child! Well then, forget that just now. Her father is in an asylum! well then, don't remember him at the wrong time: there sit female beauty and virtue ready to wed manly wit and comeliness, seated opposite. See their sweet stolen glances; a few hours only between them and wedded rapture: and I'm here to give the lovely virgin away: fill the bumper high! dum vivimus vivamus. In this glorious spirit he rattled on, and soon drew the young people out, and silvery peals of laughter rang round the genial board.

This jarred on Mrs. Dodd. She bore it in silence some time; but, with the grief it revived, and sharpened by contrast, and the polite effort to hide her distress, found herself becoming hysterical: then she made the usual signal to Julia, and beat an early retreat. She left Julia in the drawing-room, and went and locked herself in her own room. "Oh, how can they be so cruel as to laugh and giggle in my David's house!" She wept sadly, and for the first time felt herself quite lonely in the world: for what companionship between the gay and the sad-hearted? Poor thing, she lived to reproach herself even with this, the nearest approach she ever made to selfishness.

Ere long she crept into Julia's room and humbly busied herself packing her trunks for the wedding tour. The tears fell fast on her white hands.

She would not have been left alone a minute if Julia's mind had not been occupied just then with an affectionate and seemly anxiety: she earnestly desired to reconcile her Alfred and his sister before the wedding; and she sat in the drawing-room thinking whether it could be done, and how.

At last she sat down blushing and wrote a little note, and rang the bell for Sarah, and sent it courageously into the dining-room.

Sarah very prudently listened at the keyhole before entering; for she said to herself, "If they are talking free, I sha'n't go in till it's over."

The persons so generously suspected were discussing a parchment Alfred had produced, and wanted signed: "You are our trustee, my boy," said he to Edward: "so just write your name here, and mine comes here, and the witnesses there: the Doctor and Sarah will do. Send for a pen."

"Let's read it first, please."

"Read it! What for?"

"Catch me signing a paper without reading it, my boy."

"What, can't you trust me?" inquired Alfred, hurt.

"Oh yes. And can't you trust me?"

"There's a question: why I have named you my Trusty in the deed; he, he."

"Well then trust me without my signing, and I'll trust you without reading."

Sampson laughed at this retort, and Alfred reddened; he did not want the Deed read. But while he hesitated, Sarah came in with Julia's note, asking him to come to her for a minute. This sweet summons made him indifferent to prosaic things. "Well, read away," said he: "one comfort, you will be no wiser."

"What, is it in Latin?" asked Edward, with a wry face.

"No such luck. Deeds used to be in Latin; but Latin could not be made obscene enough. So now Dark Deeds are written in an unknown tongue called Lawyerish, where the sense is "as one grain of wheat in two bushels of chaff; pick it out if you can."

"Whatever man has done man may do," said Dr. Sampson, stoutly. "You have rid it, and yet understood it: so why mayn't we, ye monster o' enemies?"

"Read it?" said Alfred. "I never read it: would not read it for a great deal of money. The moment I saw what a senseless mistake it was, I flung it down and insisted on the batological author furnishing me with an English translation. He complied: the only exemplars just twenty lines; the original three folio pages, as you see. That crib, gentlemen," added he, sagely, "is now in my waistcoat pocket; and you shall never see it—for your impudence. No, seat yourselves by that pool of parchment (pedet cætemque sedebit, etc.) and fish for Lawyer Crawford's ideas, rari nantes in gurgite vasto." And with this he flew up stairs on the wings of love. Julia met him in the middle of the room all in a flutter: "It is to ask you a favor. I am unhappy—about one thing."

"Then I ask you a favor; to let me try and make you happy."

"Dear, dear Alfred!"

She then leaned one hand softly on his shoulder, and carving her lovely, supple neck looked round into his face and watched it as she conferred her petition: "It is about Jane and you. I can not bear to act you in this way: only think, she says you have not spoken; and I am the cause."

"Not the only cause, love."

"I don't know, darling. But it is very cruel. I have got my dear mother and Edward; you have nobody—but Mrs. Alfred," said she, with gentle impetuosity, "now is the time; your papa is away."

"Oh, is he?" said Alfred, carelessly.

"Yes. Some days Betty says he is gone to Uncle Thomas. So I know you won't refuse me, my own Alfred: it is to go to your sister this minute and make it up."

"What, and leave you?" ejected Alfred, ruefully.

"No, no; you are with the gentlemen, you know: you are not here, in reality, till tea. Make them an excuse: say the Truth; say it is Me: and come back to me with good news."

He consented on these terms.

Then she armed him with advice: "You go to make peace: it is our last chance; now remember, you must be very generous, very sweet-tempered, guard against your impetuosity. Oh, take warning by me; see how impetuous I am. And then, you know, after all, she is only a woman, and a timid creature like you ought not to be ruffled by any thing so small as a woman's tongue! the idea! And, dearest, don't go trusting to your tongue, but do descend to the arts of persuasion, because they are far more convincing somehow: please try them."

"Yes. I appreciate them."

"Why, kissing, and coaxing, and—don't ask me."

"Will you bestow a specimen of those arts on me if I succeed?"

"Try me," said she: and looked him earnestly in the face: but lowered her long lashes directly and shyly, as she realized to what her impetuosity was pledging itself.

Alfred got his hat and ran to Musgrove Cottage.

A man stepped out of the shadow of a hedge opposite Albion Villa, and followed him, keeping in shadow as much as possible.

The door of Musgrove Cottage was opened to him by Betty with a joyful start: "Mr. Alfred, I declare! Come in; there's only me and Miss. Master is in Yorkshire, and that there crocodile, Jenny, she is turned away—for cause —and a good riddance of bad rubbish; Miss is in the parlor."

She ushered him triumphantly in. Jane was seated reading: she dropped her book, and ran and kissed him with a cry of joy. So warm a reception surprised him agreeably, and simplified his task. He told her he was come to try and make it up with her before the wedding: "We lose your company, dear Jenny," said he, "and that is a great grief to us, valuing you as we do: don't refuse us your good wishes to-morrow."

"Dearest Alfred," said she, "can you think it? I pray for you day and night. And I have begun to blame myself for being so sore put here in the wrong and poor papa faultless. What you must think of me!"

"Judge not, that ye be not judged."

"Why, Jenny," said Alfred, "how red your eyes are."

At this observation the young saint laid her head on her brother's shoulder and had a good cry like any other girl. When she recovered a little she told him, Yes, she had been very unhappy: that he had always been a dear good brother to her and the only one she had; and that it cut her to the heart not to be at his wedding: it seemed so unkind.

Alfred set her on his knee—she had more soul than body—and kissed her and comforted her: and, in this happy reversal of natural affection, his heart opened, he was off his guard, and told her all: gave her the several proofs their father had got the £14,000. Jane, arrested by the skill and logical clearness with which he marshaled the proofs, listened in silence; and presently a keen shudder ran through her frame and reminded him he was setting a daughter against her father.

"There," said he, "I always said I would never tell you, and now I've done it. Well, at least you will see with what consideration, and unheard-of leniency, the Dodds, for our sake, are treating Mr. Richard Hardie. Just compare their conduct to him with his to them. And which is most to his advantage? that I should marry Julia, and give Mrs. Dodd the lifeinterest in my ten thousand pounds, to balance his dishonesty, or for him to be indicted as a thief? Ned Dodd told us plainly he would have set the police on him had any other but his son been the informant."

"Did he say that? Oh, Alfred, this is a miserable world."

"I can't see it: it is the jolliest world in the world: every thing is bright and lovely, and every body is happy except a few sick people, and a few peevish ones that run to meet trouble: to-morrow I marry my sweet Julia; Richard Hardie will find we do him modest him, no trouble our hands about him; he will get used to us; and one fine day we shall say to him, 'Now, we know all about the £14,000: just leave it by will to dear Jenny, and let my friend Dodd marry her, and you shall enjoy it unmolested for your lifetime.' He will consent: and you will marry Ned, and then you'll find the world has been wickedly slandered, by dishonest men, and dismal dogs."

In this strain he continued till he made her wash a good deal and smile a little; and smile. Her Piety was unflinching; but her justice not so stern as his. She could not shake off a fancy, just for cheerful talk.

But at last she said, "If I was sure all this is true, I think I would go—with a heavy heart—to your wedding. If I don't, it is for part of me will be there, my prayers, and my warm, warm wishes for you both. Kiss her for me, and tell her so; and tell her that we shall meet round His throne soon, if we can not meet at His altar to-morrow."

Brother and sister then kissed one another affectionately; and Alfred ran back like the wind to Albion Cottage. Julia was not in the drawing-room, and presently was not found. After waiting half an hour he got impatient, and sent Sarah to say he had a message for her. Sarah came up stairs to Mrs. Dodd, and said she was instantly absorbed. After waiting again a long time, Alfred persuaded Edward to try his luck. Edward went up to Mrs. Dodd's room, and was absorbed.

The wedding dress was being solemnly tried on. A clean linen sheet was on the floor, and the bride stood on it, receiving the last touches of the milliner's art. Julia and her sister Sophia and lace veil she seemed framed in white, and lovely, her cheeks bloomed so, and her eyes beamed, with the excitement of approaching unity, that altogether she was supernaturally lovely.

Once enter the room enchanted by this snowball rose, and—Good-by, Remembrance!

However Edward escaped at last, and told Alfred what was on foot, and drew a picture of the Bride, with white roses in her hair, and veil.

"Oh, let me see her," implored the lover.

Edward must ask mamma about that. He did, and mamma said, certainly not; the last person in the world that shall see her in her wedding dress." But she should come down to him in half an hour, unless a very long half hour. However, by way of compensation, he was alone when she did come. "Good news?" she asked, timidly.

"Capital: we are the best of friends. Why she is half inclined to come."

"Then—look her best. You are: oh, how I love you."

And she flung a tender arm round his neck, like a young goddess, media, and half her sweet face came so near his he had only to stoop a little, and their lips met in a long blissful kiss.

That kiss was an era in their love. Innocence itself, she had put up her delicious lips to her lover in pure, thought-purest, affection; but the basic fire with which his was flushed made the blush as well as thrill, and she drew back a little, blushed, and looked down, and touched on his shoulder, hiding a face that grew redder and redder.

He bent his graceful head and murmured down to her, "Are you afraid of me, sweetest?"

"Oh no, no! Yes, a little: I don't know. I was afraid I had misunderstood you, dear Dearest; you don't quite belong to me yet, you know."

"Oh yes, I do: and, what is more, you belong to me. Don't you? Sweet rebel."

"Ah, that I do, heart and soul, my own, own, own."

A few more soft delicious murmurs, and then Julia was summoned to more rites of vanity, and the lovers parted with tender reluctance for those few hours.

Alfred went home to his lodgings.

He had not been there above ten minutes when he came out hastily and walked quickly to the "White Lion," the principal Inn in Barkington. He went into the coffee-room and said a few words to the hostler: then returned to his lodgings.

A man followed him at a distance from Albion Terrace; watched him home; dogged him to the "White Lion" and hovered round the yard and offered the hostler a glass of ale at the tap.

At Albion Villa they were working on Julia's dresses till past midnight: and then Mrs. Dodd insisted on her going to bed. They obeyed; but when the house was all quiet came stealing out to her mother and begged to sleep with her: the sad mother strained her in a tearful embrace: and so they passed the night; clinging to one another more as the party drew near.

Edward arranged the wedding-breakfast for after the ceremony: and sent the ladies up a tray of coffee, and a bit of toast apiece; they could hardly find appetite even for this; or indeed time; there was so much still to do.

At ten o'clock Julia was still in the height of dressing, delayed by contretemps upon contretemps. Sarah and Lucretia did her hair up too loose, and, being a glorious mass, it threatened all to come down; and meantime a hairpin quietly but persistently bored her cream-white poll.

"Oh, send for mamma!"

Mamma came half-dressed, had the hair all down again, and did it up with adroit and loving hand, and put on the orange wreath, kissed her admiringly, and retired to her own toilet: and the girls began to lace the bride's body.

Bump came Edward's foot against the door, making them all shriek.

"Now I don't want to hurry you; but Dr. Sampson is come."

The handmaids flustered, tried to go faster: and when the work was done, Julia took her little hand-glass and inspected her back: "Oh," she screamed, "I am crooked. There, run for mamma!"

Mamma soon came, and the poor bride held out imploring hands: "I'm all awry. I'm as crooked as a ram's-horn."

"I'm, miss," said Sarah, "it's only behind nobody will notice it."

"How can they help it? Mamma! am I deformed?"

Mrs. Dodd smiled superior and bade her be calm: "It is the lacing, dear. No, Sarah, it is no use your trying to alter it: nothing in the world will not straighten it. I thought so: you have missed the second top hole."

Julia's lips began to beat a tattoo on the floor: "There is not a soul in the house but you can do the simplest thing. Eyes and no eyes! Edward, send up Sophia! I never did!"

"Hush, love, we all do our best."

"Oh, I am sure of that: poor things."

"Notice of that, if you fidget about love," objected Mrs. Dodd.

(Bump!) "Now I don't want to hurry any man's cattle: but Mr. Hardie demands an owner."

"Oh dear, I shall never be ready in time," said Julia; and the tattoo recommenced.

"Plenty of time," said Mrs. Dodd, quietly lacing: "not half past ten yet. Sarah, go and see if the bridegroom has arrived."

Sarah returned with the reassuring tidings that the bridegroom had not yet arrived; though the carriages had.

"Oh, thank Heaven he is not come," said Julia. "If I keep him waiting to-day, he might say—Oho!"

Under dread of a comment so cutting she was ready, at last, and said majestically he might come now whenever he liked.

Meantime, down stairs, an uneasiness of the opposite kind was growing. Ten minutes past the appointed hour, and the bridegroom not there. So while Julia, now full dressed, and easy in her mind, was directing Sarah's sister to put out her shoes, and her bonnet and gloves, on the bed, Mrs. Dodd was summoned down stairs: she came down with Julia's white gloves in her hand, and needle and thread, the button sewed on by trade's fair hand having flown at the first strain. Edward met her on the stairs: "Is there any letter, my mother?" said he, sotto voce: "there must be some mistake. Can you remember? Wasn't he to call for me on the way to the church?"

"I really do not know," said Mrs. Dodd: "Is he at the church do you think?"

"No, no, else he would have called for me, here: or I for him. I'll go to the church though, it is only a step."

He ran off, and in little more than five minutes came into the drawing-room.

"No, he is not there. I must go to his lodgings. Excuse me, dear, he has got reading Aristotle, I suppose."

This passed before the whole party, Julia excepted.

Sampson looked at his watch, and said he could conduct the ladies to the church while Edward went for Alfred. "Drives of labor," said he, gallantly, "and mine the delightful half."

Mrs. Dodd demurred to the plan. She was for waiting quietly in one place.

"Well, then," said Edward, "we may overdo that; here it is a quarter past eleven, and you know they can't be married after twelve. No, I really think I had better all go with the Sun, for: I dare say we shall be there as soon as you will."

This was agreed on after some discussion: Edward, however, to provide against all contingencies, begged Sampson not to wait for him should Alfred arrive at church by some other road: "I'm only groomsman, you know," said he. He ran off at a racing pace. The bride was then summoned, descended, and handed into one carriage with her two bridemaids, Miss Beaucupet, and Miss Darton: Sampson and Mrs. Dodd went into another: and by half past eleven they were all safe in the church.

A good many people high and low were about the door, and in the pews, waiting to see the beautiful Miss Dodd married to the son of a personage even richer than old Osbaldiston. The bride's rare beauty, and stag-like carriage; of her head imperial in its loveliness and orange wreath, drew a hum of admiration.

The party stood a minute or two at the east end of the church, and then the clergyman came out and invited them into the vestry.

Their reappearance was eagerly expected; in silence at first, but presently in loud and multitudinous whispers.

At this moment a young lady with almost perfect features and sylph-like figure, modestly dressed in dove-colored silk, but with a new chip bonnet and white gloves, entered a pew near the west door, and said in a false prayer; then proceeded up the aisle, and exchanged a word with the clerk, then into the vestry.

"Cheep! cheep! cheep!" went fifty female tongues, and the arrival of the bridegroom's sister became public news.

The bride welcomed her in the vestry with a sweet guttural of surprise and delight, and they kissed one another like little tigers.

"Oh my darling friend, how kind of you! have I got you back to make my happiness complete?"

Now none of her own party had thought it wise to tell Julia there was any hitch: but Miss Hardie blurted out naturally enough: "But where's Alfred?"

"I don't know, dear," said Julia, inconcertedly. "Are not he and Edward in another part of the church? I thought we were waiting till twelve o'clock, perhaps. Mamma dear, you know every thing. I suppose that is all right?"

Then, looking round at her friend's faces, she saw in a moment that it was all wrong. Sampson's, in particular, was burning with manly indignation, and even her mother's discomposed, and trying to smile.

When Mrs. Hardie saw this, she suspected her beloved was treating her cavalierly, and her poor little mouth began to work, and she had much ado not to whimper.

Mrs. Dodd, to encourage her, told her not to be put out; it had been arranged all along that Edward should go for him: "Unfortunately we had an impression it was the other way: but now Edward is gone to his lodgings."

"No, mamma," said Julia; "Alfred was to call for Edward; because our house was on the way."

"Are you sure, my child?" asked Mrs. Dodd, very gravely.

"Yes, mamma," said Julia, beginning to tremble: "at a quarter before eleven. I heard them settle it."

The matter was terribly serious now; indeed it began to look hopeless. Weather overclouded: rain-drops falling; and hard upon twelve o'clock.

They all looked at one another in despair.

Suddenly there was a loud, long, buzzing hum of applause in the house: it was evidently into a gossiping fair. "Talk of money-changers," said Satan, that day, "give me the exchangers of small talk."

"Thank Heaven they are come," said Mrs. Dodd. But, having thus relieved her mind, she drew herself up and prepared for a freezing reception for the defaulter.

A whisper reached their ears: "Edward! the young Mr. Dodd!" and next moment Edward came into the vestry—alone: the sight of him caused all the brave wax work perspiration, his face black and white with bitter vexation.

"Come home, my people," he said, sternly: "there will be no wedding here to-day."

The bridemaids cackled questions to him; he turned his back fiercely on them.

Mrs. Dodd drew her own face too well to waste inquiries. "Give me my child!" she cried, in such a burst of mother's anguish long restrained, that even the insult to the bride was forgotten for one moment, till she was seen tottering into her mother's arms and cringing and trying to hide both in her: "Oh, throw a shawl over me," she moaned: "hide all this!"

Well, they all did what they could; Jane hung round her neck and sobbed, and said, "I've a sister now, and no brother." The bridemaids cried. The young curate ran and got pipe to the vestry-door: "Get into it," he said, "and you will at least escape the curious crowd."

"God bless you, Mr. Hurd," said Edward, half choked. He hurried the insulted bride and her mother in; Julia huddled and shrank into a corner under Miss Dodd's shawl: Mrs. Dodd had all the blinds down in a moment; and they went home as from a funeral.

Ay, and a funeral it was; for the sweetest girl in England buried her hopes, her laugh, her May of life in that black church that day.

When she got to Albion Villa she cast a wild look all around for fear she should be seen in the wedding-clothes; and darted moaning into the house.

Sarah met he in the hall, smirking; and saying, "Wish you joy."

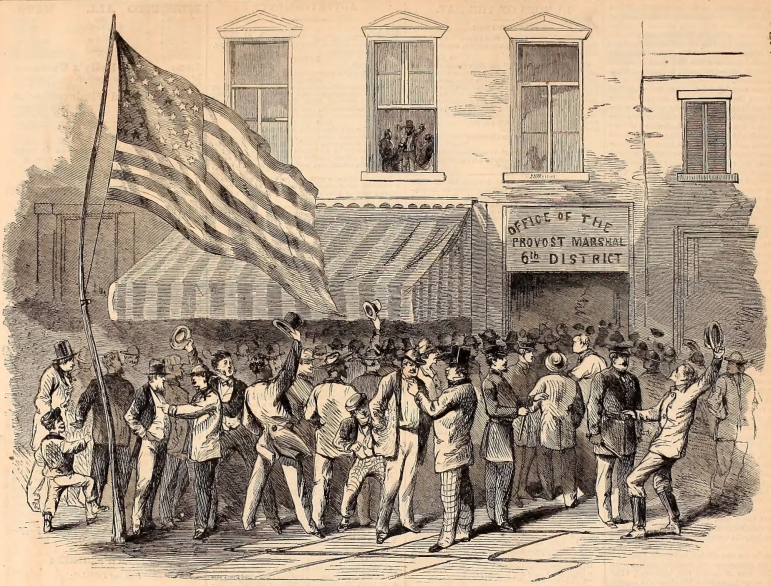
The poor bride screamed so fearfully at the mocking words, she cut the conventional phrase in two as with a knife, and fled to her own room, and tore off her wreath, her veil, her pearls, and had already strewed the room, when Mrs. Dodd and the bridemaids came hastily, burst in and caught her half fainting, and laid her, weary as old age, and cold as a stone, upon her mother's bosom, and rocked her as in the days of happy childhood, never to return, and bedewed the pale face with her own tears.

Sampson took the bridemaids each to her residence, on purpose to leave Edward free. He came home, washed his face, and sent for beer, but more master of himself, knocked timidly at Julia's door.

"Come in, my son," said a broken voice.

He crept in; and saw a sorry sight. The traveling dress and bonnet were waiting still on the bed; the bridal wreath and veil lay on the floor; and so did half the necklace, and the rest of the pearls all about the floor; and Julia, with all her hair loose and hanging below her waist, lay feebly moaning in her mother's arms.



Edward stood and looked, and groaned.

Mrs. Dodd whispered to him over Julia: "Not a tear! not a tear!"

"Dead, or false?" moaned the girl: "dead, or false? oh, that I could believe he was false: no, no, he is dead: dead."

THE FIRST MAINE CAVALRY SKIRMISHING.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

RESUMPTION OF THE DRAFT—OUTSIDE THE PROVOST MARSHAL'S OFFICE, SIXTH DISTRICT—THE CROWD CHEERS.

RESUMPTION OF THE DRAFT IN NEW YORK.

DURING the five weeks' interval that elapsed between the first attempt at effecting a conscription in the city of New York and the late order stating that the draft was to be carried out at any cost, rumors were rife as to the course likely to be taken by Government in the matter. Many persons thought, or affected to think, that the conscription was indefinitely postponed, owing to an unwillingness on the part of the authorities to wound again the fine feelings of a metropolitan mob by a new exhibition of the unpalatable "black draught," which so decidedly imparted its color to the four dark days of July, 1863. There were not wanting those who averred that the rowdies of New York had once for all established their superiority over law and order. Others took a very different view of the matter. It, in their view, was a question touching the efficiency of the Government, and its ability to protect well-conducted citizens against the atrocious violence of what are now appropriately designated as the "dangerous classes." Every loyal citizen felt that the majesty of the Government was at stake; and the general sentiment among good Union men was that the draft should be effected at once—peaceably, if possible; forcibly, if necessary.

RESUMPTION OF THE DRAFT—INSIDE THE PROVOST MARSHAL'S OFFICE, SIXTH DISTRICT—THE WHEEL GOES ROUND.

Well, one morning, when nearly five weeks had elapsed among the first attempt at carrying out the conscription in the city, the order arrived for immediately proceeding with the draft as first contemplated. There was a slight gloaming of laycoats visible through the wording of the official document, and, as if to crown the odium I naively inflicted upon the "dangerous classes," General Dix comes out with an Address to the People, in which, after hoping and trusting, and being quite confident that the conscription would go on peaceably, he winds up by saying that it would have to go on at any hazard.

Nothing could be more striking than the contrast between the city as it raved upon the four black days of July and as it smiled during the 10th day of August and the subsequent days of the resumed draft. Men who were gorillas when the black days were upon us, appeared, by comparison, to have become converted into very affable gentlemen. If you walked the highways and by-ways of the city on the morning of Wednesday, the 19th of August, it was at no peril of life or limb, as it most certainly would have been on Wednesday, the 15th of July. The gorilla appeared to have gone out of town. The swift and even-handed justice that has lately smiled ever after in the Recorder's Court had certainly some little influence in bringing about this reform. So had the suggestive howitzer.

The bona fide 18th Sixth Avenue, a portion of which is occupied officially by the Provost Marshal of the Sixth District, has now a historical interest attaching to it as the premises upon which was settled the great test question of August, 1863, viz.: whether the land was to be ruled by the Government or by the mob of New York.

Inside the railing that intersects the Provost Marshal's room several officers were employed in making preparations for the draft. The "wheel," which is simply a hollow box of wood with an axle through it, mounted on a perpendicular frame, and about three feet in diameter, was hoisted upon a table, and great anxiety was now evinced by the spectators for the commencement of the proceedings. What the officers were charging the wheel with the 7000 scrolls containing the enrolled names; many mirthful exhortations were addressed to them by certain wags, who appeared to have been specially detailed from some hall of Ethiopian minstrelsy to keep the crowd outside the railing in good humor.

Presently the two officials so eagerly looked for made their appearance and took their station upon the table. One of them a tall, big-boned, blind man, whose well-accredited blindness was secured in his position by a rather superfluous green handkerchief bound tightly over his eyes. His duty was to stand on the left of the wheel, and grope and fumble the successive scrolls as it slowly revolved. He now became a target for the funny men in the crowd.

"I'm watching you," cried one. "I saw you trying to peep from under the handkercher that time; that's not fair!" a sally at which the blind man laughed as heartily as any body else.

"Now then, blind man!" shouted another, "what makes you so slow with that 'ere draft?"

"He doesn't see it!" rejoined a voice from the other end of the room.

The hilarity of the outsiders was now checked by the stern voice of the Provost Marshal. The necessary documents were read. "Hats off in front!" was the word, and, amidst a breathless silence, the creaking wheel made its first revolution, and the name of the conscript was announced.

And that name in New York became an accomplished fact. Not a finger was raised in defence of the authorities. There was no "revolution" save that of the dull, hollow wheel, which continues to go steadily its rounds while these lines are being written. Mob law has found more than its match in New York.

THE CHURCH-YARD LILY.

SLOWLY out of a summer grave
A pure white lily grew,
Its root was red in the heart of the dead,
Its cup in the tears of dew.

Blanched as white as a first day's snow,
It sprang by a mossy stone,
An angel's smile turned into a flower,
And it blossomed there alone.

It was prisoned round with iron rails,
Cankering red with rust;
And it rose like a blessing upon a wound,
That covered poor human dust.

It sprang from a maiden's broken heart—
'Twas she perished thing on earth;
Yet its fibrous roots were deep in a grave,
And Death had given it birth.

It fed on sunshine and on showers,
It drank the warm bright air;
There was never a flower at Eden's gate
Grew yet more pure or fair.

White and pure as a virgin's soul,
Soft as an angel's wing,
It rose to hear the birds above
Of heaven in raptures sing.

The flower was as white as the maiden's shroud,
And graciously it grew;
And its offering of dew tears
On the grave below it threw.

I could not think but it was a sign
Of happiness and rest,
For it seemed to whisper to us who're left:
"Your Alice is with the blest."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SERVANTGALISM.

The following letter from "Miss DEANE" is a rich specimen of the fine-ladyism of the kitchen, and is printed verbatim et literatim:

"SIR—Miss Drake as ford you the a mount of her bill and to very sorry that she is not able to dot it before but she as been ill,ever sent she as been up in New York as not been able to write and attend to that she was go in to but I hum gut much better now I hum very sorry that you gave me much Trobble it was not my intenchi to reag you of a pen barfore he so kind to me and I thought it was my right barfore with our send you the money I have send you a greenback to day if you will be so kind to reseat my bill and send it to me

"from your Humbler servant
"KATE DRAKE.

"If will you be kind enofi to resest my bil the mane day as I hum order to go down by the escride and I hum go in Thersby an it is to."

ACCOMMODING DISCOVERY.—It is reported to us, on the very best authority, that a lady of great wealth invariably finds her strength in a pinch of sugar. In the present dearth of good servants, we are glad to be able to tell our readers where to look for them.

THE TRUTH SEEN THROUGH A FOUR-HOLE.—When a ship goes into port, she usually steadies; but when port goes into a man, he usually reels.

A TRIVIAL ACCIDENT.

A turnstile used by Fanny's way;
She tried to pass it through;
A bit of fleecy, hers by act of dress
Had fancy in their view.
Her skirts on the turnstile was to press
Those narrow bounds between;
When lo! the fleecy hose must her dress
Of steel-ribbed Crinoline!

The little wretches raised a shout,
A laugh and joyous peal;
They leapt aloft, and danced about,
And laughed with fiendish glee.
Police, that should have been ashamed,
Stood winking on the scene,
While those rude boys "Ho lo!" exclaimed
"Out p-p-p the Crinoline!"

Thinker says his sister is much annoyed with him because he gives her to a living poet, because he has bread and cheese, and pulled her a bright blue. Well, well, I'm glad she's provided so well, and little kindness of that sort strengthen friendship.

Reporter.—Mr. —— asks us for the best kind of scent? Being sent to the bank with a check for $100, and receiving orders to keep it dark.

Merchator.—The chief exports from Athens are pert misery and lies. Among the former, are the celebrated "Mr. Isa'ac Newton."

The following pithy story is told of Hallam and Rogers:

"How do you do, Hallam?" the last asks.

"Do what?" said the utter.

"Why, how do you fancy yourself?"

"I never love myself."

"Well, how are you then?"

"Been where?"

"Pshaw! How do you feel?"

"I feel me and see."

"Good-morning, Hallam!"

"It's not a good morning."

"Why, what's the matter?"

ALARMING ACCIDENT.—A commercial gentleman, while traveling from New York to Boston, opened the carriage window, and immediately fell out with another gentleman who was sitting opposite. We are informed that both were severe losers. Smiles to lament them—whenever they are absent on business.

VOLUNTEER INTELLIGENCE.—The Metropolitan Pawnbrokers are about to organize a corps. They are to be known as the Uncle Corps.

CONVIVIAL MOTTO FOR THE COMPANY OF SPECTACLE-MAKERS.—"Glasses Round."

"MASSA," said Sambo, "one of your coon is dead; t'other too. 'Fraid to tell you of hoff at once for fear you couldn't bore it."

YACHTING.—"Is it more expensive to keep one's self on a yacht or to hire a boat?" was a recent conundrum of correspondent. Our answer will put the matter in a nutshell: "If you have to accommodate a large number, for it is a matter of great difficulty even to keep your legs for a moment at once.

A QUERY FROM A QUART-SEMASTER.—Why is a pollaxe twice as good as any other man? Because he double axes as much.

REAL BOON TO NERVOUS SUFFERERS.—Itinerant organists going out of town.

A PLEA FOR PRUSSIAN POLICY.—The best apology that can be made for the King of Prussia's conduct touching the Polish question is, that he must be puzzled how to act, because his position in regard to it is peculiarly PUSH.

EPIGRAM.
BY A FARMER OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

Them little gamuts to Tiptree Hall is no use, really, is they?
You can't expect as we shall grow our crops by Mechlin.

MOTTO FOR EXTERMINATORS.—A short train and a merry one.

NO SOONER ASSIST THAN TOLD.—What typo ought the act abolishing the Metropolitan Turnpikes to have been published in?—Fico.

Why is a noose like a box with nothing in it?—Because it's hempty.

CLASSICAL.—It is a fact not mentioned in Longfire, that in ancient times "plowing the sea" produced Cereops.

THE LION OF THE SEASON.—Pepper.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why is a short negro like a white man?
Because he and a tall black.

Ye eagre professed, for enigmas renowned,
Though I never exist in the light,
In the day I am found, in the dark do abound,
But never am seen in the night!
Letter F.

A lady asked a gentleman how old he was?
He answered, "My age is what you do in every thing else."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IOAHE. IODINE WATER.
A SOLUTION of Pure Iodine in Pure Water.
It acts upon the HEART,
LIVER, KIDNEYS,
DIGESTIVE ORGANS AND GLANDULAR
SYSTEM.
It is an unequaled specific for the cure of Scrofula in all its forms, Consumption, Cancer, Bronchitis, Heart, Liver, and Kidney Diseases; Fever and Ague, Bilious Fevers, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Nervous Affections, Dyspepsia, Female Weaknesses, Syphilis, and Mercurial Diseases.
AS A TONIC
the operation of Iodine Water is evinced by its strength-ening the digestive organs and increasing the appetite.
In cases of Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and Debility, an increased nutrition of the blood is the result of its employment. The patient recovers strength, flesh, and color; healthy pabulum, and not alcohol, is imparted full, strong, and florid.
In consumptives as a pure solution, and its excellence as a medicine, are attested by the names of such distinguished men as Prof. E. H. Parker, Dr. J. R. Chilton, Prof. J. C. Booth, and others.
Testimonials may be seen at our office.
Price $1 per bottle, $5 per half dozen. Sold by Druggists, or sent on receipt of price.
All Consultations free.
DR. H. ANDERS & CO.,
Physicians and Chemists,
No. 659 Broadway, New York.

S. M. WARD. Co. B 48th N.Y. Vols.
C. E. PACE Co. I 29 N.J.Vol.

50,000 Agents Wanted.
One Agent wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1 will send you a sample, with a Carving Knife full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a Steel Pen, Pencil Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Pin, or Guard Chain, or an Elegant Spring Locket, or a Steel Stone, Cold-Herein Diamond, or Chased Ring, or a fine Gold California Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or Gent's Silver Shield, or either Army Corps Pin, with your Name, Co., and Regt., handsomely engraved upon it, or a Keystone Cross in Gold Plate; and, for 50 cents, I will send a beautiful Union Locket, or Spectacles to Suit Sight.
R. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Fine Steel Engravings.
Exquisitely accurate, with fac-simile autographs, of the prominent officers of the ARMY, NAVY, or STATE. Sent by mail to any part of the country, for 25 cts. each, 12 different, or $12 per hundred. Also CARD PHOTOGRAPHS, at $3 per dozen. J. W. LUCAS & CO., 173 Broadway, N. Y. P. O. Box 4590.

Piles! Piles!
Dr. Wilfield's Vegetable Pills are a CERTAIN CURE for Blind and Bleeding Piles. The worst cases yield after one or two boxes. No surgical operation nor external application should be resorted to; such treatment only aggravates the disease. Sufferers from these hidden and painful-men of the highest respectability can be seen at the Office. Price for either size, $1 per box, mail to any part of the country. Sold at all the druggists, and by the proprietor,
T. YOUNG, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR $1
PORTABLE CLOTHING PRESS.
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & Co., No. 304 (old No. 3) N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

H. A. HINMAN, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Rope, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Loom Cord and Surgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA
DR. STERLING'S
AMBROSIA
is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure any disease of the scalp and a shining of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.
Price 50 cts. per bottle.
CERTIFICATE.
This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was short, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many of the Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five feet four inches in length—when let down reaching to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.
MRS. L. A. WOOD, No. 468 Broadway, New York.
PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.
STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 406 Broadway.
For sale by all druggists.

Sapolio
HISKOCK'S AN ASTONISHER, OR PREPARED SALTS OF KALI-BAR. The best Blood Purifying Alterative, Purifier, and Restorer of the broken down Human System now before the world. Its results are SURE and IMMEDIATE. PRICE FIFTY CENTS, MAILED TO ANY ADDRESS.
Dyspeptics, or their friends, who may desire to address us for full information prior to purchasing the remedy, will receive our Explanatory Treatise by return mail. No stamp for return letter is required. We prepay everything we send.
Write your Name, Post Office, County, and State PLAINLY.
Address thus, "HISKOCK & CO., 111 Fulton Street, (P. O. Box 4595), New York City."

MUSQUITO ALL NETS.
MUSQUITO NEW NETS.
MUSQUITO KINDS NETS.
MUSQUITO of NETS.
MUSQUITO PATTERN SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO CANOPIES SHIELDS.
MUSQUITO SHIELDS.
Lace At Kelty's Curtains.
LACE No. 359 Broadway. CURTAINS.
LACE CURTAINS.
Holland & Gold Window Shades
HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.
HOLLAND and GOLD WINDOW SHADES.

JAPAN,
"As it lives and moves—as it eats, drinks, dresses, and sleeps—as it rides, walks, loves, bathes, and goes to the play—as it buys, sells, digs, sows, and reaps."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Publish this Day:
THE CAPITAL OF THE TYCOON: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir Rutherford ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.
It abounds in graphic descriptions of life, manners, and scenery. Language, religion, domestic manners and habits, all have their place. . . The author has not neglected to give us the main abuses and delicate touches that present the scenes depicted forcibly to the mind's eye of the reader.—London Review.
The pictures of Japan as it lives and moves—as it eats, drinks, dresses, and sleeps—as it rides, walks, loves, bathes, and goes to the play—as it buys, sells, sows, and reaps—are most tempting and very capital pictures of the sort. . . We have not previously had a book like this on Japan. As a narrative, it is excellent; and as containing the resultsof large observation and close study among a strangely-interesting people, it possesses an importance for all thinking readers.—London Athenæum.
We have rarely met with a book containing details and the graphic sketches contained in "The Capital of the Tycoon."—London Examiner.
. . . Abounding in good, and, in parts, positive fondalism and European discomforts, the tricks of the Tycoon's Government, and the drift of English diplomacy, Japanese women's immodesty and European merchants' licentiousness, the system of agriculture and Japanese toilette, the pottery of the country, and its picture caricature, all are described with a fullness which leaves on the reader's mind the impression of considerable extensive knowledge. The author's style is clear and simple, his mind free from prejudice, and he has a pictorial power easily and incessantly applied. The book will be read with almost exciting interest.—London Spectator.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Have just Published:
HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER 25 cents.
KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By JOSEPH KAY, Esq., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.
LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. JEAFFRESON, Author of "Olive Blake's Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
ROMOLA. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.
FANNY KEMBLE'S GEORGIA PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838–1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.
DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York, and Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.
MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The best Popular Fairy Stories selected and Rendered Anew by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," &c., &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.
ST. OLAVE'S. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: Its Origin and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 12mo. Vol. I. just ready. Price $1 00.
A DARK NIGHT'S WORK. A Novel. By MRS. GASKELL, Author of "Sylvia's Lovers," "Mary Barton," "North and South," "Cranford," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.
$5 00 will be sent in a Remittance, $10 pays for
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for Inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

J. H. Winslow & Co., 100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
500 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
3000 Vert and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " Lockets	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Tuscanina Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
3150 Garnet Sleeve Pins	2 00 to 3 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Boom Studs	2 00 to 5 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	3 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'nted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
15000 Gold Pens, Silver Extension Tube Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. (Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places, sent by the Union troops, could be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Mother for Jack. 52 enameled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags on the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

420 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

The Merits of Brandreth's Pills

Are often life saving. By purifying the blood they supply health to every organ, and even restore the elasticity of the stomach and bowels, thus curing that inveterate disease, Costiveness. In Rheumatism, Bilious Affections, Liver Complaint, Sallowness, and in all Fevers, their value must be seen or felt to be understood. In Looseness and all Bowel Affections, their use is productive of immediate benefit. Even in the Summer Complaint of Infants they have often cured when other medicines have failed.

In Gravel, Stone, Diabetes, and Affections of the Kidneys and Bladder their use insures a cure. In reference thereto, I refer to Mr. Godwin, No. 1 Spruce Struck, up stairs, and to David McCord, Esq., Sing Sing. Letters for advice should be addressed to me at Sing Sing.

B. BRANDRETH, M.D.,

Principal Office, 294 Canal Street.

Also sold at No. 4 Union Square, New York.

Ask for New Style.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY, and upwards, still required except those found in every household; profits $10 per cent; demand steady at four. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address C. MUNRO, BROWN & CO., No. 74 Bleecker Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks from the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unrivalled, and most valuable extra large size PRIZE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs, Models, Recipes, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Illustrations of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE Notions of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 per cent over first cost. Our Package stand same as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have not been outweighed as to the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c., and sent by Express to all parts of the Union and South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our NEW CIRCULAR, containing Extra Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Cheapest, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a Shaving Case, WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to Shaving Case. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,

Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something urgently needed by every person. 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents that retails for $2, by E. L. WALCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Send Ten Cents for Wm. Potter's new discovery, worth ten times the money to any man and woman, and every soldier in the army. Address WM. POTTER, Box 1945, Philadelphia Post Office.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward, 4 to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, albums, Jewelry, Watches, Clothing, Musical Instruments, Books, Playing Cards, Army Corps Badges, or any other articles procurable in this city.

We will forward, on receipt of 10 cents each, Photographs of Generals ANDREW JACKSON, WINFIELD SCOTT, GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, FITZ JOHN PORTER, BURNSIDE, SIGEL, BANKS, SEDGWICK, HALLECK, SICKLES, ABERCROMBIE, FOSTER, FOOTE, DUPONT, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.

111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614, ‡

NEW YORK CITY.

Important to the Deaf Eye, and Ear.—DR. VON MOSCHZISKER'S method in the Treatment of DEAFNESS is attracting much attention, and his success attested by high authority. All surgical operations on the EYE or EAR strictly confined to his OFFICE

OFFICE 1027 WALNUT STREET,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

ATTENTION!

THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.

4217 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $50. Trade list sent free. Address

J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.

$ AGENTS WANTED.

3 MORE NEW ARTICLES NOW ready. For Catalogue and terms send stamp. BRIDE & CO., 37 PARK ROW, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Metal or Wood surfaces. Glass Signs and Show Cards, with frames, to order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

The Soldiers True Friend.—For over forty years Dr. Hollowa's has been supplying all the Armies of Europe with his PILLS AND OINTMENT, they having proved themselves the only Medicines able to cure the worst cases of Dysentery, Sores, Wounds, and Fevers. Every knapsack should contain them. Only 25 cents per box or pot.

Violin Strings for Hot weather.

Best French silk, 25c. Italian, 4 lengths, 25c., mailed. MUSICIAN'S COMPEN, sample of 100 tunes for violin, flute, or cornet, $1. BUGLE CALL, 50 new patriotic songs and glees, 50c. U. S. REG. DRUM and FIFE Instructor, 50c., mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers' claims for wounds, entitled to bounty, we send our Hand-Book of Information and Circular, with Lists of Prizes, for postage address, with stamp to pay return postage. BOMES, BROWN & CO., 2 Park Place, New York, and 615 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

Diarrhœa, Dysentery, &c.

Immediate and sure cure. HEGEMAN & CO.'S VELPEAU'S REMEDY, which has been used with unfailing success since the cholera of 1849. Fifty cents per bottle. Sold by druggists. Prepared only by HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 211, 213, and 229 Broadway, and corner 17th Street and 4th Avenue.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.

Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Steel, Brass or other Metals. Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Inventor, Dr. Dillwyn Lindsley.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's price, $50; Civilian's, $80. Send for a Circular. J. W. WESTON, Agt., 491 Broadway, N. Y.

Will warm food for the baby, heat water or steep herbs, &c., for the sick, make water hot for shaving or the bath, cook an egg, fry eggs, make tea and coffee, toast bread, &c., &c., in less time and expense than any other stove ever used. Used on any lamp without obscuring the light. Price 75 cents; by mail, postage paid, 85 cents.

Also a Patent Lighter for lighting lamps without removing the chimney. Price 10 cents.

E. F. GLEASON, Manufacturer,

120 Mercer Street, N. Y.

Mt. Kisco Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 5th, 1863. For circulars address A. R. WIGGIN, A. M., Principal Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, bed 29x21. Price $2500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

WORTH IT'S WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet containing postpaid, for 25 cents, much practical advertisements for persons entitled to property. Address or apply to HENRY HAYS, 649 Broadway, N. Y. Coats of arms found, painted and engraved.

MEEKS' CABINET FURNITURE

WAREROOMS,

No. 699 BROADWAY,

AND

333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the most well-seasoned and selected materials, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE now ready.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, 25, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

Phelan & Collender, Sole Manufacturers.

HUBBARD BRO'S IMPORTERS OF WATCHES NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market. The article especially deserving public attention at this time is their

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES,

EXPRESSLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SALES.

HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gilt hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep correct time! Free of case or half cases, $10. By mail, $1 .25 for postage; if registered, 50 cents additional. A rare delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the case.

Magic Time Observers,

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A MINIATURE OF OUR FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH FATENT SECOND STOPPING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. Each Watch is and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being the 16 carat gold. From the improved vary action movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, in a handsome morocco-polished case, only $35. By mail, postage 36 cents; registering, 25 cents.

Our Watches are Levers, and are not liable to any other house. Wherever offered they meet the most fastidious approval, and we now put upon the market a timepiece of the country. The Press of this and brightness of finish is universally conceded to our cases.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—New York Leader, Feb. 21.

"The prettiest and most reliable Watches in the market."—Sunday Dispatch.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Philad. Army and Navy Journal, Feb. 21.

"Superbly finished Watches: keep accurate time in all climates."—N. Y. Tribune, July 8.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish Journal.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-piece ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 18.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg Chronicle, July 27.

☞ TERMS CASH IN ADVANCE! Money can be sent by mail or Express. If by Express in a registered letter at our risk. Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 81 Park Row, New York. Circulars and Specimens of Types, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

J. HAVEN'S PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Travelers, Sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from 50 cents to $2. Sample sent free on receipt of $1 50. Send stamp for circular. The fine white bobbinet frame keeps it away from the face, and the steel elastic, by string, keeps it down all round. It don't affect the breathing or sleeping, and will last three times in place. J. HAVEN & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, also Right or Lizenses have been sold to Wm. Syms St., N. Y. Room No. 23. Agents wanted in all parts.

Sportsmen, Tourists and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Theatrical, Opera, and general out-door day and night double prospective glass. Its short elasticity a person to know him at from 2 to 3 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Cataract lenses sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Opticians,

609 Broadway, New York.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "Preparation for food from Indian Corn"

that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Cornbread, Rice Waffles, &c., without blending with flour or eggs. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, soups, for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages.

For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Wholsale Depot 166 Fulton Street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

National Union League.

Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,

295 Broadway, New York.

IMPROVED STATE OF AFFAIRS IN THE CITY.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S "FRIEND."—"How are you, Mr. HOWITZER? You and I did a good deal of talking together, in the City, a few weeks ago; but I guess you got rather the better of me—so now let us be friends, if you please!"

WATCHES FREE.

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $25 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNIQUE, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing to present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers to canvass are not an exception, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW CIRCULAR for 1863, containing EXTRA Inducements. See "15 per day Easy" on inside page.

S. C. BURLEIGH & CO., 107 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.

10 CENTS FOR 40 CENTS.

THE GENUINE CLOTH-LINED PAPER COLLAR, At Wholesale and Retail.

Gents Furnishing Goods.

I have the largest and best selected stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars wholesale and retail.

SHIRTS MADE TO ORDER.

The perfection of my establishment. In this department, I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always enabled to give work that will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.

NO FIT! NO SALE!

Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on

CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
675 Broadway, N. Y.

Laforge block.

Chest-quality Linen Shirts for $36

6 for	$12
6 for	15
6 for	18
6 for	24

Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.

Gold Pens and Cases, Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' fine	$ 75	Engraving Free	$2 00
Med. "	75	Union "	2 50
Large "	1 25	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Commercial Eureka	2 25
Gentlemen's "	1 50	Mammoth Eureka	3 50

The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last (10) Ten years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen now in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, before purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact rises and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.

Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.

E. S. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 15 Maiden Lane, New York City.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "Bloom of a Thousand Flowers." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of palm oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

H. F. PETRIDGE & CO., 21 and 23 Dey Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

"Get the Best."

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL THISTLE & CO.'S 10 CENT ENTIRELY NEW PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES. They are the largest, best, and cheapest ever manufactured. Send for circular containing particulars. Mailed free. THISTLE & CO., 130 Nassau St.

STAMMERING.

Cured by Bates' Patent scientific appliances the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering, &c. They took the Prize Medal at the last London Exhibition.

For new Edition of Pamphlets and Drawings describing the same, address H. C. BATES, 377 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 5076.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturers, JOHN B. ROGERS, late PRATT, ROGERS & Co., 109 William St., N. Y.

"The Drummer Boy

Is a story of Burnside's Expedition in North Carolina —a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and rapid incident. The life and enthusiasm of the young hero is painted in vivid colors."—New York Evening Post.

Published by J. R. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all Bookstores.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 20 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for 61 cts. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 216, Boston, Mass.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses, a charming and perfectly natural color for the cheeks, or lips. Will not wash off, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with vinegar, and warranted not to injure the skin. Mailed free from observation for one dollar and 18 cts. HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 S. Seventh St., Philad.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY
REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Selpho's Patent, 616 Broadway, N. Y. The most substantial and best limbs in the World of Science has ever invented. (Established 24 years.) Send for Pamphlet. Soldiers supplied.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift or Present, which compares with the Unique Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, portage paid, for $3 50, or with 6 beautiful mounted, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $8. Address, T. H. McALLISTER, Optician,
180 Centre Street, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

$22. WATCHES. $22.

A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.

$22. Genuine. $22.

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Company do not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
205 Broadway, New York.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE A CO,
202 Broadway, New York.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cup, small size, Exchish Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in case, each one for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. ULIAS. F. NORTON & CO., 28 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 29, says: "MESSRS. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch — cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Large assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N.Y., 15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris, 47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement SHIRTS for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

LADIES & GENT'S STEEL COLLARS AND CUFFS.

ENAMELLED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for two years in preference to linen or any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute. By military men or travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each: sent by post on receipt of $1 15.

Naked size of Collar.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

Agents wanted throughout the country.

DR. C. S. SEA, M.D., with 35 years' successful Practice for Nervous Diseases, Correspondence confidential. 753 North Bend Street, Baltimore, Md.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF Send Head, L.Y.D.S.

Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S

YELLOW DOCK SYRUP,

Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Channel, Joint, and Limb.

One Dollar per Bottle, (which often cures).

Depot, LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1845. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

THE SECRET OUT.

Humbug exploded! A Book of Wonders, containing more than 1000 THINGS WORTH KNOWING. Sent, post-paid, for 25 cents. Soldiers' edition, 20 cents. Address "Union Book Association," Box 465, Syracuse, N. Y. Agents wanted.

Barnum's American Museum. Sioux and Winnebago

Indian Chiefs, Warriors, and Squaws.

All fine specimens of their tribes, to be seen at all hours, together with

THE MONSTER PYTHON,
The Great Dragon of the East.
The largest of the serpent species ever seen in America.

Splendid Dramatic Performances

Every afternoon and evening at 2 and 7½ o'clock.
Admission, 25 cents; Children under 10, 15 cents.

Colorific Colors Hair Beautiful

Brown or Black in three hours with one preparation. Warranted best and cheapest. Try it; you will use no other. Sold by druggists.
General Depot, 49 John Street, New York.

American Watches For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY gives notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, of ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPING, and of Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, War. Eagle, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

"FROM THIS LITTLE BOOK, PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY, AND THUS TO THE MINUTEST PARTICULAR, THOSE ASTOUNDING AND ATTRACTIVE BEYOND BELIEF, WE LEARN THE FLOURISHING NIGHTINGALES AND GRACE DARLINGS ARE NOW THE SPONTANEOUS GROWTH OF OUR COUNTRY."

Messrs. TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston,
HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

Hospital Transports:

A Memoir of the Embarkation of the Sick and Wounded from the Peninsula of Virginia, in the Summer of 1862.

Compiled and published at the request of the Sanitary Commission. 1 vol. 16mo. 75 cents.

"More absorbing than a novel, written in a very graphic and animated style, and has the great merit of telling facts. We need but name FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED as one of the writers to ensure attention to its statements."

27th Sent, post-paid, for 75 Cents.

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers,
Boston, Mass.

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 335 Broadway, Moffatt's Building, cor. Worth Street. Manufactories of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for Circular.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen.—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Cheap excursion tickets. Low rates of fare $15 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good schools and society. Good crops can be seen growing. Hundreds are settling. On account of extreme sickness of climate, it is highly beneficial to pulmonary complaints. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

STERLING SILVER HUNTING CASE WATCHES presented to all who sell our Great New Combination Prize Packages, every one of which they contain. Sells rapid. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for Circulars. W. H. CATELY & CO., 58 Ann Street, N. Y.

Photograph Albums!

Elegant styles, in ARABESQUE and GOLD, from $1 to $25 each, sent to any part of the country. Our Catalogue and Price List sent on the receipt of five cents. P. O. Box 4900. I. W. LUCAS & CO., 115 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 350.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE NEUTRAL ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.

Encrusted in his island-home that lies beyond the sea,
Behold the great original and genuine "Tis He;
A paunchy, fuming son of beef, with double weight of chin,
And eyes that were benevolent, but for their singular tendency to turn green whenever it is remarked that his irrepressible American cousins have made another treaty with China ahead of him, and taken Albion in—
This neutral English gentleman, one of the modern time.

With William, Duke of Normandy, his ancestors, he boasts,
Came over from the shores of France to whip the Saxon hosts;
And this he makes a source of pride; but wherefore there should be
Such credit to an Englishman in the fact, that he is descended from a nation which England is for ever pretending to regard as slightly her inferior in every thing, and particularly behind her in military and naval affairs, we can not really see—
This neutral English gentleman, one of the modern time.

He deals in Christianity—Episcopalian brand,
And sends his missionaries forth to bully heathen-land;
Just mention 'slavery' to him, and, with a joyous sigh,
He'll say it's 'orrid, scandalous, although he is ready to fight for the cotton raised by slaves, and forgets how he bothered the Chinese to make them take opium; and blew the Sepoys from the guns, because the poor devils refused to be enslaved by the East India Company, or his phisian-thro-py—
This neutral English gentleman, one of the modern time.

He yields to brother Jonathan a love that passeth show.
"We're Hanglo-Saxons, both of us, and can't be foes, you know;'
But as a Christian gentleman, he can not, can not hide
His horror of the spectacle, of four millions of black beings being held in bondage by a nation professing the largest liberty in the world; though in case of an anti-slavery crusade, the interest of his Manchester factors would imperatively forbid him to take part on either side—
This neutral English gentleman, one of the modern time.

Now seeing the said Jonathan by base rebellion stirr'd,
And battling with pro-slavery, it might be thence inferr'd
That British sympathy is label'd 'Neutrality,' and consigned to any rebel port not too closely blockaded to permit English vessels loaded with munitions to slip in. And when you ask Mr. Bull what he means by his inconsistent conduct, he becomes notoriously indignant, rolls up his eyes, and says, "I can't endure to see brothers murdering each other, and keeping me out of my cotton—I can't, upon my life"—
This neutral British gentleman, one of the modern time.

Supposing Mr. Bull should die, the question might arise,
Will he be wanted down below, or wafted to the skies?
Allowing that he had his choice, it really seems to me,
The moral English gentleman would choose a front seat with his Infernal Majesty; since Milton, in his blank verse correspondence with old Time, more than once hinted the possibility of Nick's rebellion against Heaven succeeding. And as the Lower Secessia has cottoned to England through numerous Hanoverian reigns, such a choice on the part of the philanthropical Britisher would be simply another specimen of his Neutral-i-ty—
The neutral British gentleman, one of the modern time.

MURDER OF LIEUTENANT BEEVER BY THE SIOUX INDIANS.—[See Page 587.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1863.

ANGLOPHOBIA.

"If the vanity of Englishmen requires a corrective, they have only to ascertain the feelings with which they are regarded by neighboring and rival nations." This is the opening sentence of a labored article in the Saturday Review, the cleverest, though far from the wisest, of the English periodicals. It is conducted by a clique of young men whose leading aim is to show how brilliantly they can write. But children have acute perceptions as to who likes them and who does not, and we have an inconvertible habit of telling the truth. The young men of the Saturday Review have told some unpleasant truths.

In Federal America, according to the Review, "hatred to England is unfortunately the dominant feeling." The writer is quite unable to account for this strange fact. But he goes on to show that the feeling throughout Europe is hardly more amicable. "The dislike which is felt for the English name and character in France is perhaps less outrageous, but it is unfortunately equally genuine." The "Russians consider it natural that France should protect the Poles, but they are bitterly offended by the diplomatic interference of England. In the same manner they attributed to England their misfortunes in the Crimean war, while they hastened, as soon as peace was restored, to cement a fresh alliance with France." "The Poles, while they are soliciting the aid of England, are unable to suppress the hatred which they have been taught by their French patrons to feel for the country which is falsely accused of complicity with the infamous partition of the last century. In one of the most plausible of their recent pamphlets the writer repeatedly declares that England is the worst enemy of his cause." "There is no much reason to fear that in Germany, and especially in Prussia, the English policy is regarded with suspicion and dislike..... the English Government is held responsible in Berlin and Vienna for half the revolutionary designs which originate in Europe." "In Austria the former "official antipathy has perhaps recently relaxed, but the antagonism of public and sentiment is at any moment revived. The only civilized states in which the writer can discover any thing like good-feeling toward England are Italy and Spain, except among the ecclesiastical and democratic factions, the hearty good-will of England to the national cause may have produced a favorable impression;" in Greece, "which has recently shown an unexpected appreciation of the English character;" and among the Turks, who "can scarcely be wanting in a certain respect for their only friend and protector. With these exceptions the opinion of Europe is mortifying to a patriotic Englishman."

In the face of such an acknowledged public sentiment, we half suspect that the Reviewer means to ironical his attempt to "inquire why a community which seems to itself peaceable and inoffensive has become, even more conspicuously than in ordinary times, the victim of calumny and vituperation."

But the Reviewer was unable to see, or dared not to tell, half the extent of the bitter feeling against England which is the dominant sentiment of the world. As far as we are concerned, it is too openly expressed to need special mention. In France, though it is less publicly avowed, it is none the less deep. The Emperor is aware of this, and shows in it the winning card by playing which he can retrieve the most desperate game. He knows that if France were ripe for revolution to-day, he could bring it back to him to-morrow by declaring war against England. There would be no need of conscription to fill the ranks of his army. Every Frenchman would rush to arms to avenge Waterloo;" and there is not a peasant woman in the empire who would not sell her last chemise to raise a franc for carrying on the war. A thousand royal marriages will never make Denmark forget the bombardment of her capital and the destruction of her fleet, without even a declaration of war. Spain must be an enemy of England so long as the British flag flaunting over Gibraltar is a perpetual insult as well as injury. Every one of the foreign powers which England has seized all over the world is a menace or an insult to some nation.

The truth is, that for the last one hundred and sixty years, since upon the accession of the House of Hanover the British Government passed into the hands of a great aristocracy, and its foreign policy assumed its present shape, England has been the common enemy of nations. If a nation was feeble she bullied it, if strong she set herself to weaken it. She has fomented every great war of Christendom, and taken part, now on one side, now on the other, in most of them. Safe from invasion behind her ocean bulwarks, she has fought by her armies or her subsidies on every battle-field of Europe. She has mingled in every intrigue, and made herself felt in every transaction; and the intensity of the hatred with which she is regarded is in exact ratio to the closeness and intimacy of her relations with other people. The Irish, for example, have had more to do with the English than any others, and their hatred is the deepest. It is a hatred which no distance of space or time can extinguish. All over the world men of Irish birth or descent pursue every occupation but all every position in life. They are laborers and senators, merchants and soldiers, artisans and clergymen. Many of them have apparently lost their peculiar national characteristics, so that except for the names which they bear no one would suppose that they belonged to the Celtic race; but so long as there is a drop of Irish blood in their veins it boils when English rule is named.

The Saturday Reviewer makes no mention of the feelings with which England is regarded among those whom we call uncivilized nations. Very likely he thought the hatred of half a thousand millions of Hindoos, Chinese, and Japanese of no account. But the late Indian rebellion should have taught him that it was worth considering. Let no man dream that the curtain has fallen upon the long tragedy of "The British in India." Campbell's lines have something of unfulfilled prophecy in them:

> "Foes of mankind, her guardian spirits say,
> Revolving ages bring the bitter day.
> When Heaven in vengeance shall its cause espouse,
> And blood for blood there Indian plains bedew.
> ...The Saxon Avenger comes!"

The next uprising will find the people of India better prepared, and if it be wisely timed furnished with powerful allies.

Half a century ago England was invulnerable, to any hostile attack. The narrow seas that formed her boundaries were inviolable to any foe. Napoleon, who scorned the passes of the Alps, the snow storms of Russia, and the towering fortresses of Germany, shrunk from attempting the passage of the British Straits. All that is changed now. The British seas are the best highways for the armies of others.

While thus open to assault at home, England is out of reach to attack abroad. Fifty years ago, when at peace with all arms and navies her, her flag floated triumphantly on every sea. The commerce, from which she drew the wealth which was to enable her in effect to fight the battles of Europe, was unmolested by any power that had not an enemy upon earth. All that is past. If she were to-day involved in war a half score of cruisers, like those which the Alabama has burned the Confederates, could practically sweep her commerce from the ocean. A few Alabamas and Floridas would drive China merchantmen, Indian merchantmen, and even transpacific ships from the Indian seas. The power of England rests upon her commerce and her manufactures. Let her off for a single year supplies and from a market for her products, and she will soon be reduced to the position to which her population and territory entitle her—that of a second-rate power.

With a folly, to which the history of nations affords no parallel, she seems to have deliberately set herself to make the world just as few ships may be done without violating international law. Her doctrine of neutrality, stripped of all technicality, is just this: "We can not obstruct the building in our ports of vessels evidently constructed for warlike purposes, and notoriously destined for war upon a nation with whom we are at peace. The building of ships as a legitimate occupation. We can not interrupt the sailing of these vessels unless they have guns and munitions of war on board. We can not hinder the purchase of guns and munitions, as freight, in peaceful vessels. The production and sale of these articles is a portion of British industry."

The result of these decisions is that a ship of war sails out of an English port unobstructed—only she has no guns on board. She is followed by a steamer loaded to the steamer's edge with guns and munitions. This vessel goes also unquestioned. The two meet at some designated point. The guns are transferred in the warsteamer, which at once sets out on her voyage of destruction; while the other, without ever having entered a port, returns several feet highter out of water. The British owner of the merchant vessels of a neutral power are burned by the score in mid-ocean.

Well, England has played this game with us, and her silk-builders and gun-makers are richer by a few hundred thousands, and we are poorer by a few millions. But she has established a precedent for the interpretation of the law of neutrality which no one of her enemies—who, according to the Saturday Review, are nearly all of the civilized world—will scruple to use on occasion to dispute in her favor. Let a war, as now seems probable, break out between England and Japan, and there is nothing to prevent any French or American ship-builder from selling a "290" or two to the Tycoon or the Mikado; and the Japanese waters lie remarkably convenient to the back settles of the Confederate and Australian treasure-ships. Or supposing the war is between Great Britain and Russia. It would require no great amount of dexterity and good luck to send a few swift cruisers to some of the Russian ports in the Amoor region, where they could find guns, supplies, and men awaiting them, and to destroy the whole fleet of privateers, without their being obliged to resort to the barbarity of destroying their prizes.

England has been for a century and a half busily engaged in teaching "Anglophobia" to the rest of the world. The lesson has, according to the Saturday Review, been pretty thoroughly learned by this time. She will have no just reason for complaint if it is put into practice according to the precedents which she has labored to establish.

THE MEXICAN EMPIRE.

The Archduke Maximilian, of Austria, has formally accepted the throne of Mexico, which was tendered him, a few weeks since, by an informal, self-constituted assembly of Mexicans, sitting in the city of Mexico, under the protection of French bayonets. It is scarcely possible to conceive a more slender title to a throne. Joseph Bonaparte's title to the throne of Spain, and Murat's title to that of Naples, were respectable in comparison. Still the Archduke accepts, the Emperor is ready to seat him, and maintain him by force, and all practical purposes of the moment, Maximilian will become as actual a monarch as if he had succeeded to a long line of ancestry in due hereditary course.

It is not to be denied or say that the Mexican policy of the Emperor of the French has aroused in this country the greatest astonishment and the most profound indignation. Astonishment, because the Emperor view was taken of the Emperor's moral qualities, he had always had credit here for astuteness and sagacity; and every child knows that an attempt to force upon the Mexicans a form of Government which they abhor, with a German foreigner at its head, in equal contempt of their feelings and our well-settled policy, must inevitably end in most disastrous failure. And indignation at the fraud in which the war was commenced, and the barefaced knavery by which the French Bonaparte is attempting to destroy the liberties of four millions of people. If any thing were wanting to fill the measure of our disgust at the transaction, it would be supplied by the accumulating evidences of a purpose on the part of the French to espouse the side of that Church party in Mexico which has been the curse of that country, to whose existence for the past forty years of Mexican anarchy are mainly due.

It is, however, idle to indulge in angry words or regrets at present. The Emperor can not be ignorant of the view which the American people will take of his proceedings. For a whole generation every American statesman has been familiar with the Monroe doctrine, and dispassionate men in many foreign countries have admitted its wisdom. Napoleon's attempt to establish an empire in Mexico is a blind entrepise undertaken inadvertently; it is a deliberate endeavor to nullify a cardinal doctrine of our national policy, and to reassert the European equilibrium on American soil. To such an undertaking the only fitting answer we can make is an armed defense of our policy; and this being out of the question at present, owing to the circumstances in which the republic is placed, we have nothing left but to submit in silence, and await our opportunity.

There is one point of view in which the French subjugation of Mexico may be regarded with satisfaction. That country will, under the domination of the Emperor, enjoy more internal peace and order than any of its recent governments seemed capable of securing. Commerce will naturally improve, and the products of the mines will increase. It is doubtful whether brigandage—the plague-spot of Mexico —will be materially diminished; as now the ranks of the bandits will be swelled by a large number of individuals impelled by patriotic impulses and by hatred of the foreign invader. But we may take for granted that the main highways—as, for example, the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico—will be somewhat safer than it was as the French will absolutely require to keep open those two important positions with the sea. And the prospect is that, though the Church party appear at present to be the chief gainers by the French conquest, the piper who will ultimately pay for this new fandango will be Mother Church. A time will come, sooner or later, when increasing deficits in the budget at home, on one side, and, on the other, the spectacle of enormous wealth squandered by the most profligate hierarchy in the world, will toll upon the not over-tender consciences of the French army and nation, and the priests who are now welcoming the foreigner to their soil may find that Frenchmen can rob as thoroughly as Liberals.

Providence generally works out its ends by indirection. The great problem of slavery in this country appeared insoluble until the slaveholders made it insoluble by their own selfishness and folly, and a Republican administration was called into power. The problem of Mexican anarchy and misrule has been solved by the folly of the Church party in Mexico which has been the curse of that country, to whose existence for the past forty years of Mexican anarchy are mainly due.

It is, however, idle to indulge in angry words or regrets at present. The Emperor can not be ignorant of the view which the American people will take of his proceedings. For a whole generation every American statesman has been familiar with the Monroe doctrine, and dispassionate men in many foreign countries have admitted its wisdom. Napoleon's attempt to establish an empire in Mexico is a blind enterprise undertaken inadvertently; it is a deliberate endeavor to nullify a cardinal doctrine of our national policy, and to reassert the European equilibrium on American soil. To such an undertaking the only fitting answer we can make is an armed defense of our policy; and this being out of the question at present, owing to the circumstances in which the republic is placed, we have nothing left but to submit in silence, and await our opportunity.

There is one point of view in which the French subjugation of Mexico may be regarded with satisfaction. That country will, under the domination of the Emperor, enjoy more internal peace and order than any of its recent governments seemed capable of securing. Commerce will naturally improve, and the products of the mines will increase. It is doubtful whether brigandage—the plague-spot of Mexico —will be materially diminished; as now the ranks of the bandits will be swelled by a large number of individuals impelled by patriotic impulses and by hatred of the foreign invader. But we may take for granted that the main highways—as, for example, the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico—will be somewhat safer than it was as the French will absolutely require to keep open those two important positions with the sea. And the prospect is that, though the Church party appear at present to be the chief gainers by the French conquest, the piper who will ultimately pay for this new fandango will be Mother Church. A time will come, sooner or later, when increasing deficits in the budget at home, on one side, and, on the other, the spectacle of enormous wealth squandered by the most profligate hierarchy in the world, will toll upon the not over-tender consciences of the French army and nation, and the priests who are now welcoming the foreigner to their soil may find that Frenchmen can rob as thoroughly as Liberals.

Providence generally works out its ends by indirection. The great problem of slavery in this country appeared insoluble until the slaveholders made it insoluble by their own selfishness and folly, and a Republican administration was called into power. The problem of Mexican anarchy and misrule has been solved by the folly of the Church party in Mexico which has been the curse of that country, to whose existence for the past forty years of Mexican anarchy are mainly due.

It is, however, idle to indulge in angry words or regrets at present. The Emperor can not be ignorant of the view which the American people will take of his proceedings. For a whole generation every American statesman has been familiar with the Monroe doctrine, and dispassionate men in many foreign countries have admitted its wisdom. Napoleon's attempt to establish an empire in Mexico is a blind enterprise undertaken inadvertently; it is a deliberate endeavor to nullify a cardinal doctrine of our national policy, and to reassert the European equilibrium on American soil. To such an undertaking the only fitting answer we can make is an armed defense of our policy; and this being out of the question at present, owing to the circumstances in which the republic is placed, we have nothing left but to submit in silence, and await our opportunity.

There is one point of view in which the French subjugation of Mexico may be regarded with satisfaction. That country will, under the domination of the Emperor, enjoy more internal peace and order than any of its recent governments seemed capable of securing. Commerce will naturally improve, and the products of the mines will increase. It is doubtful whether brigandage—the plague-spot of Mexico —will be materially diminished; as now the ranks of the bandits will be swelled by a large number of individuals impelled by patriotic impulses and by hatred of the foreign invader. But we may take for granted that the main highways—as, for example, the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico—will be somewhat safer than it was as the French will absolutely require to keep open those two important positions with the sea. And the prospect is that, though the Church party appear at present to be the chief gainers by the French conquest, the piper who will ultimately pay for this new fandango will be Mother Church. A time will come, sooner or later, when increasing deficits in the budget at home, on one side, and, on the other, the spectacle of enormous wealth squandered by the most profligate hierarchy in the world, will toll upon the not over-tender consciences of the French army and nation, and the priests who are now welcoming the foreigner to their soil may find that Frenchmen can rob as thoroughly as Liberals.

Providence generally works out its ends by indirection. The great problem of slavery in this country appeared insoluble until the slaveholders made it insoluble by their own selfishness and folly, and a Republican administration was called into power. The problem of Mexican anarchy and misrule has been solved by the folly of the Church party in Mexico which has been the curse of that country, to whose existence for the past forty years of Mexican anarchy are mainly due.

It is, however, idle to indulge in angry words or regrets at present. The Emperor can not be ignorant of the view which the American people will take of his proceedings. For a whole generation every American statesman has been familiar with the Monroe doctrine, and dispassionate men in many foreign countries have admitted its wisdom. Napoleon's attempt to establish an empire in Mexico is a blind enterprise undertaken inadvertently; it is a deliberate endeavor to nullify a cardinal doctrine of our national policy, and to reassert the European equilibrium on American soil. To such an undertaking the only fitting answer we can make is an armed defense of our policy; and this being out of the question at present, owing to the circumstances in which the republic is placed, we have nothing left but to submit in silence, and await our opportunity.

There is one point of view in which the French subjugation of Mexico may be regarded with satisfaction. That country will, under the domination of the Emperor, enjoy more internal peace and order than any of its recent governments seemed capable of securing. Commerce will naturally improve, and the products of the mines will increase. It is doubtful whether brigandage—the plague-spot of Mexico —will be materially diminished; as now the ranks of the bandits will be swelled by a large number of individuals impelled by patriotic impulses and by hatred of the foreign invader. But we may take for granted that the main highways—as, for example, the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico—will be somewhat safer than it was as the French will absolutely require to keep open those two important positions with the sea. And the prospect is that, though the Church party appear at present to be the chief gainers by the French conquest, the piper who will ultimately pay for this new fandango will be Mother Church. A time will come, sooner or later, when increasing deficits in the budget at home, on one side, and, on the other, the spectacle of enormous wealth squandered by the most profligate hierarchy in the world, will toll upon the not over-tender consciences of the French army and nation, and the priests who are now welcoming the foreigner to their soil may find that Frenchmen can rob as thoroughly as Liberals.

THE QUNCER.

"SOCIAL CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE."

THE Harpers have just published a very remarkable book with this title. It is not only remarkable for its intrinsic merits, but it is most timely. For at a time when our whole system is undergoing the most fiery trial, and when, consequently, many a man is indisposed to look elsewhere, and especially to England, as to a sure and steadfast form of society, whoever shows that England has reached her present condition, which seems to him so enviable, through the stern manipulation of civil war, helps the doubtful and timid to a juster judgment. But whoever shows that the present condition of England, which seems superficially so enviable, is but a veneer of prosperity over the most radical ignorance, vice, and discontent, touches the heartstaking mind that, with all its faults, our own system is rooted in the only philosophy from which enduring national peace can spring.

The gentleman who, after large personal observation in England, and much cogent reflection, has edited this English book, has therefore performed a great public service. His preface, which is brief and pointed, informs us that he abandoned his project of an original work upon the practical working of the British internal policy for the last twenty years, because the present embittered feeling between the two countries would inevitably expose such a work to the charge and suspicion of prejudice. He has, therefore, selected an English work, published in the year 1850, by Joseph Kay, who was commissioned by the British University of Cambridge to investigate the comparative social condition of the poorer classes in the countries of Western Europe, and from this work he has caused to be reprinted the chapters that describe the social condition of England. He says: "No stone has been left unturned by the ruling classes of England, during the last few years, to degrade the people of America in the estimation of European populations, and to secure the failure of our form of representative Governments. . . . I have no apology for reprinting Mr. Kay's chapters. I believe he describes the result of a form of government directly opposed to the principles of our own. I hope these results will induce my countrymen to value our institutions, and persuade all men among us to perform their part in sustaining them in their integrity, until the favorable moment arrives for such changes as may be desirable in them."

The astounding facts follow. Mr. Kay, from personal research and from all the authentic official statistics, lays bare the hideous and appalling truth of English society. In that England which seems to so many thoughtless and impatient Americans a model of stable and splendid order, out of every eight was a pauper in 1848; and, as the American editor informs us, in 1861, before the cotton famine began, and with the war with Russia, England's and Ireland's paupers had increased about five per cent. yearly since 1851; with three millions more population, less land was under cultivation than in 1851, and one-third of her people were fed from foreign sources. The details of the facts are terrible. The problem they offer seems almost hopeless. But they explain the universal British jealousy of our success, and its haughty delight in the prospect of our ruin. For if once our system should be proved to be as flexible and strong as it is humane and glorious, and it will be so proved by our success in defeating the rebellion, the condition of England will be as desperate as it is already! Then the Lord Johns and John Bull loses pirates against our commerce, and sends iron ships to threaten our coasts. No wonder that his rage and hatred need his mask of neutrality. No wonder his chief journal darkens the air with falsehood at home, and sends a tool to shirpen slanders from this country. He must mean every bitter word and fair. His trial hour has come like a thief in the night. His fate hangs upon a tribunal in which he can not be judge. The American Government fights the battle of liberty and equal rights for every people. It is knowledge of that fact which inspires hope in the laboring class, and hate in the governing class of England. This remarkable book shows exactly why England may really choose upon war with us rather than consent to our triumph. It is because, in the last words of Mr. Kay's book, "the climax of English misery remains." "The poor of England are more depressed, more pauperized, more numerous, in comparison to the rich, than any more privileged class, and much worse educated than the poor of any other European nation, solely excepting Russia, Turkey, Portugal, and Spain. Such a state of things can not long continue."

WHICH SHALL IT BE?

THE National Democratic Committee and the "Conservatives" having begun to prepare for the next general election, the question is fairly asked, upon what platform do those gentlemen propose to stand and solicit votes? There will be, perhaps, some [illegible] of difference among them, but all will say, Mr. Governor, to a radical that we will at last unite and vote for the same candidate. In Massachusetts, where the question is perfectly understood, Gov. Andrew is the stale joke of a thirty days' play out, and Mr. George Lunt, editor of the Boston Courier, an old Whig, and now an utter Copperhead, Mr. Caleb Cushing, Mr. Hillard (questions asked an illo!), a Webster Whig, a Fillmore leader, and a "Conservative" of 1860, seat themselves quickly in the "Democratic" Convention chair by jowl with those who are left of the old party leaders of that ilk, among whom General Butler, the late Democratic Ajax, is no longer to be found. This kind of gentlemen will end in all the other States precisely where they begin in Massachusetts. There will be but two parties, for there is but one question. The platform of one of them will be the prosecution of the war; in other words, it will require some adequate result for all the life and money spent, and some security of future peace.

Upon that platform some candidate will be placed who heartily approves its wisdom and sincerity. What will the other platform be?

It is not difficult to foresee. It is already foreshadowed. It will be that of the Copperhead policy—at first partly, and at last wholly. It will begin by saying that when the rebels lay down their arms all rights and privileges hitherto enjoyed are resumed, and persons proved guilty of treason according to law are to be punished. It will end by declaring a general amnesty and an assumption of the Confederate debt, for the sake of conciliation and fraternity. In plain terms, it will propose that, having won the victory, we shall give it to the enemy.

If now we shall ask any reasonable "Conservative," By such a policy what do you get for the war? he would doubtless reply, "We get the established proof of the superiority of the Government to armed rebellion." If then we ask, But what security do you get against a more dangerous rebellion? he would make the same answer. If we still inquire, "Upon the mere word of the insurgents, do you mean to withdraw the troops, and allow every body who may not be convicted of treason to vote for members of Congress?" he must either answer Yes, in which case the rebel slaveholders' states at once to the control of the Government in alliance with the "Conservatives" of the North; or he must answer, "No: only those can vote who take an oath;" in which case he deserts his platform, and does not permit all who lay down their arms to resume their old privileges.

The question of the election will be simply, "Shall the war have been fought for something or for nothing?" There will be no chance for compromise: the party will say, "Slavery" made the war, and there can be no peace until it is destroyed. The fight will be to take to ourselves the lives of your children by chasing the wolf into the bushes in the garden instead of killing him, as to hope for the tranquillity of this country while slavery endures." The other will cry, "Pooh! pooh! if you have a cancer on your breast just put on a clean shirt and go in, and all will be serene."

A WAR BY ANY OTHER NAME IS PRETTY MUCH THE SAME THING.

IF, after the full and open debate of the question, the new rebel war-ships sail against any of our ships or ports out of English harbors, it will be a declaration of war. The force of neutrality is played out. The British laws are proved incompetent to save the commerce of a friendly power from the ravages of pirates fitting out in England. If, then, she says, "I don't care enough about it to have laws that will protect my allies," she simply says she does not care about peace.

To all our remonstrance and argument England has practically but one answer: "Why do you complain of our selling to the Confederates what you ask us to sell to you? We trade with all parts of all the world; and while we take no side in a domestic national quarrel like yours, you can not fairly complain that we treat both sides alike."

To this the reply is conclusive, that international law excepts the very class of cases of which we complain; and that to build and equip war-ships, or suffer them to be built, and then to let them sail from your harbors to prey upon the commerce of an ally, is one of the most offensive causes of war. To prevent it altogether is impossible. But to try to prevent it is to connive at the piracy. England knows perfectly well what we think and why we think it. There is no misunderstanding, no hair-splitting, no special plea in our position. And if she still persists in building, fitting, and selling ships agreeing in the broad ground will she complain if we build, fit, and sail ships against her? Such things are usually called war. But if she prefers to call them civility, we are not in the least particular about names.

THE MONSTER GILLMORE.

THAT promising political firm of Rebels, John Bull, and Copperheads, ought at once to pillory the unhappy Gillmore by the side of the beast Butler. Beauregard has already given them their cue. The bombardment of Charleston is inhuman, atrocious, out of the usages of civilized warfare, etc., etc. Certainly these are terrible words; and what has General Gilmore to say? Not only the-ever-to-be-respected and-by-to-be-loved Beauregard declares that he is inhuman, but the comical John Bull's in the van, cry amen to the great captain. What, then, has General Gilmore done? He has shelled Charleston with Greek fire. He has actually bombarded Charleston!

What has he said enough for such a monster? The beast Butler had the effrontery to take possession of New Orleans, and was then brazen enough to make it own its rebuke by support from those whom they had impoverished. He was also so inconceivably vile as to order that any woman who insulted a soldier should be punished by a municipal law of the city. The miscreant also actually hung Mumford for the only act exercised his constitutional right of being a traitor and a rebel, at N. Orleans. Curtis will expound at length. Nay, that no crime of villany should be wanting, he made New Orleans a decent city, and kept it in order—an atrocity unknown in its annals hitherto. And for all these rebels, John Bull, and the Copperheads, called him solemnly the beast Butler, in order that all men might know that they had nothing in common with him.

But General Gilmore's offense is beyond words. If he had pierced the holy of holies at Mecca and had spat upon the holy stone, if he had danced a sailor's hornpipe in Trinity Church, or smeared Raphael's Transfiguration with tar, the English language might still have been able to deal with his offenses. But to bombard Charleston! Does General Gilmore know that the "Southern gentleman" lives there? That "the chivalry" live there? That the "sons of the Palmetto" live there? That the "natural aristocracy" of the land live there? Is this unhappy bungler, with big gun, aware that his vile abolition missiles may perchance hit the august head of a Spratt, a Keitt, a Rhett, a Simms, or an Orr? What does this plebeian Yankee mean by disturbing the aristocracy? General Beauregard asks for a truce of two days, and this inhuman scoundrel replies that his terms are unconditional surrender or more Greek fire! What can a sweeping gentleman like Beauregard and distinguished friends of humanity like John Bull's consul and others, do, but protest and submit? Yes, there is one thing they can do. They can, as before, imitate the boy who declared in his invincible adversary that if he could not lick him he could make mouths at his sister. They can call names. Butler was a beast. Let Gillmore, with the same point, be the monster Gillmore.

THE MONTORS AT CHARLESTON.

THE complaints of Admiral Dahlgren's delay in Charleston harbor were, at least, premature. The Admiral knows the difficulties of the task the same which discovered in April that until Sumter was reduced they could not operate to advantage. Captain Drayton in the Pawnee, therefore, found in the last attack that a heavy blow from one of Sumter's guns could derange his machinery. He could put himself in safety perhaps in twelve hours and return to the attack. But that was merely to run exactly the same risk without any adequate compensation; for his guns did little damage to the fort.

The work that the Monitors have to do is to remove the obstructions in the channel. To do that successfully they must be out of the steady battery of heavy guns, which, by dotting the turrets, may throw momentary disorder, and that very move incessantly they would not mind the chance; but hold in one harbor defenses they are quite unfairly exposed. They must wait, therefore, until they can have the conditions of their success.

Besides, this work necessarily goes on slowly, and their speed is about four miles an hour. But the current of Charleston harbor is three miles an hour, so that it is easy to see that they may become a little unmanageable.

The Monitors are as yet a crude and undeveloped invention. Admiral Dahlgren knows they are occasionally unsurpassed. The contest with the Merrimac shows what a select party of them would do with the navy of any power that should sail beyond New York out of English harbors. To wooden ships also they must necessarily be fatal. A fort which could not resist them would be one that they would readily batter down. But if they can be held within range of a heavy battery, incessantly hammering, the fight in Charleston in April attack upon Sumter shows that they may have to retire.

For the rest it may fairly be supposed that Admiral Dahlgren knows the value of time, and knows also just what the enemy are doing, quite as well as does Commodore Rodgers. To conduct and reputation hitherto are not such as to justify the suspicion that he will allow the enemy to pass any advantage which it is possible for him to prevent.

COLD COMFORT.

MR. "VICE-PRESIDENT" STEPHENS, as we lately saw, is cheerful without extreme difficulties, but Mr. Richmond Enquirer, who is considered the "Confederacy" in this manner: "Rosecrans is said to be advancing upon Bragg, while in the West Burnside is pushing Longstreet. The prospect is all the better.... The danger of too much success upon our side has always been too much confidence.... The movement of Rosecrans, if indeed he has begun a march, is one of desperation possibly.... A week or two will bring us, we believe, news to clear up the situation between the two." The last year is not much altered to our disadvantage. A single victory in the Southwest will cover much that we have lately done.... Charleston [that is the enemy] will only be able to close that place as a port of entry.... So the situation brightens."

Such comfort is cold comfort indeed. Down upon by a wit who aristocratic as the Lounger, but in my wit's end for a theme. "Danger of too much success upon our side" is not promising. Mr. Davis and Company should certainly bespeak livelier comforters.

A POINT TO CONSIDER.

IT is a curious commentary upon some of the statements made in the work upon the social condition of England of which we have already spoken, that Mr. Dickens speaks, in his new series of "The Uncommercial Traveler," of visiting a ship full of Mormon emigrants, and finding them a rough, intelligent, honest folk, of whom England, as well as she herself, might be proud. "I found them," he says, "the main orderly, well-conducted, and intelligent set of common people I ever saw—to my pick and choice from."

Mr. Kay says that the mass of the poorer classes in England are outside of all the churches, because the forms of worship and the habits of thought of most of the dissenting sects are not imaginative enough for an ignorant people, and because the personal intercourse between priest and people, which is essential to the maintenance of popular religious interest, is impossible, from the small number of clergymen and their isolation from a superior class. The crowd turns, therefore, either to the glittering pomp and constant personal sympathy and supervision of the Romish priest, or to the sensual excitement of another kind—of the rantin and ultra-evangelical sects.

He is wise who knows that every moment not gained is a moment lost, every lesson not learned is an increase of ignorance. We are young; we have a boundless domain; we have hope, faith, and we are about starting farther than ever before.

Shall the Old World be our little bark one inch? Let us know, and speak, and consider the fact that the great mass of the technically laboring class in this country is coming to be of a different race and a different religion from the rest of the population; and that no country is safe in which the people are not substantially one.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

LETTERS from the Army of the Potomac give an interesting account of the recent presentation of a sword to General Meade by the Pennsylvania Reserves, with the speech made by General Crawford, now commanding the Reserves, General Meade, Governor Curtin, and others.

Surgeon-General Hammond is about to proceed to Fort Royal and New Orleans, to look after the condition of the hospitals.

The Secretary of the Navy has left Washington for a tour of inspection through the New York, Boston, and Portsmouth Navy-yards, and will visit Philadelphia on his return.

In the affair with Morgan's guerrillas on 17th ult. near Fairfax, Morgan is said to have received two wounds which are thought to be mortal.

The death of General Pemberton, who commanded at Vicksburg, at Selma, Alabama, is reported by a dispatch from Cairo.

Commander Walke went up the Yazoo, a few days since, with instructions to attempt to save the gun-boat De Kalb, which he found impossible, and therefore destroyed her, first having removed her guns and every thing of value.

Major Luther B. Bruen, commanding the depôt of the 11th United States Infantry, at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, has received orders to take to that command of his regiment. He has not hitherto been in active service.

Lt.-Col. G. W. Lay, late U. S. V., has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted.

Brigadier-General Fish announced the capture of Jane Townsend and her child as follows:

Fish Kend, August 28, 1863.

Major-General Schofield:

My compliments. Jane Townsend is a prisoner in our hands. CLINTON B. FISH,

Brigadier-General.

Major J. W. Steer, Assistant Inspector-General on the staff of General Crawford, resigned last week in consequence of wounds received at Gaines's Hill and Charles Cross Roads. His resignation has been accepted. The successor of Major Steer is Major Charles Hamilton, who is son of the democratic candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania.

Major Oliver D. Greene, of the Adjutant-General's Department, has been appointed Assistant Adjutant-General with the rank of Colonel, on the staff of Major-General Schofield, commanding the Department of the Missouri, and will leave immediately for that post. He will fill a similar position on the staff of Major-General Franklin, in the Department of the Gulf.

Lieutenant J. P. Sanger, First United States Artillery, has been made acting Assistant Inspector-General under General Gillmore.

The death of the valiant John B. Floyd is confirmed by the Richmond papers. He died of the effects of typhus fever and jaundice in their worst forms.

Captain C. S. Hill, Assistant Quarter-master, was arrested on 31st ult., and consigned to the Old Capitol prison at Washington, on charges preferred by General Dix.

Captain Tyndale, of Battery'A, Second United States Artillery, is ordered to the Colonelcy of the Fourth New York Heavy Artillery.

Brigadier-General Meigs has completed his inspection of the Army of the Potomac, and returned to Washington.

Colonel Henry E. Davies, of the city, of the Harris Light Cavalry, now on the 6th ult., appointed to the command of the First Brigade of the Third Division of Cavalry in the Army of the Potomac.

The funeral of Acting Assistant Paymaster Josiah G. Osborn, of the Monitor, who was killed in the Catskill in the attack on Charleston, took place on 26th ult., at two P.M., in the residence of the mother of the deceased in Bedford, Pa. Rev. Mr. Gibson, Grand Gulf, and Wright, Manchester, New Hampshire, and was buried with Masonic honors.

Lieutenant-Colonel Halpine, formerly Assistant Adjutant-General to General Hunter and Lieutenant Langdon, has been temporarily assigned, by special orders of the War Department, to the staff of Major-General Dix.

Acting Master Robert Cameron was reported to have died on the 20th of June. Further to this city have just received a letter from him, dated 18th of August, and a telegram from Cairo, dated August 31, stating that he was well, and had been promoted. He served in the army, and is now in the navy. He is a young Scotchman, and has served in the Mississippi squadron ever since December, 1861, and has been in many engagements, and was wounded at Liverpool Bluffs.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHARLESTON.

On the evening of 31st ult. a rebel troops made an assault on Fort Wagner, with a view to the possession of that important position. Rebel authorities state that it was repulsed. On the 26th ult. the fire on both sides was very slow and desultory. On the 29th ult. the 30th says that the Union troops are working hard in the trenches in front of Fort Wagner.

THE WAR IN TENNESSEE.

The army of General Rosecrans crossed the Tennessee River at four points, in Northern Kentucky swiftly capturing thirty-five pickets of the enemy. General Reynolds captured a large force at Stevenson, Alabama, on Running Waters. Among the captured are the guerrilla Captain Gee, and Lieutenant Longstreman. Cumberland Gap, Little or no resistance was made. The rebels are reported to be in force at Knoxville, Tennessee, and Abingdon, Virginia State Railroad. General Burnside is on the region of Kingston, and will advance from Knoxville before long.

According to rebel accounts the fire upon Chattanooga was opened by the Union batteries. Rosecrans's forces are on the citizens, and in consequence three ladies and two male citizens were killed. The rebels have their army in the city digging trenches to resist the assault. The mountains around are now being occupied by Confederates, and found clear of rebels.

THE WAR IN ARKANSAS.

Our advices from Arkansas are important. Our forces under General Steele are reported at Duvall's Bluff, on the Arkansas River, and General Prentiss, from Little Rock, while General Price, with 25,000 rebels, is at Hayes Mission, a strong post on White River, fourteen miles above Duvall's Bluff. A great battle is expected to be fought here, and skirmishing has been going on. Duvall's Bluff is expected to be made our base of supplies, as it can be reached by all stages of water. Magruder is represented to have conscripted a force of 18,000 men in Southern Texas.

EXECUTION OF DESERTERS.

A terrible lesson to deserters was given at the headquarters of the Army of the Potomac on 28th ult. Five men from Pennsylvania regiments, who had deliberately deserted after being regularly put into service, were shot to death in presence of their comrades. Their names were George Kuhns, a Hanoverian; Charles Wallace and John Wilson, Pittsburgh; John Fulton and Andrew Nelson, Indiana. Two were Protestants, two Catholics, and one a Jew.

LEE'S WHEREABOUTS.

The best attainable information locates General Lee in Richmond, and his army scattered from the line of the Blue Ridge on the west to Fort Royal, Rappahannock River on the east, and south as far as the line of the Virginia Central Railroad. His troops are as widely scattered, probably, to facilitate subsisting. General Jewell from his left; A. P. Hill the centre, lying on the railroad from Culpeper to Orange Court House; while Longstreet holds the extreme right, occupying the line of the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad. Cook's brigade of North Carolina troops occupies Fredericksburg. Jones's brigade, of Longstreet's corps, has come back to the Shenandoah Valley, and Robinson to Richmond. Stuart is still in command of the cavalry, having more and more popular. It is expected he will be relieved by Wade Hampton.

RECONNOISSANCE TOWARD RICHMOND.

The Federal cavalry expedition on Bottom's Bridge, which caused so much alarm in Richmond, was commanded by General Wyndham, and consisted of parts of the First New York Mounted Rifles, Colonel Onderdonk, and the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Lowry. The expedition left Williamsburg on the 26th, and pushed through New Kent Court House directly to Bottom's Bridge. At the latter place one rebel regiment of infantry, in rifle-pits, were found, who were supported by a squadron of cavalry. A charge was immediately made, and the rebel rifle-pits were carried and the rebels driven across the bridge, which they took up behind them. Our troops having accomplished the object of the expedition, returned to Yorktown.

OUR REPETITION OF THE WHITE RIVER.

A report forwarded by Admiral Lardner to the navy department says that the Red and White rivers are most beautiful streams, and that the latter has never been destroyed, and the only two steamers the enemy had having been captured.

THE DRAFT HERE.

The draft was completed in this city on 8th ult., the full quotas of conscripts having been drawn. The draft of Brooklyn, their meeting on 28th, passed an ordinance, which was signed by the Mayor, providing for the appropriation of two millions of dollars for the exemption of drafted persons, from the millies, and the families of families who may be dependent upon them for support.

DRAFTING IN OHIO.

It is announced that no draft will be made in Ohio. Officers of the army sent home to secure drafted men are instructed to report to the nearest military commander.

PEACE MOVEMENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

A late number of the Raleigh (North Carolina) Standard contains a letter reporting the state of peace feeling throughout the State. The revolution there is fast ripening.

PROGRESS OF RECONSTRUCTION.

General Grant's order No. 76 declares that Tennessee and Kentucky, east of Tennessee River, are free from rebel forces, and that enlisting and recruiting for the whole therein will be rigorously punished. He recommends the people to organize and establish his form of oath and renunciations; also that they recognize the freedom of slaves and pay them for labor. The order makes provision for some of the more destitute of the rebel residents.

NEGRO REBEL TROOPS.

On the authority of rebel papers received at Morehead City, North Carolina, it is stated that Jeff Davis is about to adopt a measure for the enlistment of negro troops to a certain extent, to anticipate Mr. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. The report is that it will be done only by advice of the Governors of the Southern States, for half a million of negroes, and that their freedom after peace is guaranteed, and a bounty of fifty acres of land will be given at the conclusion of the war.

THE PRESIDENT TO GENERAL GRANT.

Executive Mansion, Washington, July 13, 1863.

To Major-General Grant:

My dear General,—I do not remember that you and I have ever acknowledged to you in writing how we regarded your attack upon Vicksburg the most fundamental one upon the rebellion, and the most important success that could be given to the country. I wish to say a word further. When you first reached the vicinity of Vicksburg, it was said you should do what you finally did—march the troops across the neck, run the batteries with the transports, and thus go below; and I never had any faith, except a general hope that you knew better than any body else, that it was Expedition and the like could succeed. When you got below, and took Grand Gulf, and while Grand Gulf, and vicinity, thought you should go down the river and join General Banks; while my only anxiety was that you should go, and I was wrong.

Yours very truly, A. LINCOLN

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY.

Governor Bramlette was inaugurated as Governor of Kentucky on 1st inst. In his inaugural address he emphatically declares that secession did not change their status by rebelling; that all that is necessary for them to do is to return to their allegiance and take their position as States; that the rebellion did not remit them to a territorial state. He says we have won, and will have when the rebellion closes, the identical Constitution which extremists seek to destroy—the only guaranteeing, the other by force. It is not a rotten Union, not a reconstructed Union, that Kentucky desires, but a preserved Union and a restored peace upon a constitutional basis. The Governor strongly objects to the arming of negro regiments, and asks what is to be done with such soldiers at the end of the war? He points to the result of the recent election in this State that Kentucky will not tolerate with rebellion, either open or covert, and that Kentucky people are for peace, but are for it, and always will be, loyal to the Government of our fathers.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

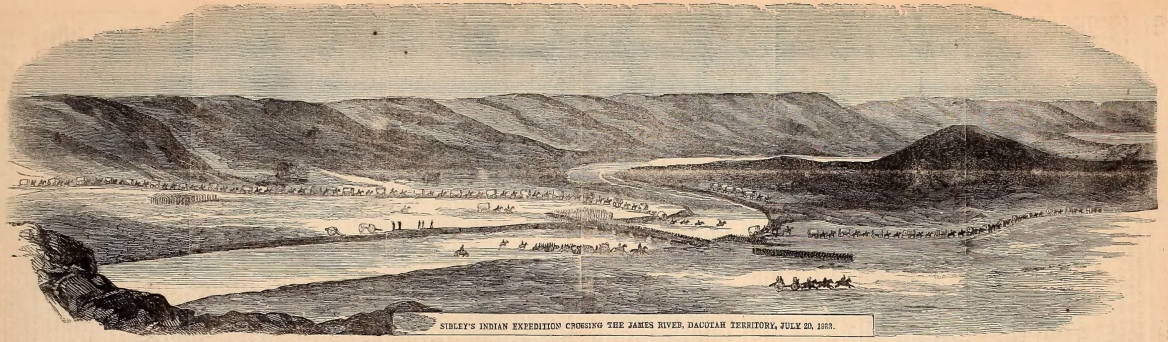
THE PIRATE "FLORIDA."

The rebel pirate Florida has appeared in the Irish Channel, and on the 31st ult. was off Cape Clear. After taking a pilot, she handed these persons in that city, who were supposed to be in the rebel secret government service to London. Lying off the privateer communicated with several merchant vessels, and it was thought she was receiving supplies of war material. The Florida had a vessel in tow, which was supposed to be a prize, and it was then she was lying to off Tuskar. A large quantity of silver, taken from this ship, Florida, was landed by the privateer, under the name of "Ingagua."

MORE ANGLO-REBEL PIRATES.

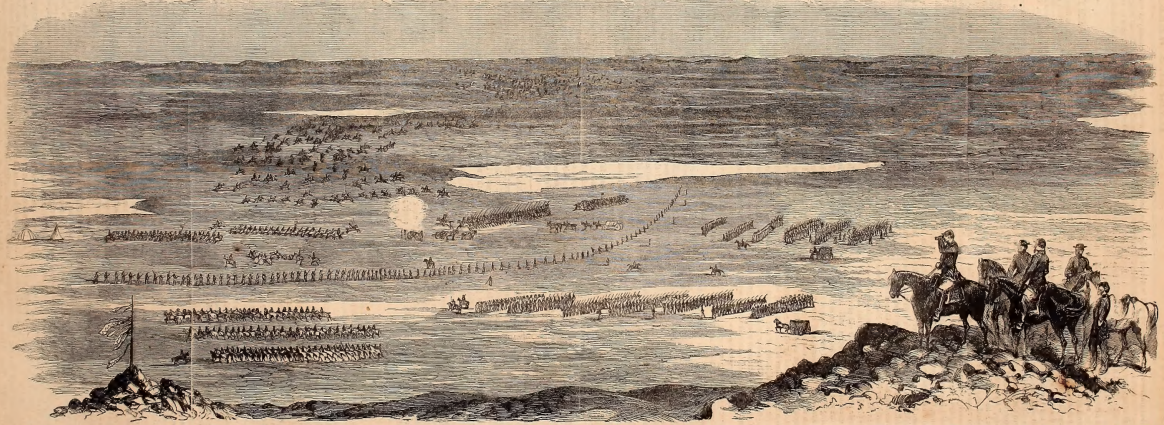
It appears by a despatch paper that British war vessels have been recently sold to a London company, nominally for the Mediterranean trade, but really for the rebel service in this country.

POLAND.



THE INSURRECTION.

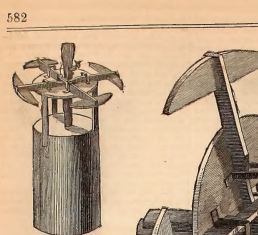
The Polish insurrection continues to drag along with varying success to the belligerents. On the 15th of August a engagement occurred at Kalisz, in which Russian forces, which lasted until night. At the commencement of the engagement the Poles were two hours and fifty strong, of which number but thirty-six escaped.



MEXICO.

THE NEW EMPIRE.

There appears to be no room for doubt that the Archduke Maximilian has accepted the throne of Mexico. The French correspondent of the Times says some inconsistency in Mexico revoking the measures relative to the sequestration of property of those who have taken up arms against the French. A blockade is also ordered, to extend from the Lagunes, the league south of Matamoras, to Campeachy.



SIBLEY'S INDIAN EXPEDITION CROSSING THE JAMES RIVER, DACOTAH TERRITORY, JULY 20, 1863.

GEN. SIBLEY'S INDIAN EXPEDITION—PURSUING THE SIOUX OVER THE COTEAU DU MISSOURI, DACOTAH TERRITORY, AFTER THE BATTLE OF THE BIG HILLS, JULY 24, 1863.—SKETCHED BY GEO. H. ELSBURY, SEVENTH MINNESOTA VOLUNTEERS.—[SEE PAGE 587.]

VIEW OF THE CITY OF CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, FROM THE NORTH SIDE OF THE TENNESSEE RIVER.—[See Page 587.]

REBEL TORPEDO, FROM STONO RIVER.

REBEL TORPEDOES.

ABOVE we give illustrations of a REBEL TORPEDO sent down the Stono River, South Carolina, on the night of August 16. It consists, says our correspondent, who furnishes the sketches, "of two cylinders of tin, the upper one acting on a buoy, the lower containing sixty pounds of powder. These are connected by an iron tube, into which is placed an old smooth-bore musket with the stock sawed off. The detailed drawing shows the arrangement for setting it off. Ten of them were sent down in pairs, connected by about 250 feet of rope. One exploded under the Pawnee's stern, blowing her launch to pieces, and shaking the whole ship. Two others exploded near; two floated down to the bar and exploded there; two others went up Folly River on the flood tide, and were secured by the mortar-schooner C. P. Williams, from one of which the drawings have been made."

A CRUEL CASE.

THE years 1824–5–6 were periods of immense commercial activity. Unfortunately the basis of that unexampled and permanent prosperity was Paper—practically unlimited issues of bank promises to pay; and when the gigantic bubble burst in 1827 more than two-thirds of the English banks were overwhelmed, the Bank of England terribly shaken, and, according to Mr. Huskisson, the country was within four-and-twenty hours of a state of barter. That, however, could be no reason why Lovegold and Company should not profit as largely as possible by the impetus given to speculations of all kinds by "cheap" money. We did profit largely, and, as a firm, did not sustain much loss when the crash came. Mr. Pryse, my partner, was less fortunate—emerging from the chaos of 1827 with riven heart and dreadfully scorched fingers; altogether a distracted, and, it was really apprehended, a permanently "blighted being." He, however, survived the shock five-and-twenty years; but so burned into his brain were the incidents of the catastrophe that, when dying, at the early age of sixty, almost the last sentence he was heard to mutter was an incoherent stringing together of the words, "Cruel, treacherous woman!" "Serk mines!"—and "That unhanged thief, Burroughs!" with which pestilent persons and projects as my shamefully ill-used partner would have had no concern whatever but for the great paper "property."

I must preface the story of Mr. Pryse's shocking misadventure by remarking that, being really very good-looking, he believed himself to be an Adonis, whose fascinations few women could resist. This, I must do him the justice to say, was his only considerable weakness. To that inordinate vanity it was owing that he was still a bachelor at five-and-thirty—he not having up to that time met with a lady whose attractions in person, purse, and pedigree balanced his own merits. Not one of the three requisites—beauty, fortune, birth (he was a great stickler for birth)—could possibly be dispensed with; and it was precisely with these three baits that the Father of Mischief angled for and hooked my partner.

Mr. Kenneth Temple was a gentleman approaching middle age, who, on the death of his father, Sir Willoughby Temple, would come into possession of large unsettled estates, and, on the decease of an aunt, would be entitled to a reversion of over forty thousand pounds. Both father and aunt were not only aged, but ailing persons; so, having assured ourselves beyond a doubt of that cardinal fact, we accommodated Mr. Temple to a large sum on the usual terms, he being a fast gentleman, for whom the very handsome income allowed by his father was wholly insufficient. In 1825 Sir Willoughby died; a few months afterward the aunt departed this life, and the new baronet was a very wealthy man. His account with us was liberally settled, and, strange to say—at least it appeared strange to us—Sir Kenneth was no sooner possessed of immense wealth than a passion for adding, still adding, to the heap grew upon him. His mode of living became parsimonious, while he dived unhesitatingly into the whirlpool of reckless speculation—South American loans, bubble railway panies—and, wonderful to say, always emerged with plunder. He had conceived an exalted opinion of Mr. Pryse's judgment in such matters, and was, in consequence, often at our office. I altogether disapproved of such ventures, and constantly refused to be in any wise an agent for the purchase or sale of shares, or to permit the funds of the firm to be invested in such schemes. My partner nibbled to the extent of a few thousands on his own private account, and made money thereby. Pryse was not a man to venture out of his depth, and I had no fear that he would in the end—sooner or later as that might come—be a large loser.

One of the unlucky dabblers was Major Burroughs, a relation of Sir Kenneth Temple. He had put all his eggs in one basket—that basket being the Serk Silver Mining Company. Serk is an island in the Channel, not very distant, I believe, from Guernsey, in which silver had been found. The real or pretended discovery was skillfully puffed, and a company for working the new Peru quickly formed, with a (paper) capital of one hundred thousand pounds. The concoctors of the scheme were lucky enough to catch at least one bona fide share buyer, Major Burroughs, whose gullibility was so absolute that he not only invested in the company the whole of his capital, about fifteen thousand pounds, but did the same with the proceeds of the sale of his commission. At one time, I believe, the shares were at a premium, but the fall had been so rapid and constant that, at the commencement of 1827, the quotations were nominal—no real business in them being possible. In that unpleasant state of things Sir Kenneth Temple was solicited by his kinsman for an advance upon the shares. He declined the request, but, naturally desirous of obliging a relative, introduced Major Burroughs to Mr. Pryse; nor did he scruple to attempt serving that gentleman by volunteering a confident opinion that Serk Silver Mine shares would command a premium when the project was more fully understood. He himself had his hands just then completely full, but perhaps Mr. Pryse would advance two or three thousand pounds upon the said securities. Mr. Pryse begged to be excused, and the negotiation, if such it could be called, fell through.

The unfortunate major, a general of very imaginative resources, forthwith, having no shares of his own for want of cash, came to us one day, and informed us of that dreary fact. After which promising prelude, he asked if Lovegold and Company would discount his acceptance at six months for two hundred pounds. He would not haggle about interest and commission. He left that for a moment imagine he would. Cent. per cent. per annum would simply have made him a present of two hundred pounds. The bill, of course, was declined with thanks, but I intimated that if his relative Sir Kenneth would lend his name there would be no difficulty. Major Burroughs thereupon left, and, knowing the baronet, I expected to hear no more of the matter. I was mistaken. To my great surprise the major returned with a note from his relative, guaranteeing payment at maturity of the major's acceptance for two hundred pounds. The applicant got the money and went away rejoicing. Shortly afterward the baronet called.

"You are probably surprised I did not lend Burroughs the money myself," said Sir Kenneth.

"Not in the least; you intend that if the necessity arise, the screw should be put on in our names, not yours."

"Right. Still, as far as a few hundred pounds go, there is not much risk. The orphan niece, Miss Vandeleur, who will in a few months come of age and into the uncontrolled possession of fifty thousands pounds, would not suffer him to be troubled; for to her it is a mere bagatelle—product beyond her years as she is said to be. I think," continued the baronet, with some hesitation, "I think I might venture to guarantee for five hundred pounds. Burroughs, a good fellow in his way, has, I think, no other very enormous vice but that of poverty. Still, it is as well to be cautious. Miss Vandeleur is expected in town very shortly; I will confer with her respecting a loan to her uncle. It will signify nothing that she has not attained her majority. Her word will amply suffice. I am really anxious to assist Burroughs, if I can do so safely."

Nothing more was said at the time, but a few days subsequently we received a note from Sir Kenneth, in which it was stated that Miss Vandeleur had arrived in town, and was staying with her uncle and guardian, Major Burroughs. She had promised to see the baronet harmless to the extent of one thousand pounds, which sum accordingly, inclusive of the two hundred already advanced, he, Sir Kenneth, guaranteed to repay us should the major make default. As it was, however, feared that Burroughs had contracted a habit of gaming upon a large scale whenever he had the means of gratifying that ruinous propensity, the eight hundred pounds should be handed to him by instalments not exceeding one hundred pounds per month. Miss Vandeleur would reside at the hotel with her uncle during her probably long stay in town, and being with him would naturally much increase his personal expenses. This was one of her reasons for assisting him with the loan, and he would be distinctly informed that her guarantee would not go beyond the thousand pounds. The note concluded with an intimation that the baronet was about to start immediately for Paris, and would be some time absent from Folly Park.

I casually remarked that Miss Vandeleur appeared to be a strict young lady in money matters. Pryse laughed, and said that the "prudence" was the baronet's rather than hers, he being desirous of not taking any one's "moral" guarantee for a larger sum than that stipulated for. My partner added that the Vandeleurs were a family that had flourished for many centuries in Norfolk.

The major was no sooner to obtain the whole sum at once in a lump—a request which of course could not be complied with, pressing as his necessities might be; and he left the office in high dudgeon.

His anger with us did not long endure. The very next day he returned, and accompanied by Miss Vandeleur herself. I was gone out. Pryse saw them; and the result of a lengthened conference was, that my partner consented to the eight hundred pounds.

"The young lady," said Pryse, his handsome phiz glowing with pleasurable emotion—"the young lady, a most beauteous, fascinating person, urged certain of her guardian's request as a favor to herself, regretting that the rigorous conditions of her father's will compelling the trustees not to control her in settling the annual sum paid to her, precluded her from presenting him with the money herself. Favor, indeed!" continued Pryse; "Miss Vandeleur conferred an obligation by enabling me to oblige her by the advance of such a trifling sum. The r jor," added Pryse, smoking his cigar with a look of gloating with evident satisfaction at an opposite mirror—"the major has invited me to dine with him and Miss Vandeleur this day at Burleigh's."

"Whew! The deuce! No wonder you are so cock-a-hoop. Youth, beauty, fifty thousand pounds, and two hundred shares of partners would be something like a hit."

"Nonsense! Miss Vandeleur is a match for a lord."

"True enough; but girlhood is capricious, wilful; and, seriously, if I were such a handsome young fellow as you, Pryse—yes, make up or down to forty and twenty—I should try it on, if I could but have a chance."

Pryse set me down as no neglect such a chance. There might have been something in the young lady's manner which inspired hope in an excessive degree, but I was sure, for the remainder of that day, and the whole of the next, Pryse was in a state of nervous fidget, and committed such unaccountable blunders that it was quite a relief when he left, swelling like a turkey-cock, to array himself for the important occasion.

Instead of coming to the office the next week into his ordinary common-sense self, Pryse soared, expanded into such a state of sublimation and importance that I was obliged to request that, for the reputation of the office as a place of sober business, he should keep away till he could descend from the region of fancy to those of fact. He said it might be as well to do so as he really felt unfit for business. He added, with some confusion of manner:

"I shall be glad if you will dine with us to-morrow evening."

"With us! Who's us?"

"Major Burroughs, Julia, and myself."

"Julia! Why, you impudent dog, you must have gone the pace to have arrived at that point already. Of course, Julia stands for Miss Vandeleur?"

"Who else could I mean? You will dine with us?"

"I have no objection. Is the thing settled?"

"No, sir; not a bit," he continued, with a sort of embarrassment—"in fact, spite of the whisperings of vanity—of which it would be folly to deny I have a full share—Miss Julia, so suddenly, strangely tendered for my acceptance—it really comes to that, or appears to do so—is so brilliant a one, so immeasurably beyond what I have a right to expect, that I should like a cooler head than mine to survey the situation, so that I do not make a fool of myself, or—or be made one by others."

"I will make good use of eyes and ears. You are sure about the fifty thousand pounds?"

"Positive. I have myself read the will at Doctors' Commons. At present quotations, the money in the funds would realize considerably more than fifty thousand pounds. Miss Vandeleur comes into absolute possession on the 8th of November next, upon which day she will attain her majority. Till then she can not marry without the consent in writing of her uncle, Major Burroughs; should she do so, the moiety of her fortune goes to a female cousin."

"If he should interpose adversely, it is not so long till November."

"Far too long! A slip twixt cup and lip must not be hazarded. I have even a suspicion that Sir Kenneth Temple himself may enter the lists upon his return from Paris. Major Burroughs must be conciliated."

"It is generally easy enough to win over a needy man."

"Just so. Fifty thousand pounds will allow of offering a handsome douceur. But it is folly to count chickens in the egg. Do not fail tomorrow evening. Dinner will be served at six precisely."

I dined with the major, his niece, and arrangement partner, and afterward accompanied them to the play. Miss Vandeleur was really a charming, positively beautiful young lady, and Pryse was as earnestly, deeply in love as so personally vain a man could be. The fascinating Julia, too, was evidently pleased with her conquest. There would, I was sure, be no difficulty in that quarter. Such a lucky dog was Francis Pryse!

Emboldened by my opinion, Pryse waited the next day upon Major Burroughs, and proposed for the hand of Miss Vandeleur in form. He was kindly received, and his interview with the uncle guardian was not more interesting than decisive.

The major having listened with benignant sympathy to the lover's protestations of admiration, affection, disinterestedness, replied that, for himself, he held a city capitalist, already rich, and in the way to realize a colossal fortune, as a far more eligible match for his niece than any of the aristocratic foplings by whom she was literally besieged. "But," continued Major Burroughs, "a moral consideration presents itself at the outset. I, as you, Mr. Pryse, well know, am beset, nearly overwhelmed with pecuniary difficulties, and, not to beat about the bush when talking to a man of the world, I must be handsomely paid for giving my written consent to the union which you crave. If you demur to a proposition so reasonable, wait till Julia shall be of age, which I may say, make up your mind to lose her, for though I care little for birth myself, did the Vandeleur family once suspect that such a marriage was in the hope, they would move heaven and earth to avert such a calamitous disgrace, as they would feel it to be, from their ancient house; and they are powerful. You have personally found favor with Julia, but you see how impressionably flexible she is. She would yield to the importunities of her friends, and in all probability be persuaded to give her hand to Sir Kenneth Temple. The baronet, if you marry me, would be in no position to assist me," added the major; "but for that I do not care one pinch of snuff. He is a mean skin-flint, to whom I am under no obligation."

Mr. Pryse admitted that to be true, and gingerly inquired at what figure Major Burroughs would rate his sentiments to the marriage, supposing that of Miss Vandeleur was obtained.

"I have sounded Julia," said the major, "and am quite confident that will be implicitly given by me. Now to business: you know that I have invested my all in Serk Silver Mine shares. I propose that you release me of them at the price I paid?"

"Your Serk Silver Mine shares!" exclaimed Pryse. "Give fifteen thousand seven hundred pounds in exchange for shares in the Serk Mining Company!"

"Pardon me. For the Serk Mining shares, Julia and myself duly thousand pounds. You don't think my niece would feel herself much flattered if she witnessed her admirer's hesitation to close with such a bargain."

The major having evidently said his last word, Pryse necessarily acquiesced, and that important arrangement was made. He never was ashamed to the lady, by whom his suit was granted with blushing tenderness. At his urgent request she graciously consented to the following Thursday week as the "happy day."

Miss Vandeleur had a perfect mania for jewels and other expensive finery. Daily—hourly—frightful bills were sent to the office from jewelers, goldsmiths, lapidaries, milliners, dressers, and other trades-people who contributes to bridal outfits. I remember that Pryse was in a state of perpetual worry and irritation, trying and groaning, poor fellow, under each infliction, as if his law teeth were being wrenched out with instruments of torture one by one.

"Good Heavens! dreadful! but it can't last. It's impossible! Another bill! She'll empty all the shops in London! What a dreadful propensity!" and the like.

There was, however, no drawing back, and Pryse was fain to seek consolation in reflecting that even at the swiful rate of expenditure actually going on, supposing it to last till the bridal day, there would still remain a handsome sum to twenty-five thousand pounds at least. Her jewels were property, if those devilish shares were not. Still fears and doubtings shook him; and though I had steadily refused to advise him either for or against the marriage, I could not refrain, seeing the storm of torture of extravagant demands pour in, to ask if he were really sure about the will—was the bequest absolute? were there no contingencies—no chance of its being upset in a court of law by enraged relatives? His face changed to the hue of stone at the shocking suggestion, and before the words were well out of my mouth he had seized his hat and sped off like a shot to Doctors' Commons. He was gone some time, and returned in a much less perturbed state of mind, bringing a copy of the will with him. It was very short, expressed in clear clearness, and I agreed that there could be no dispute about the validity of the bequest to Miss Vandeleur. My positive dictum reassured him, and he drew a check for a fresh claim, without exhibiting such violent symptoms of colic as before.

The wedding was a very private one, and a few hours after its celebration the bride and bridegroom set off on their marriage tour, which it was arranged should last a month.

Considerably before the honey-moon had waned the commercial storm broke with terrific violence, and, thanks to great caution, Lovegold and Company were not in actual danger. It was a time of extreme anxiety, and I wrote to Pryse, requesting him to return immediately. He readily complied, leaving his wife with a dependent female relative, who had joined them a few days before. Mrs. Pryse had been seized with sudden thought not at all dangerous illness, which incapacitated her from immediately setting out on the long journey to England. Mr. Pryse, in the most brilliant spirits, "the happiest man in England," set to work with alacrity, and, I rejoiced to find, was again the sound, sensible man of business.

On the third or fourth day after his arrival Sir Kenneth Temple walked into the office, looking exceedingly glum and stern, and, as if to annoy Pryse with an expression of derisive displeasure. He had, no doubt, heard of the marriage, and we were about to have a scene.

"So, Mr. Pryse," said the baronet, "you have bought, at the full nominal price, Major Burroughs's solicitor informs me, those three Mine shares. I did not think you such an arrant blockhead! Why, they neither are, nor ever will be, worth a brittan!"

"Have the kindness, Sir Kenneth Temple," retorted Pryse, with spirit—"I have the honour, Sir Kenneth Temple, to use the language of a gentleman when addressing one. Did the solicitor tell you nothing more?" added he, with a sneer.

"He did not tell me any thing more, but he placed this newspaper in my hand. Pray, did you cause the insertion of this insolent paragraph?"

"What paragraph? Read it, and I will tell you."

The baronet complied, and read aloud the following announcement:

"Married, at St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden, by special license, on the 15th instant, Francis Pryse, Esquire, of Regent's Park and Lombard Street, to Julia, the only surviving daughter of the late Major Burroughs, Esquire, of Oak Hall, Norfolk. Immediately after the solemnization of the marriage the happy pair left for the Continent."

"I did order the insertion of that paragraph. In what way does it concern Sir Kenneth Temple?"

"How does it concern me? Why, what the devil does it mean? How dare you, in rhidiculous, associate your plebeian name with that of my relative, Miss Vandeleur?"

"For what you address such words to me? Leave the office! Were it not that you are a distant relative of the lady mentioned in the newspaper paragraph I would thrm you out of doors. Your relative, Miss Vandeleur that was, is now Mrs. Pryse."

The baronet turned bewilderingly to me: "What does the fellow mean?"

"The meaning is plain enough, Sir Kenneth Temple. The marriage, I can understand, may be distasteful to you; but it is not the less true that Miss Vandeleur, who, when you left London, was staying with her uncle, Major Burroughs, was married, as the paper states, with the major's written consent. The lady is now on her way home from Paris."

"Miss Vandeleur your partner's wife, and now on her way home from Paris! What devil's dance has Burroughs been leading you? A dinner with Miss Vandeleur yesterday and the day before at the Clarendon, and saw her this morning about two hours since."

The effect of this speech upon myself and my partner may be imagined. Lapsing to extremes of dismay and alarm; Pryse sat motionless, transfixed, speechless, staring with wild terror at the baronet.

"This is a sorry jest!" I exclaimed, affecting a doubt I did not feel; "I myself visited Miss Vandeleur at Claridge's, and witnessed her marriage with Mr. Pryse."

"At Claridge's! Miss Vandeleur has never been at Claridge's. She has been all along, and is now, stopping at the Clarendon. Claridge's! Let me remember. Was the young lady pained upon you as Miss Vandeleur a remarkably pretty blonde, with wavy golden hair, blue eyes, a charming figure, and medium height, who sings 'Auld Robin Gray' delightfully?"

"Yes, yes!"

"Then, by Heavens, Burroughs has tricked your partner into marrying Mary Somers, a lady's maid, whom Miss Vandeleur dismissed a few months ago for dishonesty. The shameless scoundrel! But he—"

Poor Pryse, utterly beside himself, sprang up and leaped at Sir Kenneth with the fierce fury of a tiger. "Liar! liar! infernal liar!" he screamed; "I will crush the accursed lie in your throat!" and had the convulsive force he suddenly put forth lasted but a few minutes, he would certainly have gone nigh to throttle the baronet. As it was, his grasp relaxed as he dropped, with a shudder and groan, insensible on the floor.

I had him carried into a back room, and, leaving him in careful hands, returned to Sir Kenneth.

"What an infernal trick!" exclaimed the baronet, before I could speak. "The marriage is, of course, null and void; but the loss of fifteen thousand pounds is frightful!"

"The loss is much greater than that. He purchased jewels for the devilish minx to an immense amount! He loved her, too, with passion. The blow will kill him! Where is that villain Burroughs?"

"Drowned, or landed in America. He sailed from London on the 16th of last month; by Jove! the day after the mock marriage! If he were in the country, however, it is my belief you could do nothing with him. The purchase of the shares was effected, I am told, in the regular way. How could you fall into so gross a trap?"

"In some degree through your fault. You told us that Miss Vandeleur was staying at a hotel with her uncle, Major Burroughs. How could we suspect a gentleman of family—of, as far as we knew, unblemished reputation—of perpetrating such an atrocious crime?"

"It is an atrocious crime, and I am sincerely grieved for poor Pryse; but let us be just. Miss Vandeleur's fifty thousand pounds must have had a potent influence in dazzling and blinding the acute perception of such a man as he. However, what is done is done. The less won't break his back. Good-by!"

DOOMED TO DISAPPOINTMENT.

You saw that he was doomed to disappointment —in the drooping eyelid, in the raised eyebrow, in the wasted forehead, in the deep-furrowed cheeks. You saw it every where about him. Melancholy had marked him for his own as distinctly as smallpox—he was, as you pitied him, pitifully melancholy. Poor fellow! he was a disappointed man.

And what particular line had disappointment taken in his case? Had he married him, he would tell you that he had been disappointed in every mortal thing. Disappointment dogged his heels and shoulders, and had indeed done so ever since he was born. He was disappointed in his very cradle. Nay, he was an inveterate disappointment, for he was at once a disappointed man himself, but he had been a disappointment to all who were connected with him. He was a disappointment to his mother, who had wished him to be a girl, and to his maternal grandmother, who had expressed a desire that he should be twins; to his father, who had said that he hoped he would be no clever, and to his uncle, who had cherished the hope that he would be a dunce. It was a disappointing plan to every body that he was not a girl, nor a pair of twins, nor six feet high; and as to being clever, he could take his solemn oath that he was not that. But was that his fault? No, of course it wasn't. He had not the choice of sex or height. If he'd had any voice in the matter, he'd have been twins, because, then, surely one of him would have got on in the world: but pshaw! what would he mind stating how he had been disappointed?

Why, in every thing that a man could be disappointed in, of course.

Well, but in what? Had he been disappointed in his—ambition, say?

Hadn't he? The extent of his ambition was a small farm, at a moderate distance from town, and near a railway station; and had he got it? No, of course he hadn't.

Well, in what else? Had he been disappointed in friendship?

In friendship! Don't talk of it. He could not bear it. In friendship, indeed! He supposed that if a man took up a person, and wore him next his heart, and kept from him no single circumstance of early nor his personal history, and this person were to abscond, and betray the confidence reposed in him, why, respect to the memory of one's mother, one's heart, the tenderest emotions of one's nature, the respectability and private history of one's relations —not to mention a few silver tablespoons, a gold tankard, the Lord knows how much money, two hundred dollars at least—all of which articles he had been totally robbed by this person, who had also brought the case before a judge, who was as blind as Justice to the rights and wrongs of the matter; and before a jury, who were as deaf as either to the voice of reason and common-sense—he supposed that, after that, a man might be excused for saying that, for the future, the world should not be his friend, nor the world's law, and for turning his back upon both for ever.

Ah! very disappointing conduct, truly. But was that the extent of his disappointments? Had he—

Oh! don't ask him. What was the good of reopening old wounds? He had been the victim of disappointment not only in connection with love, ambition and friendship, but in those smaller things, to lose which was to lose, so to speak, the joys and the bounties of life.

What did he mean?

Why, he supposed it was plain enough what he meant.

Would he explain?

Well, he had explained, hadn't he? Or if he hadn't, he didn't see why he should explain it better.

Would he give an example, then?

Well, you know, the kind of thing he meant was this. If you asked a boy for what was about the most delightful thing he had ever seen, he would most probably answer, his first play. Well, you know, that was one of his disappointments.

How did he make that out?

Why, he supposed that a boy were to be taken to a theatre for the first time, and if, after sitting for half an hour, anticipating the most rapturous pleasure when the curtain rose, were to find ten minutes after it rose that the house was on fire, and then had to be dragged to a window by his relatives, and compelled to carry down that terrible yard down a fire-escape, and, when he reached the bottom, to be handed out like a parcel by a fireman, and turned loose like a parcel of dirty people till he was lost, and then had to be taken home ignominiously by a policeman, with the conviction all the while that he was looked upon by every one he met in the light of a person whose crimes had brought him within the grasp of the law—he supposed that that might be considered a disappointment, a serious disappointment.

Oh! that was granted, was it? Well, then, perhaps it would also be granted that if a boy whose dreams for years had been a pony had at last been presented with one by a treacherous relative, who, to gain some mean end, had taken care that the pony should be an unbroken one; and if, directly the boy mounted, the rampant animal had stood perpendicular for full two minutes, making such extraordinary gestures with its fore-legs that the only conclusion to come to was that it fancied it was delivering a political speech; and if, after that, to judge from its actions, much have been an amazingly eloquent peroration, it had taken the bit between its teeth, and bolted for two miles; and if the boy had dropped off exactly opposite the house where the queen of his boy's affections resided, and had then and there rolled—perhaps it would be granted that this was also a disappointment, eh! something like a disappointment.

Well, both those cases had been his own; nor were they the worst that he could relate. Disappointment dogged him wherever he went, dropping bitters into the cup of pleasure, and stripping the gilt off the gingerbread of life. Why, what was that, the song of poets, and the theme of romancers, to which youth looked forward with rapture, and which age looked back upon with fond regret? Why, the first kiss of love, of course. Well, there he was once again. Yes, disappointment was his side him there once more. How was he to be always keeping in mind that Amelia was weak in the chest, and that there was a leaning toward consumption in the family? Who can remember those things always?

What had Amelia's weak chest got to do with the first kiss of love?

Why, every thing in the world, or else he supposed he should not have mentioned it. What was the good of asking absurd questions like that? Why could not he be allowed to tell his tale as he liked, without being subjected to a kind of catechism, as if he were a charity child? It cost him pain enough to tell the tale at all, goodness knew. What had Amelia's chest got to do with it? Why, just as if it hadn't been for that, he might perhaps have been a very different creature to what we saw him. That serious cough would have been gone long ago, eye and lively, that heart and that voice alike unbroken. He might have been— But it was useless speculating on impossibilities. Amelia had a weak chest, and that was all about it; that was why she always wore two veils when the wind was cold, and, when the rain was falling together, used commonly to keep her handkerchief pressed to her mouth, so that her part of the conversation was warried to be indistinctly muffled, not to say husky, tone of voice. But the voice of love is always sweet; and though to the passer-by there might seem nothing attractive in those half-smothered accents, yet, to the lover, his mistress's voice, even when hoarse, discovered the sweetest harmonies. Now, he might be thought that after a fellow had been formally accepted, per letter (for a proposal by word of mouth was, he candidly confessed, more than he dared venture upon), by the girl, and after his proposals had been entertained and agreed to, that all future arrangements for parties most interested in the affair alone together. But did Amelia's mother do so? Did she act with that propriety? Not a bit. The persistent way in which that woman sat and stared at them was shameful. How was a fellow to make love, he should like to know, when he felt that he was being stared at all the while as if he were acting in a play? For his part, he was one of those people who found it quite impossible to say the things under the most favorable circumstances, but found the manufacture of the article quite impossible under the inspiration of a pair of eyes under the inspection of a neutral woman, who was in all probability drawing invidious comparisons between his behavior and the treatment he had similarly insulted, of Amelia's father, deceased, a man of rude and violent bearing. And then, again, was it likely he felt in any good, or even tolerable way the more at his ease, to overhear that woman mentioning him, Amelia's intended husband and her daughter as a young man of, she dared to say, very good principles, but sadly wanting in fire? Household duties did occasionally, of course, call that woman away for a few minutes—that Medusa, whose unblushing stare had the power of turning him in this manner into stone. Then, for those minutes, what security could a man feel with a glass door to the room? Ah! he had felt for years before that disappointment had laid its cold hand upon his shoulder, but never had he felt the icy chill of that fell touch so acutely as on that Sunday afternoon when, that woman having gone to church, he, Amelia and himself being alone in the drawing-room, the love which was burning in his heart rose supreme, and passing his arm round Amelia's waist, he was about to taste the nectar of her lips, when he perceived on the glass door three white spots, arranged in a pyramidal form—the features of Amelia's two little brothers and that of their nurse, all livid from intense pressure.

When Amelia and he walked out together they arrived—the nurse and he was bound to say that Amelia's inclinations, as a rule, led her to shops, and how was he to go kissing her in the front of shops with all the eye of the world? It was out of the question—quite out of the question. Disappointment, as he thought he had mentioned once or twice before, was evidently his portion, and there was nothing for it but to endure patiently.

But did he then never kiss Amelia? Did he quietly yield without an effort? If so, the case was surely less one of disappointment than of neglected opportunity.

No! he had not yielded without an effort. Then he had kissed her?

Well, no! He did not think it could be said that he had kissed her.

Then, perhaps, she had boxed his ears when he tried—eh?

On the contrary, she had borne it like a lamb. The fact was—his nerves had never quite got over the shock—but the fact was, that one fine frosty day he had persuaded Amelia, who had stepped up carefully, and taken all the precautions that her delicate health required, to leave the streets and shops which in general were the scene of their walks, and to ramble with him in the country. He good an opportunity of sealing his love upon her lips was not to be lost. The bright sunny day, the cold clear air, seemed for once to dispel the clouds of melancholy which usually hung about him like the clouds about the top of Snowdon, and to leave his brow open and free from care, like the summit of the same mountain on one of those rare occasions when it condescends to reveal itself to the eyes of the fortunate traveler. Amelia's hand was on his arm, Amelia's voice was in his ear, Amelia's crinoline rasped his legs, keeping the fact of her sweet presence constantly in his thoughts. Every thing that could gladden his heart and rouse his courage was at hand, and, upon his life! his heart was glad, and his courage roused accordingly.

"Amelia," he had exclaimed, with all his overpowering affection gleaming in his eyes, and trembling on his lips—"Amelia, this is a delicious morning!"

Amelia thought the same.

"A morning that makes all the better and nobler feelings of our nature rise to the surface, purifies the air, and kills the slugs."

Amelia quite concurred in this opinion, but pitied the slugs.

"Amelia," he continued, his courage rising still higher as he proceeded—"Amelia, I love you."

Amelia supposed he did, as he'd asked her to marry him; at least, if he didn't, it was a great shame.

If he didn't! The moment he had longed for was evidently approaching. He squeezed her hand—she returned the pressure. He put his arm round her waist—she did not repel him. He sought her to his bosom—she raised her face to his. The moment was come! He hurled away his umbrella, raised the two veils with all the impetuosity of love, and, approaching with his glowing lips upon—a respirator! yes, by all that's horrible, a respirator!

Now wasn't that enough to make a man run wildly across country, whither he knew not, nor cared to know? And was there cause for surprise, that when he came to himself he found that he was sitting alone by the side of a pond, attacking a heavy brickbat to one end of his handkerchief? But better feelings prevailed.

And was not that something like a disappointment?

Well, really! We were obliged so confess that it certainly was.

FOR US.

For us was said the parting word that drew the tender sixtage
Of life to session of pain 'twere less if they could part;
For us the dark thought "to-morrow," drew up its shadowy wings,
And settled like the fateful bird that tore Prometheus heart.

For us the look behind that brought a mist before the sight,
Like veils we spread o'er faces loved before the coffin lid closed;
For us the laying down of joy, the taking up of right,
To bear it onward like a flag through steel-set ranks of foes.

For us the weary, foot-sore march, the sentry's lonely round,
Companioned by night's ideal dreads that e'en may shake the bold;
For us the ghostly-wild alarm—the long roll's wakening sound,
And mustered, grim ranks moving off to danger's spectral hold.

For us the face to face with death that strikes the bravest terror,
The hoarse command from lips firm set to hide the fluttering heart;
The rush into the horrid storm of fire and iron hail,
Whose drops on brow and breast leave closed ranks with speed no more—

For us the frequent silence when the roll is called of comrades,
The silence falling hundred names that shall be heard no more,
And the sad look in fearless eyes that tells a comrade borne
To darkness from our lovely world amid the battle's roar.

For us the shallow trench in dug along the trampled sod,
And many forms, oh! how beloved, are hid in death's eclipse,
Their brow or yellow beards stained with the hues of blood,
And clay upon their faces pale where once were loving lips.

All, all for us; we sit and smile to see our children play,
And our still smile is golden light to soft eyes close to ours;
We wake in white enfolding arms into a blissful day;
We join the dance, we drain the wine, we sing the happy bride.

They saw the deathly battle-field, and still life's precious wine
That we may gather ripest sheaves, and grapes of purple vine.
Theirs is the curly frost, the storm that leaves a withered vine,
That ours may be the latter rains, the store-increasing dew.

Thanks, thanks, and blessings, deep and full as human heart may be,
For those who give us life's bright gold, accepting iron thus;
And prayers to wait before God's throne throughout eternity
For our brave heroes in the field who fight and die for us.

GENERAL QUINCY A. GILMORE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 587.]

APPEARANCE OF FORT SUMTER, AUGUST 23, 1863, AFTER SIX DAYS' BOMBARDMENT.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OCCASIONAL CONTRIBUTOR.—[SEE PAGE 587.]

A REMINISCENCE OF PORT HUDSON.

Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori.

I WILL lie hard in mine that ominous night
Before the battle's stormy ebb and flow,
And saw the fitful shadows of the fight
Cast their pale features o'er:

And in his eyes a sad, prophetic fear
Seemed burning out the hope of life's young dream,
As over and anon, sad far and near
We saw the vivid gleam,

And heard the thunder of replying strife,
Peal answering peal in loud, dissonant roar,
Where burst the billowy mass of shouting life
On war's wild, wintry shore.

"The morn," he said, "comes marching up the sky—
The morn whose sun shall never set on me.
Tell them, when I am gone"—and then his eye
Grew humid with the plea—

"Tell them I feared it not, but calmly went
To where the answer blew for that fair land;
Content to toil and suffer, to be spent
To this a death as grand!

"Tell her—oh tell her"—but his quavering tones
Died to a whisper, and refused the name;
While ashes of agony and pitiful moans
Shook all his bright frame.

He wrung my hand and left me. Once again,
Where death's tornado fiercest swept the field,
I saw him in the battle-brunt of his pain,
Ere yet his life was sealed.

Ere yet his writhing limbs were laid asleep,
And eyes and mouth meaningless up to the stars,
And dews of heaven fell over him, to weep
The hero's cruel scars.

Oh, pale, still face—oh, sadly mournful eyes,
Which seem to look forever in mine own,
I see ye still; and still I hear his sighs—
His last sad agonies groan.

Oh hero-spirit!—brave and patient soul!
Too true that some must fall, as then had done!
Rest, then, in peace; for thou hast reached the goal—
The victory hast won!

TERREBONE, LOUISIANA, August, 1863.

VERY HARD JASH.

BY CHARLES READE, ESQ.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXII.—(Continued.)

MRS. DORN whispered again over her girl.

"Tell her something: oh, give me tears for her—she never has one tear."

"What shall I say?" gasped Edward.

"Tell her the truth, and trust to God, whose child she is."

Edward knelt on the floor and took her hand: "My poor little Jo," he said, in a voice broken with natural emotion, "would you rather have him dead, or false to you?"

"Why false, a thousand times. It's Edward: Bless you for the face my own, own brother; tell me he is false, and not come to deadly harm."

"You shall judge for yourself," he groaned. "I am to bring him. He had left the town. The woman told me a letter came for him last night. A letter in—a female hand. The scoundrel came in from us, got this letter; packed up his things directly; paid his lodging; and went off in a two-horse fly at eight o'clock in the morning."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

At these plain proofs of Alfred's infidelity Julia's sweet throat began to swell hysterically, and then her bosom to heave and pant; and, after a piteous struggle, came a passion of sobs and tears so wild, so heart-broken, that Edward blamed himself bitterly for telling her.

But Mrs. Dodd sobbed "No, no, I would rather have her so; only leave her with me now: bless you, darling; leave us quickly."

She rocked and nursed her deserted child hours and hours; and so the miserable day crawled to its close.

Down stairs the house looked strange and gloomy: the dining-hall brightened at all, and darkened herself. The wedding breakfast and flowers remained in bitter mockery. Sarah cleared the table, and Sampson and Edward dined in moody silence.

Presently Sampson's eye fell upon the Dead: it lay on a table with a pen beside it, to sign on their return from church.

Sampson got hold of it and buried himself in the verbiage like a pearl-diver diving. He came up again with a discovery. In spite of its feebleness, verbosity, obscurity, and idiotic way of expressing itself, the Dead managed to convey to David and Mrs. Dodd a life-interest in nine thousand five hundred pounds, with reversion to Julia and children of the projected marriage. Sampson and Edward put their heads over this, and pumped them. "Why, man," said Sampson, "if the puppy had signed this it might he would be a beggar now."

"So," said Edward, "but after all he did not sign it."

"Nay, but that was your fault, not his; the law was keen sign."

"That is true: and perhaps if we had pinned him to this, last night, he would not have dared insult my sister to-day."

Sampson changed the subject by inquiring suddenly which way he was gone.

"Curse him, I don't know; and don't care. Go where he will I shall meet him again some day; and then—" Edward spoke almost in a whisper, but a certain grinding of his white teeth and flashing of his lion eyes made the incomplete sentence very expressive.

"What ninnies you young men are," said the Doctor, "I even you, that I dub 'my fathom o' good sense;' just finish your dinner, and come with me."

"No, Doctor; I'm off my food for once: if you had been up stairs and seen my poor little sister! hang the grub; it turns my stomach." And he shoved his plate away, and leaned over the back of his chair.

Sampson made him drink a glass of wine, and then they sat down to a half-finished meal and went hurriedly to Alfred's lodgings, the Doctor, though sixty, rushing along with all the fire and buoyancy of early youth.

They found the landlady surrounded by gossips curious as themselves, and longing to chatter, but no materials. The one new fact they elicited was that the vehicle was a White Lion fly, for she knew the young man by the coat in his eye. "Coming away," shouted the Doctor, unceremoniously, and in two minutes they were in the yard of the White Lion.

Sampson and the coachmaker out came a hardfeatured man with a strong squint. Sampson concluded this was his man, and said, roughly: "Where did you drive young Hardie this morning?"

He seemed rather taken aback by this abrupt question; but reflected and slapped his thigh: "Why that is the party from Mill Street."

"Yes."

"Drew him to Silverton Station, Sir; and wasn't long about it either; gent was in a hurry."

"What train did he go by?"

"Well, I don't know, Sir; I left him at the station."

"Well, then where did he take his ticket for? Where did he tell the porter he was going? Think now, and be answering, you lout."

The hostler scratched his head, and seemed at first inclined to guess for the sovereign, but at last said: "I should say he were going you, gents; ye see he paid the fly then and there, and gave me a crown: and I drov away directly."

On this they gave him a shilling, and left him. But on leaving the yard, Edward said: "Doctor, I don't like that fellow's looks: let me try the handcuff." They took in the hint and made similar inquiries. The landlord was out, the mistress knew nothing about it, but took a head out of a window and shouted over the leaves. She read out an entry to this effect:

"Pair horse fly to Silverton: take up in Mill Street at eight o'clock. Is that it, Sir?" Sampson assented; but Edward told her the hostler said it was Silverton-Station.

"No: it is Silverton in the book, Sir. Well, you see it is all one to us; the station is farther than the town, but we charge seven miles whichever 'tis."

Bradshaw, inspected then and there, sought in vain to conceal this information reached Silverton from different points between 8.50 and 9.25 A.M.

The friends retired with this scanty information: Alfred could hardly have gone to London: for there was a train up from Barkington itself at 8.30. But he might have gone to some other part of the island, or out of it for that matter. Sampson fell into a brown study.

After a long silence, which Edward was too sad to break, he said, thoughfully: "Bring science to bear on this hotch-potch. Facts are never really contradictory; they only seem to be: and the true solution is the one which reconciles all the facts: it 'squares the chronometrical theory reconciles all th' undisputed facks in midickio. So now sairch for a solution to reconcile the Dead with the puppy's leaving."

Edward searched, but could find none; and said so.

"Can't you?" said Sampson; "then I'll give you a couple. Say he is touched in the upper story, for one."

"What do you mean? mad?"

"Oh: there are degrees of Phrinzy. Here is th' inconsiency of conduct that marks a disturbance of the reasoning faculty. Here's what once knew a young fellow that played this very prank at a wedding, and the nixt thing we hard, my lord was in Bedlam."

Edward shook his head: "It is the villain's heart, not his brain."

Sampson then offered another solution, in which he owned he had more confidence:

"He has been courting some other woman first: she declined, or said, Edward Dead, when she found he had the spirit to go and marry an innocent girl, then the jade wrote to him and cajoled. Like a married man, likely. I've known women go farther for hatred of a wumman than they would for love of a man: and here was a temptation: to snap at the Dead's purse, and insult a rival, all at one blow. He meant to marry; he meant to sign that deed: ay and, at the last gasp, if he had not signed, he would have gone off at passion's call, and beggared himself. What enrages me is that we didn't let him sign it, and so nail the young rascal's money."

"Curse his money," said Edward, "and him too. Wait till I can lay my hand on him; I'll break every bone in his skin."

"And I'll help you."

In the morning, Mrs. Dodd left Julia for a few minutes expressly to ask Sampson's advice. After Alfred's conduct she was free, and fully determined, to defend herself and her daughter's reputation by any means in her power; so she now showed the doctor David's letter about the £14,000; and the empty pocket-book; and put together the disjointed evidence of Julia, Alfred, and circumstances, in one neat and luminous statement: Sampson was greatly struck with the revelation: he jumped off his chair and marched about excited; said truth was stranger than fiction, and this was a manifest swindle: then he surprised Mrs. Dodd in her turn by assuming that old Hardie was at the bottom of yesterday's business. Neither Edward nor his mother could see that, and said so: his reply was characteristic: "Of course you can't; you are Anglo-saxons; th' Anglosaxins are good at drawing distinctions; but they can't generalize. I'm a Celt, and generalize—as a duck swims. I discovered th' unity of all disease: it would be odd if I could not trace the manifoldin iniquities you suffer to their one source."

"But what is the connecting link?" asked Mrs. Dodd, still incredulous.

"Why, Richard Hardie's interest."

"Well, now," objected Edward.

"There goes th' Anglosaxin again," remonstrated Sampson: "puzzling his head over petty details; and can't see how grave men's minds thrown out by th' enemy. Put this and that together: Hardie Senior always averse to this marriage; Hardie Senior wanting to keep £14,000 of yours, if his son, who knows of the fraud, became your mother's son, the swindle would be hourly in danger (so common) of unhappy Anglosaxins; why the two things are interwoven). And so young Hardie is got out of the way: old Hardie's doing, or I'm a Dutchman."

This reasoning still appeared forced and fanciful to Edward; but it began to make some little impression on Mrs. Dodd, and encouraged her to own that her poor daughter suspected foul play.

"Well, that is possible too; whativer tempted an ass bone, tempted man will do: but more likely he has bribed Leahid to write and catch him goose by the heart. Gintlemin, I'm a bit of a phylognomist: look at old Hardie's lines; his cordage: I might say; and deeper every time I see him; I'm two eye like a hawk. There's an awful weight on that man's mind. Lookee! I'll just step over to Hardie's, and keep down to watch his game, and pump his people: asked as soon as it is safe, we'll seize the old bird, and, once he is under hatches, we will reappear like magic: th' old one will disgorge; we'll just compound the felony—been an old friend—and recover the cash."

A fine sketch; but Edward thought it desperately wild, and Mrs. Dodd preferred employing a respectable lawyer to act and obtain justice in the regular way. Sampson laughed at her; what was the use of attacking in the regular way an irregular enemy like Hardie? "Advice, ma'ams are too humdrum for such a job," said he; "they start with a civil letter putting a rogue on his guard; they proceed in a writ, and then he digs a hole in another county and buries the body; or sails t' Australia with it. Nixtime; I'm an old fellow, but insane lover of justice. —I say insane, because my passion is not returned, or the jade wouldn't keep out of my way so: but these years, ma'am, I'm a bit subjective."

"Stop a minute," said Edward; "you must not go compromising us: and we have got no money to pay Doctors' bills at present."

"I won't compromise any one of you: and my detective sha'n't cost y' a penny."

"Ah, my dear Sir," said Mrs. Dodd, "that fact is you do not know all the difficulties that beset us. Tell him, Edward. Well then, let me. The poor child has reached the gentleman's daughter, whom you propose to treat like a felon: and he is too good a son and too good a friend for that, I know. What shall I do?"

Edward colored up to the eyes: "Who told you that, mother?" he said. "Well, yes, I do love her, and I'm not ashamed of it, Doctor," said the poor fellow after a while, "I see now I am not quite the person to advise my mother and sister. My consent to leave it in your hands."

And, in pursuance of this resolution, he retired to his study.

"There's a formidable combination," said Sampson, "and I see no objections:" "An estimable young lady; but so odd; she is one of those uneasy-minded Christians that have sprung up in religious epochs, and make imaginaire, eternally feeling her own spiritual pulse—"

"I know the disorder," cried Sampson, eagerly: "the pashints have a hot fit (and then they are saints); followed in due course by the cold fit (and then they are the worst of sinners); and so on in endless rotation: and, if they could only realize my great discovery, the periodicity of all diseases, and of their admixtures, they would find the hot fit and the cold return chronometrically, at intervals as regular as the tides: ebb and flow: and that it has nothing to do with either febrile symptom. Why Religion, apart from intermittent Fever of the Brain, is just the most intermittent thing in all the world."

"Ah, you are too deep for me, my good friend. All I know is that she is one of this new school, whom I take the liberty to call 'Free Prayers' Dissenters.' They are not let their poor souls alone a minute; and they pester one day and night with the millennium; as if we shall not all be there in good time: but the worst is they apply the language of earthly passion to the Saviour of mankind, and make ours such creeping and fawning flatterers, as seems, so familiar; like that rude multitude which thronged and pressed Him when on earth. But, after all, she came to the Church, and took my Julia's part; so that shows she has principle, and do pray spare me her feelings in any step you take against that dishonorable person her father: I must go back to his victim, my poor, poor child: I dare not leave her long. Oh, Doctor, such a night! and, if she does for a minute, it is to wake with a scream and tell me she sees him dead: sometimes he is drowned; sometimes stained with blood; but always dead."

This evening Mr. Hardie came along in a fly with his luggage on the box, returning to Musgrove Cottage as from Yorkshire: in passing Albion Villa he cast it a look of vindictive triumph. He got home and nodded by the fire in his character of a man wearied by a long journey. Jane made him some tea, and told him how Alfred had disappeared on his wedding-day.

"The young scamp," said he: he added, coolly, "it is no business of mine: I had no hand in making the match, thank Heaven!" In the conversation that ensued he said he had always been averse to the marriage, but had set irreconcilably as to approve this open breach of faith with a respectable young lady: "this will recoil upon our name, you know, at this critical time," said he.

Then Jane mustered courage to confess that she had gone to the wedding herself. "Dear papa," said she, "it was made clear to me that the Dedds are acting in what they consider a most friendly way to you, Jenny." "I care not tell you what they think. But, if mistaken, they are sincere: and so, after prayer, and you not being here for me to consult, I did go to the church. Forgive me, papa: I have but one brother; and she is my dear friend."

Mr. Hardie's countenance fell at this announcement, and he looked almost diabolical. But on second thought he cleared up wonderfully: "I will be frank with you, Jenny: if the wedding had come off, I should have been deeply hurt at your supporting that little mountain of ingratitude: he not only marries against his father's will (that is done every day) but slanders and maligns him unlikely in his heart of poverty and distress. But, now that he has broken faith and insulted Miss Dodd as well as me, I declare I am glad matters there, Jenny. I will separate us from his abominable conduct. But what does he say for himself? What reason does he give?"

"Oh, it is all mystery as yet."

"Well, but he must have sent some explanation to the Deddy."

"He may have: I don't know. I have not ventured to intrude on my poor insulted friend. Papa, I hear she addresses it to Mary, if writing for her reason. Oh, if harm comes to her, God will assuredly punish him whose heartlessness and treachery has brought her to this pass in my words," she continued with great emotion, "this cruel act will not go unpunished even in this world."

"There, there, change the subject," said Mr. Hardie, peevishly. "What have I to do with his prate? he has dishonored me by his flight, and I disown him for my son."

The next day Peggy Black called, and asked to see master. Mr. Hardie, after the first surprise, looked at her from head to foot, and foot to head, as if measuring her for a suit of Disdain; and then he said she carry her own message; then flounced into the kitchen, and left her to shut the street-door, which she did. She went and dropped her curtsey at the parlor-door, and in a miming-pinny voice said she was come to make her submission, and beg leave to forgive her, and give her another trial? Her penitence, after one or two convulsive efforts, ended in a very fair flow of tears.

Mr. Hardie shrugged his shoulders and asked Jane if the girl had ever been saucy to her.

"Oh no, papa: indeed I have no fault to find with poor Peggy."

"Well, then, go to your work, and try and not offend Betty; remember she is older than you."

Peggy went for her box and bandbox, and entertained herself quietly, and all old Betty's endeavors to irritate her only elicited a calm cunning smile, with a depression of her downy eyelashes.

Albion Villa.

Next morning Edward Dodd was woke out of a sound sleep by a violent shock, by a hand upon his shoulder: he locked up and rubbed his eyes; it was Julia standing by his bedside, dressed and in her bonnet. "Edward," she said, in a hurried whisper, "there is foul play: I can not sleep, I can not be idle. He has been decoyed away, or perhaps murdered. Oh, pray, get up and go to the Police office or somewhere with me."

"Very well; but wait till morning."

"No; now; now; now!" I shall never go out of doors again in the daylight. I shall be crazy with wait, wait, wait, wait, waiting."

Her hand was like fire on him, and her eyes supernaturally bright.

"There," said Edward, with a groan, "go down stairs, and I will be with you directly."

He came down: they went out together: her little burning hand pinched his tight, and her words fell loosened securely to each other; and she kept him at his full stride till they got to the central police station. There, at the very thought of which she had been in transport, and suddenly shrank together, and covered her blushing face with her hot hands. She sent him in alone. He found an intelligent superintendent, who attended into the case with all the coolness of an old official hand.

Julia came out to his sister and, as he hurried her home, told her what had passed: "The superintendent asked to see the letter; I told him he had taken it with him: that was a pity, he said. Then he made me describe Alfred to a nicety: and the description will go up to London this morning, and all over Barkington, and the neighborood, and the county."

She stopped to kiss him, then went on again with her head down, and neither spoke till they were nearly home: then Edward told her "He superintendent felt quite sure that the villain was not dead; nor in danger of it."

"Oh, bless him! bless him! for saying so."

"And that he will turn up in London before very long; not in this neighborhood; he says he must have known the writer of the letter, and his taking his luggage with him shows he has gone off deliberately. My poor little Jo, now do try and look at it as he does, and every body else does; try and see it as you would if you were a by-stander."

She laid her soft hand on his shoulder as if to support herself floating in her sea of doubt: "I do see I am a poor credulous girl; but how can my Alfred be false to me? Am I to doubt the Bible? am I to doubt the sun? Is nothing true in heaven or earth? Oh, if I could only have died as I was dressing for church—died while he seemed true! He is true; the wicked creature has cast no spell on him: he has gone in a moment of delirium; he will regret what he has done, perhaps regrets it now. I am ungrateful to you, Edward, and to the good policeman, for saying he is not dead. What more do I require? he is dead to me. Edward, let us leave this place. We were going: let us go to-day; this very day; oh, take me and hide me where no one that knows me can ever see me again." A flood of tears came to her relief; and she went along sobbing and kissing her brother's hand every now and then.

But, as they drew near the gate of Albion Villa, twilight began to usher in the dawn. Julia shuddered at even that faint light, and fled like a guilty thing, and hid herself sobbing in her own bedroom.

Musgrove Cottage.

Mr. Richard Hardie slept better, since his return from Yorkshire, than he had done for some time past, and therefore woke more refreshed and in better spirits. He knew an honest family was miserable a few doors off; but he did not care. He got up and shaved with a most placid ease. Only, when he had removed the lather from one half his face, he happened to look out of window, and saw on the wall opposite—a placard: a large placard to this effect:

"ONE HUNDRED GUINEAS REWARD!

Whereas on the 11th instant Mr. Alfred Hardie disappeared mysteriously from his lodgings in 15 Mill Street under circumstances suggesting a suspicion of foul play, know all men that the above reward will be paid to any person or persons who shall inform the undersigned where the said Alfred Hardie is to be found, and what person or persons, if any, have been concerned in his disappearance.

ALEXANDER SAMPSON
39 Pope Street
Napoleon Square
London."

At sight of this, Mr. Hardie was seized with a tremor that suspended the razor in mid air: he opened the window, and glared at the doctor's notice.

At this moment he himself was a picture: not unlike those half-cleaned portraits the picture-restorers hang out as specimens of their art.

"Accident interfering fool," he muttered, and began to walk the room in agitation. After a while he made a strong effort, shaved the other half, and dressed slowly, thinking hard all the time. The result was, he went out before breakfast (which he had not done for years) and visited the "White Lion." One of Sampson's posters had just been stuck up near the inn; he quietly pulled it down and then entered the yard; and had a serious talk with the squinting hostler.

On his return, Jane was waiting breakfast. The first word to him was: "Papa, have you seen?"

"What, the Reward?" said he, indifferently. "Yes, I noticed it at our door as I came home."

Jane said it was a very improper and most indelicate interference in their affairs. And went on to say which heightened color: "I have just told Peggy to take it down."

"Not for the world!" cried Mr. Hardie, losing all his placidness real or feigned; and flinging the belt hastily. On Peggy's appearing, he said, anxiously, "I do not wish that Notice interfered with, Peggy."

"I shouldn't think of touching it without your orders, Sir," said she, quietly, and shot him a feline glance from under her pale lashes.

Jane colored, and looked a little mortified: but on Peggy's retiring Mr. Hardie explained that, whether malicious or not, it was a foolish act of Dr. Sampson's; and to pull down his notice would look like siding with the boy against those he had injured: "Besides," said he, "you should you and I bark inquiry? Ill as he has used me, I am his father, and not altogether without anxiety. Suppose those doctors should be right about him, you know?"

Jane said for some time past longing to call at Albion Villa and sympathize with her friend; and now curiosity was superadded; she burned to know whether the Dodds knew of, or approved this placard. She asked her father whether he thought she could go there with propriety. "Why not?" said he, cheerfully, and with assumed carelessness.

In reality it was essential to him that Jane should visit the Dodds. Surrounded by pitfalls, threatened with a new and mysterious assistant in the executrix, but keen and resolute Sampson, this artful man, who had now been very Machiavel—constant danger and deceit had so sharpened and deepened his great natural abilities—was preparing among other defenses a shield; and that shield was a sieve; and that sieve was his daughter. In fact, ever since his return, he had acted and spoken at the Dodds through Jane, but with a masterly appearance of simplicity and more confidential inborcourse. At least I think this is the true clew to all his recent remarks.

Jane, a truthful, unsuspicious girl, was all the fitter instrument of the cunning monster. She went and called at Albion Villa, and was received by Edward, Mrs. Dodd being up stairs with Julia, and in five minutes she had told him what her father, she owned, had said to her in confidence. "But," said she, "the reason I repeat these things is to make peace, and that you may not fancy there is any one in our house so cruel, so unchristian, as to approve Alfred's perfidy. Oh, and papa said candidly he disliked his match, but then he admired this way of ending it far more."

Mrs. Dodd came down in due course, and kissed her; but told her Julia could not see even her at present. "I think, dear," said she, "in a day or two she will see nobody but no one else: and for her sake we shall now hurry our departure from this place, where she was once so happy."

Mrs. Dodd did not like to begin about Alfred; but Jane had no such scruples: she inveighed warmly against his cruelty and deceit. He left the house, had quite done away with the faint suspicion Sampson had engendered, and brought back Mrs. Dodd and Edward to their former original opinion, that the elder Hardie had nothing on earth to do with the perfidy of the younger.

Just before dinner a gentleman called on Edward, and proved to be a policeman in plain clothes. He had come from the office to sound the hostler at the "White Lion," and, if necessary, to threaten him. The police knew, through nobody in Barbican, that this hostler had been in what rogues call trouble twice, and, as the police can starve a man of the kind by blowing on him, and can relieve him by keeping dark, he knows better than withhold information from them.

However, on looking for this hostler, he had left his place that very morning; had decamped with mysterious suddenness.

Here a puzzle.

Had the man gone without noticing the reward? Had somebody got the reward? or was it a strange coincidence, and did he after all know nothing?

The police thought it was no coincidence, and he did know something; so they had telegraphed the London office to mark him down.

Edward thanked his informer; but, on his returning, told his mother he could make neither head nor tail of it; and she only said, "We must circumspect."

Meantime, unknown to these bewildered ones, Greek was meeting Greek only a few yards off.

Mr. Hardie was being entertained to tea—a man of his own ca ibre, one too cautious to communicate with the Dodds, or any one else, till his work looked ripe.

The game began thus: a decent mechanic, who lodged hard by, lounging with his pipe near the gate of Musgrove Cottage, offered to converse with old Betty: she gave him a rough answer; but with a touch of incredulable vanity must ask Peggy if the gentleman had spoken, because there was a hungry one at the gate: "Why he wanted to begin on an old woman like me." Peggy answered that he had said to her.

"Oh, he begun where most of them ends, if they get so far at all: axed me was I comfortable here: if not, he knew a young man wanted a nice lady to look after his house for him."

Peggy pricked up her ears; and, in less than a quarter of an hour, went for a box of lucifers in a new bonnet and shawl. She had stripped past the able mechanic very accidentally, and he bestowed an admiring smile on her, but said nothing, only smoked. However, of her return he contrived to detain her, and paid her a good many compliments, which she took laughingly and with no great appearance of offense then. However, there is no going by that: compliments sink: and within forty-eight hours the able mechanic had made a deep impression of Peggy Black, always on the look-out for her day and night, and telling her all about the lump of money he had saved, and the nice little double his income, if he had but a counter, and tidy wife behind it. Peggy gossiped in turn, and let out among the rest that she had been turned off once, just for answering a little sharply; and now it was the other way: her master was a trifle too civil at times.

"Who could help it?" said the able mechanic, rapturously; and offered a pressing civility; which Peggy took.

"Not so free, young man," said she. "Kissing is the prologue to sin."

"How do you know that?" inquired the able mechanic, with the sly humor of his class.

"It is a saying," replied Peggy, demurely.

At last, one night, Mr. Green, the Detective, for he it was, put his arm round his new sweetheart's waist, and, whispering, kissed somewhere his heart. He told her he had just found out there was money enough to be made in one day to set them up for life in a nice little shop; and she could help in it.

After this inviting preamble he crept toward 414 Old Street, and questioned a servant of Alfred that there had been high words between Master and Mr. Alfred about that very sum; she had listened at the door, and heard. Taking care to combine close courtship with cunning interrogatories, he was soon guabled to write to Dr. Sampson, and to tell the servant of Mr. Hardie's was down on him, and reported that he carried a large pocket-book in his breast-pocket by day; and she had found the dent of it under his pillow at night; a stroke of observation very creditable in an unprofessional female; on this he had made it his business to meet Mr. Hardie in broad day, and sure enough the pocket-book was always there. He added that the said Hardie's face wore an expression, which he had seen more than once when respectable parties went in for felony: and altogether thought they might now take out a warrant and proceed in the regular way.

Sampson received this news with great satisfaction: but was crippled by the interwoven relations of the parties.

To arrest Mr. Hardie on a warrant would entail a prosecution for felony, and separate Jane and Edward forever.

He telegraphed Green to meet him at the station; and reached Barkington at eight that very evening. Green and he proceeded to Albion Villa, and there they held a long and earnest consultation with Edward; and at last, on certain conditions, Mr. Green and Edward consented to act on Sampson's plan. Green, by this time, knew that Mr. Hardie's out-of-door habits, and assured them that at ten o'clock he would walk up and down the road for at least half an hour, the whole of which time he expected at a quarter to ten when Mrs. Dodd came down and proposed supper to the travelers. Sampson declined it for himself; and said they had work to do at eleven. Then, making the others a signal not to disclose any thing at present, he drew her aside and asked after Julia.

Mrs. Dodd sighed:—"She goes from one thing to another, but always returns to one idea —that he is a victim, not a traitor."

"Well, tell her in one hour the money shall be in the house."

"The money! What does she care?"

"Well, say we shall know all about Alfred by eleven o'clock."

"My dear friend, be prudent," said Mrs. Dodd. "I feel alarmed; you were speaking almost in a whisper when I came in."

"I am very observant: but donat be uneasy; we are three to one. Just go and comfort Miss Julia, and leave the rest to me."

"Ah, that I will," she said.

She was no sooner gone than they all stole out into the yard, a pitch-dark night it was; but Green had a powerful dark lantern to use if necessary.

They waited. Green at the gate of Musgrove Cottage, the other two a little way up the road.

Ten o'clock struck. Some minutes passed without the slightest sound from Green; and Edward and Sampson began to shiver. For it was very cold and dark, and in the next place they were beginning to take to the law into their own hands, and the law sometimes calls that breaking the law. "Confound him!" muttered Sampson: "he does not soon come I shall run away. It is bitterly cold."

Presently footsteps were heard approaching; but no signal from Green. It was only a fellow in a smock frock rolling home from the public house.

Just as his footsteps died away a low hoot like a plaintive owl was heard, and they knew their game was afoot.

Presently, tramp, tramp, came the slow and stately walk of a man who is lost in thought.

He came very slowly, like one lost in meditation: and these amateur policemen's hearts beat louder and louder as the sound came nearer and nearer.

At last in the blackness of the night a shadowy outline was visible: another tramp or two, it was upon them.

Now the cautious Mr. Green had stipulated that their prisoner must be shut in the box, and if not there the matter should go no further. So Edward made a stumble and fell against Mr. Hardie and felt his left breast: the pocket-book was there. "Yes," he whispered: and Mr. Hardie, in the act of remonstrating at his clumsiness, was pinioned from behind, and stripped with wonderful rapidity and dexterity. Then first he seemed to awake to his danger, and uttered a stentorian shout, that rang through the night and made two of his three captors tremble.

"Cut that," said Green, sternly, "or you'll get into trouble."

Mr. Hardie lowered his voice directly. "Do not kill me, for God's sake," he murmured. "I'm but a poor man now. Take my little money; it is in my waistcoat pocket; but spare my life. Oh, spare my life, spare!"

"Come, stash your gab, my lad," said Green, contemptuously, addressing him just as he would any other of his class, and proceeding to capture. "It's not your stiff that is wanted, but Captain Dodd's."

"Captain Dodd's?" cried the prisoner, with a wonderful assumption of innocence.

"Ay, the pocket-book," said Green: "here, this! this!" and he clutched on the pocket-book, and instantly the prisoner uttered a cry of agony, and sprang into the struggle with an agility no one would have thought possible; but Edward and Green soon caught him, and the Doctor joining, they held him, and Green his coat open.

The pocket-book was not there. He tore open his waistcoat; it was not in the waistcoat: but it was sewed slightly to his very shirt on the outside.

Green wrenched it away, and bidding the other two go behind the prisoner and look over his shoulder, unseen themselves, slipped the shade of his lantern.

Mr. Hardie had now ceased to struggle and to exclaim; he stood sullen, mute, desperate; while an agitated face peered eagerly over each of his shoulders at the open pocket-book in Green's hands, on which the lantern now poured a narrow but vivid stream of light.

THE SIBLEY EXPEDITION.

A CORRESPONDENT who writes from "Camp in Dacotah, August 15," furnishes us with sketches of events in General Sibley's Expedition against the Sioux. He says, "The sketch of the MEAGHER or LIEUTENANT BENTEEN is a truthful one, so far as could be gathered from the examination of those who visited the scene immediately after." He was a wealthy Englishman, who had served through the Crimean campaigns, and finally came to this country in search of adventures. He was about thirty years old. He left behind him in New York a fine yacht in which he had once sailed on a pleasure trip to the West Indies. Being on General Sibley's staff, he had been sent with a dispatch to Colonel Crooks, who was skirmishing with the Indians. He fell into an ambush and was murdered. One side of his face was hacked off with a hatchet while he was still alive.——The illustrations on page 589 represent two incidents in the history of this Expedition. The first shows the TRAIN CROSSING THE JAMES RIVER on the 20th of July. The locality is about 600 miles west of St. Paul, and 100 east of the Missouri, which was the destination of the Expedition. Up to this time the Indians had kept out of sight. But two days after they were massed to the number of 4000 in front of the Expedition. The James River is nearly at this point as ink, and the crossing of it by four hundred wagons occupied nearly four hours. There is but one ford known to Dacotah Territory—Big Cheyenne. The Expedition, on its return a fortnight after, crossed the river at a different point.——The second illustration represents the BATTLE OF BIG WOODS, on the 24th of July. The savages, on being attacked, retreated from hill to hill of the Coteau du Missouri, and were finally pursued into a valley where they had recently been encamped. The entire train of the fugitives at last came in sight, and good work was done upon them by our shell and shot. Had not General Sibley's forces been exhausted by a long day's march, by the subsequent fight and pursuit, the whole Sioux force might have been captured. As it was, they succeeded in escaping across the Missouri, which was not fordable by our train. The illustration shows the savages fleeing in confusion between the lakes, with Sibley and his staff upon a hill in the fore-ground.

CHATTANOOGA.

ON page 581 is a view of CHATTANOOGA, from the north side of the Tennessee River. "Chattanooga," says our artist, "is one of the strong points of the Confederacy. It lies in a valley which has the Tennessee and the Cumberland Mountains in its front. Here, as I write, are Bragg's headquarters, the army being encamped within ten miles. The pontoon-bridge, lately at Kelly's Ferry, has been brought up, and thrown over the river, which is by no means fordable. Lookout Mountain, two and a half miles from the town, is on the right bank. All these features appear in the sketch. The place was formerly one of resort for Southerners. The climate is very pleasant, and the country is abundantly supplied with fine springs."

GENERAL Q. A. GILMORE.

ON page 584 we give a new portrait of GENERAL GILMORE, the commander who has so ably besieged Charleston, whose demolition of Fort Sumter, at a distance from his batteries of from 3330, to 4500 yards (say 2 to 2½ miles) and the fire he has rained upon Charleston from a distance of 5 or 6 miles, have inaugurated a new feature in war. Had Gilmore, with his present artillery, been in command before Sebastopol the Russian strong-hold would have been demolished in a week. We hope soon to be able to add to the brief biographical sketch in our number for August 15 further details of the General, whom we may now safely set down as the foremost military engineer in history. For capacities Charleston, he will have achieved the greatest work of the age, if not accomplished. Should he fail, he has already revolutionized the whole system of defensive warfare.

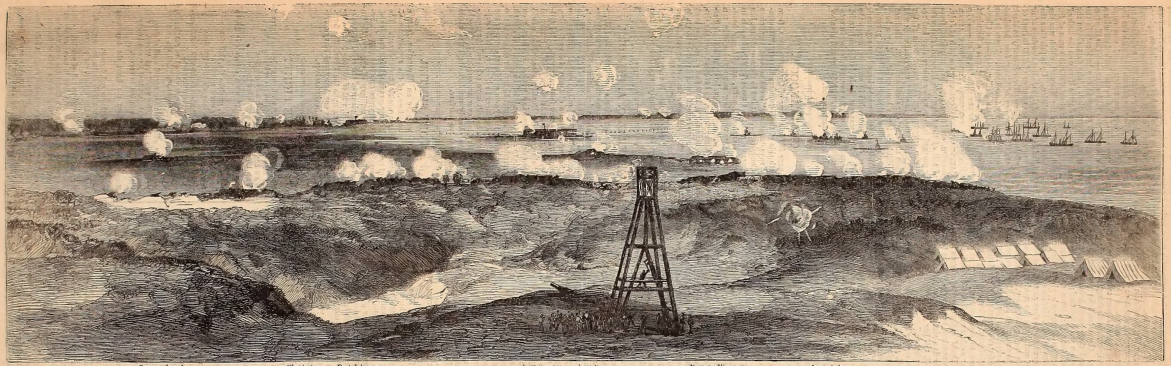
FORT SUMTER.

ON page 585 we give an illustration, from a sketch by a correspondent, of the appearance of FORT SUMTER after a week's bombardment. The mass of ruins which appears is all that remains of a fortress which three years ago was deemed impregnable to all the artillery of the world.—On pages 588 and 589 are views of the rebel intrenchments on James Island, and of various scenes connected with the attack upon the Charleston forts. These are furnished by our Army and Navy correspondents; they explain themselves.

"MORE LIGHT!"

"More light! more light!" when sunset hues are steeping
All heaven and earth in waves of living light,
And Silence, o'er creation calmly creeping,
With dark'ning shadows veils the parting sight.

"More light! more light!" when dawn's soft golden tresses
Blows through the sky, proclaim the vigil o'er,
And rory, to the saphyr's sweet caresses,
Unbars the portals heaven's hosts adore.

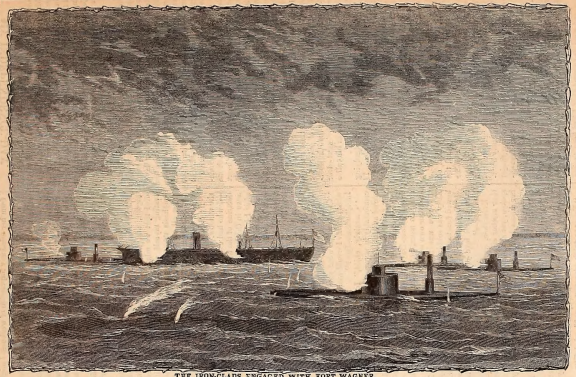


"More light! more light!" when doubt, with iron fingers,
Has fastened on the ardent living soul,
And sin, with cruel hands, has bound its love yet lingers,
And point the way, that faith may find the goal.

"More light!" when, from the rugged road of duty,
The tempter with his lure would lead astray,
"More light!" is up to us the mark of joy and beauty
From promises which wile but to betray.

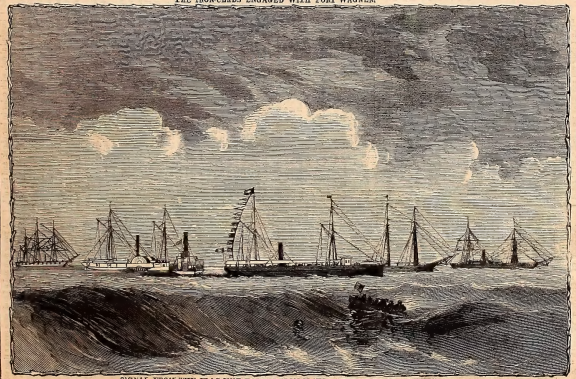
"More light!" when from the heart the hope most cherished
Goes out in deepest darkness and despair,
"More light!" to live when life's dream has perished,
And heaven seems to close against our prayer.

"More light!" upon the page so full of woe it,
Which God's great gracious love to man so gives;
That through the veil which Christ has rent asunder
The light may stream to show the path to heaven.



"More light!" for dying eyes when sunlight fails them,
And all creation quivers to the sight.
"More light!"—O God! Thy light alone avails them,
And Thou will give it, for Thou art the Light.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER—THE FLEET ENGAGING BATTERIES WAGNER AND GREGG.—[SEE PAGE 587.]



REBEL INTRENCHMENTS ON JAMES ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.—SKETCHED BY MR. J. F. HOFFMAN.—[SEE PAGE 587.]

THE IRON-CLADS ENGAGED WITH FORT WAGNER.

MAN-OF-WAR BOATS ON PICKET BELOW FORT SUMTER.

SIGNAL FROM THE FLAG-SHIP TO THE IRON-CLADS: "PREPARE FOR ACTION."

AMBULANCE TRAIN COMING FROM THE TRENCHES WITH WOUNDED.

THE CAMPAIGN IN CHARLESTON HARBOR.—From Sketches by an Occasional Correspondent.—[See Page 587.]

MY INDEPENDENCE-DAY.

THE 4th of July, 1863, with all the hallowed associations of the past and its promise in the throbbing present, has passed away; but it came to me so freighted with the memory of an eventful day in my life that I can not sail smoothly on with old Tempus without first unburdening myself. Trusting that now and then some fretted traveler at the journeys on may be tempted to pop into and prof-It by my budget, I cast it upon the highway.

I had been dining out. The meats served on the occasion were good, the wines superb, the speeches brilliant, and, better than all, my own unpremeditated remarks, which, by a singular coincidence, had haunted me for the past four days, had been received with decided éclat. It was on the night of the 3d of July, 185-. The shop-windows were gorgeous with their display of fire-works, and under the peculiar flicker and multiplication of the gas-lights the rockets and pin-wheels seemed to be having a preliminary frolic on their own account.

On the whole, I felt peculiarly happy and amiable. A bright-eyed, rosy beggar-child asked me for sixpence—she was starving, she said. My heart was touched, and I threw her a small handful of silver. Three young gentlemen came swaying arm in arm down the side-walk, jostling the child roughly. At any other time I might have been indignant; but now, were they not men and brothers? I forced a cordial smile, and at the same time felt confident, with dignity, and stepped off the curb-stone to allow them to pass. At last I reached my own door. The lock was out of order, and my key would not turn it. I rang, first the doorknob, then the bell, violently. My next-door neighbor, Mr. Green, came to the door in his calico wrapper.

"Ah, Mister Green," I exclaimed, steadying the tottering door-post, "delighted t'see you. Is my—my wife in?"

Mr. Green said me somewhat roughly by the arm, thereby seriously inconveniencing me (as he pitched about considerably), and led me to a neighboring door.

"Where is your night-key, Mr. F——?" he asked, gruffly.

There were about six pockets in my vest on that occasion; but after a while I discovered the right one, and produced the key, with a polite bow.

The next instant I found myself inside, the door closed, and the only visible link between myself and the second story, swinging violently backward and forward in the shape of a dying gas-jet suspended from the ceiling. My effort to resuscitate the spark resulted in total darkness.

After groping about for a while I found the stairway, and, clutching the baluster, commenced to ascend. This was attended with no small difficulty that I was induced to bring the full force of my reasoning powers to bear upon the subject, and soon came to the conclusion that I had been trying to mount the bat-rack. Abandoning the enterprise, with a smile of superiority over my weaker self, I proceeded in my search, and finally planted my foot firmly upon the lowest step. Alas! step number two convinced me of my error, and our Tommy's new velocipede toppled over with a crash, casting me prostrate beside it. Then I saw a flash of light, and soon, approaching nearer and nearer (as though let down by a rope from the upper regions), the white-robed, graceful form of my eldest daughter, Kitty. Rising and offering her my arm we ascended the stairs together. As she left me at the room-door I turned and solemnly gave her my paternal blessing. She was visibly affected, even bursting into tears and exclaiming, "Oh, father!" as she hurried away.

The next morning I found myself on the spare-room bed with all my clothes on, except my cravat and one boot. The cravat was on the hearth and the boot was on the mantle-piece. Guns were booming, fire-crackers were snapping, the din of powder and merry voices of children filled the air. I could hear my own youngsters shouting out lustily in the garden, and in the hall the "first bell" was tinging its summons through the house.

It was the 4th of July sure enough, and I, as head of the family, must present myself in suitable array at the breakfast-table and inaugurate the jollities of the day. I seized the boot in one hand and the cravat in the other, and proceeded meekly to the apartment generally used in common by Mrs. F—— and myself.

"Ah! Mrs. F——," said I, bowing rather sheepishly in my attempt to pass the affair off as a joke, "Good-morning, ma'am!"

"Good-morning, John," replied my wife, quietly, not a shade of coolness in her tone. "I must go down and watch the children or they may do some mischief with their pistols and fire-crackers; but come to breakfast as soon as you can."

With these words she left the room. I was almost sorry that she didn't scold or "go on" a little concerning my spree. This sad, gentle way of speaking made me uncomfortable, cough and strut about the room as I would, for I knew well enough the pain and disgust gnawing at her heart, and that during the past year I had given her too frequent cause for the reproaches that never came, though I was prepared to receive them, after each offense.

Cold water, however, and clean clothes braced me up somewhat, and soon after the "second bell" rang I strode majestically through the halls, severe in my dignity as head of the household. Reaching the basement door, I paused a moment, half-dreading to meet the rows of young faces on either side of the table, and my wife's sweet, pale countenance beaming so quietly over them all. This momentary weakness over, with a pompous "ahem!" I mustered the requisite manner and entered.

There was no one at the table, and only Kitty was in the room—Kitty, my usually joyous girl, now standing in a pensive attitude by the window.

It was important that my children should respect me, and I felt, of course, anxious to obliterate from her mind any impression of weakness I might have given her the previous night.

"This is a glorious day, Kitty!" I exclaimed, expansively—"a glorious day, my child; the day on which we as a nation declared ourselves independent. To-day we must all be jubilant, victorious! We must not mope in the house—we must ride or sail somewhere in a grand family excursion, and breathe the sunshine and the glorious air of Freedom, eh?"

Kitty did not even turn her head; but I continued to speak, as I strode up and down the apartment.

"Do you not enter into the spirit of the day, child? Read your history—read of George Washington, and the glorious men who suffered and died that we might be free—FREE!" I repeated, seating myself, and bringing my fist down with emphasis upon the arm of the chair. "Yes, we must all celebrate this day; and now, Kitty, do not be afraid, tell me where you would like to go, or how we shall best enjoy it."

By this time Kitty's face seemed fairly glued to the window. I was seriously displeased, insulted! —I who had ever enforced filial respect as the first doctrine of the household, and here was open defiance in the least-expected quarter; and that, too, after I had unbent myself to an unusual degree.

"Katharine I" exclaimed, in a terrible voice, sturdily thrusting back unpleasant memories of the past night, "what do you mean by this conduct?"

She turned; her lips were white and her eyes swimming with tears. In a moment she was beside me, her hand upon my shoulder.

"Father," said she, looking me full in the face, "do you mean what you say when you ask me in what manner I would wish to celebrate this glorious Independence-Day?"

"Certainly, child," I answered, turning uncomfortably in my seat and striving to look patriarchal and indifferent.

"Then, father, dear father," cried Kitty, winding her arms about my neck, "make this truly an Independence-Day for yourself, for us all. Be a slave no more, but be FREE in the sight of God and your own soul!"

Where was all my paternal dignity now? Kitty was sobbing upon my bosom; and from my bowed face tears were falling upon her golden hair.

"Do, father, do," she pleaded. "It is not too late, we all love you yet; and mother's heart is breaking—"

Even then, as I strained Kitty to my bosom, that mother entered the room. Not a word was spoken, yet she understood all, and cast herself on her knees beside me, looking earnestly into my eyes.

"John," said she, "I have never reproached you—will you promise me?"

"Yes!" I cried, folding my darlings to my heart in a close embrace—"I before God, and to you my wife and child, I promise what you wish!"

"Never to drink wine any more?" cried Kitty, holding my face between her hands, a joyous light sparkling through her tears.

"Never?" echoed my wife, clasping my hands in hers.

"Never!" I answered. "With God's help, I will never taste wine nor strong liquor of any kind again. From this hour I shall be free! Oh, Mary, can you ever forgive me for the past?"

She did not reply, but she leaned and kissed me in a way that made my resolution iron.

Just then the children—dear, unconscious little ones!—bounded into the room.

"Hurrah, father!" they shouted. "Hurrah for the Fourth of July! Hi! Ain't we having grand fun though?"

"Hurrah!" I responded, huskily, kissing each of the dear little creatures in turn. "And now let us hasten to our breakfast, for we must have a jolly time to-day!"

"Indeed we shall!" laughed my wife, as she bustled about, with color in her cheek, and the old, girlish light kindling in her eye; "indeed we shall. Why, John, I never felt so happy in my life!"

All this happened some years ago. Time has done many queer things in our family since then. He has put the baby into pantaloons; carried our oldest boy to college; married Kitty to a thriving young lawyer; woven little silvery threads in Mary's hair and mine; and, better than all, has never brought us one unhappy anniversary of my blessed Independence-Day!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

[ADVERTISEMENT.]

WANTED.—A Traveling Companion, to be in perpetual good spirits, and warranted to defray all the expenses of the longest journey. The Advertiser proposes adopting the plans of Tours, suggested by the Hour, Where, and Where Guide. The Companion must be amiable, only five feet four in height, and physically weak in case of a quarrel. The Advertiser is fond of Change, and the Companion therefore must have plenty of it in his pockets.

The following is from an officer in the Mississippi fleet: After the hard-fought actions of Fort Henry and Donelson, the fleet were lying at Cairo. The prisoners were passing the fleet, and among them was a contraband, in a red woven of one yard of material, "I doesn't like fat cooshe shook his head, and remarked, "I doesn't like fat cooshe but I'll take the cum along and throwed dem rotten shell in here we couldn't eat it no longer; dem meats run, and after dat I laff hard."

Just previous to the battle I had filled my shells with an incendiary mixture of my own invention, which had not the most agreeable smell, and hence the old darkey's remark. I used the same shell on my attack and destruction of the Arkansas.

YOUTHFUL SWELL. "Now, Charley, you're just in time for breakfast—have a cup of coffee?"

LAGGARD SWELL. "Thanks, no! I assure yah—my de-ar fwiend, I'll wave time to take a cup of coffee in the morning it would keep me awake all day."

Wanted, by an attorney, a clerk to engross other people's business.

"DAILY EVENING MAIL"—a lover calling on his sweetheart.

An inventive Yankee has produced an apparatus which he says is a cure for snoring. He fastens upon the nose a gutta-percha tube leading to the tympanum of the ear. Whenever the snorer commences his disagreeable performance, finds how disagreeable it is, and, of course, reforms.

English milliners have sometimes as much esprit as their French sisters. "I remember," says Lord Eldon, "I was coming one day from the queen's drawing-room in my full dress as king's counsel (Lord Clarendon, then Mr. Villiers, was also there), when we came into the room where the milliners were collected to see the fashions. 'Why, Villiers,' said I, 'I think that all the prettiest women are here.' 'Ove of the girls—and a most amazingly beautiful creature she was—looked up and said to another, 'I am sure that gentleman is a judge.'"

"Remember, madam, that you are the weaker vessel," said an irate husband. "Exactly," said the lady, "but do not you forget that the weaker vessel may have the stronger spirit in it."

"Can I show you any thing more to-day, Sir?" asked the civil gentleman behind the counter. "Yes, Sir," was the reply: "will you be good enough to show me the silk umbrella I left here a week ago?"

Quilp, having spoken rather disparagingly of the female sex in the hearing of a lady friend, was rebuked for his impertinence by the question, "What would be the effect upon the men if all the 'little dears' should perish?" "Ah," said Quilp, "I acknowledge that the result would be a universal stag-nation."

A young lady, when invited to partake of the pudding, replied, "No, many thanks, my fear madam. By no manner of means. I have already indulged the clamorous calls of a craving appetite, with a manful sense of internal fullness admonishes my stay; my deficiency is entirety and sufficiently satisfied."

Why are not two slender persons ever become great accumulators?—Because they will always be slight acquaintances.

The following bill, rendered by a carpenter to a farmer for whom he had worked, seems at least curious—"To hanging two barn-doors and myself seven hours, six shillings."

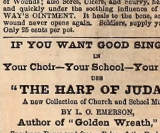
DADDY STUCKS.—"Oh dear, dear, when will this terrible attack be over? I'm nearly finished."
DADDY WALDER.—"Ah! I fear there's no cure for us but a warm application of the stars and stripes yonder."

A young man and a female once upon a time stopped at a country tavern. Their awkward appearance excited the attention of one of the family, who commenced a conversation with the female by inquiring how far she had traveled that day? "Traveled?" exclaimed the stranger, somewhat indignantly; "we didn't travel; we run!"

If a young lady faints when you "propose to her," you can restore her to consciousness by just whispering in her ear you were only joking.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

50,000 Agents Wanted.



One Agent wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, with a Circular giving full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Fob, or Guard Chain, or an Engraved Spring Locket, or a Seal Stone, Calculation Diamond, or Charm Ring, or a fine Gold California Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Pencil, and the next Camp Directory of NOLEY-WAY'S CONTENT. It heals to the bone, so that the Wound never opens again. Soldiers, supply yourselves. Only 75 cents per pot.

IF YOU WANT GOOD SINGING IN Your Choir—Your School—Your Home, USE
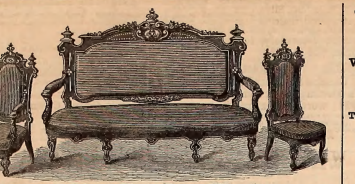
"THE HARP OF JUDAH."
A new Collection of Church and School Music.
By L. O. EMERSON,
Author of Golden Wreath," &c.
Specimen Pages sent free. Price of the Book $1. Per dozen, $9. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, Wholesale and retail. Eye Glasses, Spectacles, Telescopes, Marine and Microscopic Glasses, Barometers, &c., all of the finest kind and lowest prices, 219 Broadway, corner of Murray St., up stairs, Room No. 1, New York.
N. B. Magnetical instruments for medical use.

Fine Steel Engravings.

Exquisitely accurate, with fac-simile autographs, of the prominent officers of the ARMY, NAVY, or STATE. Send by mail to any part of the country at 35 cts. each, 25 per dozen, or $12 per hundred. Also CARD PHOTOGRAPHS, at $2 per dozen. J. W. LUCAS & CO., 439 Broadway, N. Y. P. O. Box 4290.

TIBBAL'S
Manufacturing Depot for J. A. CRANDALL'S PATENT SPRING RACKING HORSE, BABY ROCKER, GIG, and PEDAMOBILATOR, removed to No. 81 Broad Street, directly opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular and price list. Also Baby Carriages, Children's Carriages, Velocipedes, &c.



GREAT INDEPENDENTS!!!
Offered to everybody to sell our Great and
NEW STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS.
Premiums offered, which surpass any thing ever given by other houses. Send for our New Circular.
S. R. HASKINS & CO.,
39 Beekman Street, N. Y.

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS
Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Glass Signs and Show Cards, with frames, to order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.
Postage to Subscribers in HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.
TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
Terms to Advertisers.—Strictly-fit Cards for this list inserted, One Dollar per line for each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Meeks' Cabinet Furniture Warehouse,

No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE. ☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

National Union League.

Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Gold Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO.,
209 Broadway, New York.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, relieve sre dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

PRICE 50 CENTS.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was short, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five feet four inches in length—when let down reaching to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

Mrs. L. A. BRYCE, No. 468 Broadway, New York.

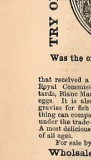
PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 493 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "Preparation for food from Indian Corn"



that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, with few or no eggs. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soup, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages.

For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Wholsale Depot 166 Fulton Street.
WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Sporting, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person at him at from 2 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight without the distressing result of frequent change. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
609 Broadway, New York.

Musquito Shield or Guard.

J. HAVEN'S PATENT.—For the Army, Navy, Travelers, sick or Wounded, or any one who is troubled with musquitoes, flies, or dust. Price from 87 cents to $2. Sample sent free on receipt of $1 75. Send stamp for circular. The fine wholesome frame keeps it away from the face, and the shot elastic, or string, keeps it down all round. It don't affect the breathing or sleeping, and is worth three times its price. ☞ HAVEN & CO., the only Manufacturers of the Shield, as no Rights or Licenses have been sold. No 80 Nassau St., N. Y. Room No. 23. Agents wanted in all parts.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents.

For Rats, Mice, Roaches, Ants, Bed Bugs, Moths in Furs, Woolens, &c. Insects on Plants, Fowls, Animals, &c.

Put up in Tin Cans, 50c. and $1 00; Boxes, Bottles, and Flasks, $8 and $5 sizes for HOTELS, PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS, &c.

"Only infallible one I ever knew."
"Free from Poisons."
"Not dangerous to the Human Family."
"Rats come out of their holes to die."

☞ Sold Wholesale in all large cities.
☞ Sold by all DRUGGISTS and RETAILERS everywhere.
☞ "If BUYER BE" of all worthless imitations.
☞ See that "COSTAR'S" name is on each Box, Bottle, and Flask, before you buy.
☞ Address HENRY R. COSTAR.
PRINCIPAL DEPOT 482 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Will warn fool for the baby, heat water or steep herbs, &c., for the sick, make water hot for shaving or bath, cook a chop, steak, or oyster, or by eggs, make tea and coffee, toast bread, &c., &c., in less time and expense than by any other method. Used on any lamp without shortening the light. Price 75 cents; by mail, postage paid, 90 cents.

Also a Patent Lighter, for lighting lamps without removing the chimney. Price 10 cents.

E. P. GLEASON, Manufacturer,
185 Mercer Street, N. Y.

Mr. Kloo Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 5th, 1863. For circulars address A. B. WIGGIN, A.M., Mount Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

ATTENTION!
THE CHEAPEST JEWELRY HOUSE IN THE WORLD.
4311 pieces of assorted Jewelry for $50. Trade list sent free. Address
J. A. SALISBURY, Agt., Providence, R. I.

ALONZO PLACE, A.M., Principal of Hudson River Institute, Claverack, Columbia County, N. Y., offers 14 weeks board and tuition for $21. Term opens Sept. 16. (Both sexes.) If Instructors, we board in the Institution with the pupils. Write for catalogues.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving at least HALF THEIR PRINTING by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, Type, Ink, and Rule, $12. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

In solid 18 ct. gold, $9 50.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Badges of Officers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid 18ct. Gold Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to any garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 209 Broadway, New York.

Pensions, Bounty, Pay, Prize

Money, for Soldiers and Sailors, or heirs, promptly collected. Soldiers discharged for wounds, varicose, or locality, we send our Hand-Book of Information and Circular, with Lists of Prizes, by sending address, with stamp, to pay return postage. SOMES, BROWN & CO., 2 Park Place, New York, and 405 7th Street, Washington, D. C.

Diarrhœa, Dysentery, &c.

Immediate and certain cure. HEGEMAN & CO.'S VELPEAU'S REMEDY, which has been used with unfailing success since the cholera of 1849. Fifty cents per bottle. Sold by druggists. Prepared only by HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 205, 207, 211, and 756 Broadway, and corner 11th Street and 4th Avenue.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
300 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Sea Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
5100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 3 00 each.
3000 Vinaigrettes	3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Bosom Studs	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Slide Buttons	2 00 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'tal Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Pencil Combination Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one has been, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of a Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent to us. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
209 Broadway, New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by United troops, should be sent, as half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 78 Broadway. Rates charged low rates.

The Merits of Brandreth's Pills

Are often life saving. By purifying the blood they supply health to every organ, and even restore the elasticity of the stomach and bowels, thus curing that invincible disease, Costiveness. In Rheumatism, Bilious Affections, Liver Complaint, Sallowness, and in all Fevers, their value must be seen, or felt to be understood. In Looseness and Bowel Affections, they are very productive of immediate benefit. Even in the Summer Complaint of Infants they have often cured when other medicines have failed.

In Gravel, Stone, Diabetes, and Affections of the Kidneys and Bladder their use insures a cure. In reference thereto, I refer to Dr. Jones, No. 8 Spruce street, by stairs, and to David McCord, Esq., Sing Sing. Letters for advice should be addressed to me at Sing Sing.

B. BRANDRETH, M. D.,
Principal Office, 294 Canal Street.
Also sold at No. 4 Union Square, New York.
Ask for New Style.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Card Warehouse, No. 302 Broadway, up stairs. Established 1845. ☞ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—The Oldest, Largest, most Fashionable, and Complete Fashion Magazine in the world. The Fall No., ready Sept. 1, contains Colored Fashion Plate, Illustrations, Diagrams, &c., 25 cts.; yearly, $1, with valuable premiums. Address, Mme. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, N. Y. Agents wanted.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Fluid Motion. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.

A Pamphlet mailed, post-paid, for 25, containing exact copies of advertisements for persons entitled to property. Address or apply to HENRY HAYS, 649 Broadway, N. Y. Costs of arms found, painted and engraved.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLDIERS, and others, maimed and crippled, can have a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 46, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 26 cents.)

HUBBARD BRO'S

(IMPORTERS of WATCHES)
NEW YORK.

☞ Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and valuable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and concurrent with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The mere of this Watch are the escape of two months, without once being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $300. Samples of watch sent to meet nonce hands, $60. If sent by mail, the postage is 56 cents; registering, 50 cents.

Railway Timekeepers,

With Heavy Sterling Silver Cases,

Especially adapted for Army Sales.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has been long sold everything else cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, with superior regulated movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price, per case of half dozen, $60; by mail, $1 05 for postage. If registered, 20 cents additional. A safe delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the Case.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER is also furnished in handsome silver plated cases, and in all other respects the same as the silver ones, with the exception that they are fully equal. Price $36 per case of 12 watches. Registering, 20 cents. Sold only by the case.

The impressions are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of this country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Their uneominus are emphatic, coming directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

Testimonials are valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Peerless" watch, and cheapest timepiece ever offered."—N. Y. Herald and News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"Are unsurpassed in ordinary watches, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, May 16.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scientific, May 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Christian Adv., July 9.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Evening Mail Express, (Governor's message), May 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Boston, Ky., Journal, Feb. 21.

☞ TERMS CASH; INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agencies employed. Orders must be addressed directly to us. If money is sent to be express or mail in registered letter, it is at our risk. Parties will please state the name of this paper in attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Corps Badges, or any other articles procurable in this city.

We will send, on receipt of 20 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, FREMONT, ROSECRANS, SIGEL, BANKS, SHERMAN, HALLECK, SLOCUM, SICKLES; ADMIRALS FOOTE, FOOTE, DUPONT, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PARTIES DOMINOES.—This excellent game is being now, durable, and perfect substitute for the more expensive ivory sets, and relieves the tedium of the Camp and the Hospital. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.
SINGLE BADGES, 20 Cents.
Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. for our (enormously popular, unrivalled, and saleable extra large size FIRESIDE COMPANION, and YANKEE NOTIONS PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Gold Pens, Pencils, Pocket Books, Diaries, Pocket Knives, Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Sketches, Household Receipts, Games, Directions for Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writers, Comic Songs, Mechanical Preparations, How to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Rules of Etiquette, Jokes, &c., &c., &c. ALSO, A LARGE NUMBER of rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Watches, Sewing Machines, Silver Ware, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Agents Packages sent free by mail, on receipt of 25 cents. Wholesale at very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT. profit. Our Agents are making more money than ever, and above all others, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable assistant and Agents to the kind now manufactured. Packages of Wholesale Dealers, up to the 1000 for Sutlers, Pedlers, and Agents of every dic. Goods sent by Express and Freight to all Parts of the South or Southwest. A large assortment SOLDIER WATCHES, Jewelry, &c., and several prosperous principal ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and a rare assortment of Jewelry. Send for FREE to each person who Circulars containing Reference, Testimonials, new Circulars, containing RATES, &c., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

RETRIBUTION.

HOW ARE YOU MR. BEAUREGARD?

"……A villainous compound!…… It's against the cause of Humanity, and the laws of Civilized Warfare!!"

American Patent
STEEL COLLARS!!
STEEL COLLARS!!
STEEL COLLARS!!
The American Enamelled Steel Collar Co.
AND
The American Patent Enamelled Metallic Collar Co.,
Are prepared to fill orders from the trade for their Enamelled Collars of "Choker" and "Turn-over" Pattern, to any extent. Address
AMERICAN ENAMELLED STEEL COLLAR CO.,
94 Fine Street, New York.
C. H. WELLING.

Remington's
ARMY AND NAVY
REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.
Address
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N.Y.

Artificial Legs and Arms, Selpho's Patent, 516 Broadway, N. Y., are the best substitutes for lost limbs the World of science has ever invented. (Established 24 years.) Send for Pamphlet. Soldiers supplied.

"Get the Best."
AGENTS WANTED TO SELL THISTLE & CO'S ENTIRELY NEW PRIZE STATIONERY PACKAGES. They are the largest, best, and cheapest manufactured. Circular sent free. Liberal Inducements to Agents
THISTLE & CO., 150 Nassau Street.

The American Parlor Or Floor Shake, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Str et, New York; 68 Kilby Str et, Boston.

STERLING SILVER HUNTING CASE WATCHES promised to all who sell our recent Low Priced Gold Watches. Trade 500 strong. Sole right. Circular with particulars free. Call or address W. H. CAMPBELL & Co., 27 Beekman Street, N. Y.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers' plans is spurned—how many friends forever parted. The subject is so delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF TOO SAND FLOWERS" as a dentrifice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.
H. F. FETRIDGE & CO., 21 and 23 Dey Street, N. Y.,
and for sale by all Druggists.

The Improved American CARETE POKER,
Cheapness and beauty combined.
Everybody should have them.
Just introduced by
E. & H. T. ANTHONY, No. 501 Broadway,
Manufacturers of Albums, Photographic Materials, &c.

The Phrenological Journal
For SEPTEMBER, now ready, contains Physiognomy Illustrated; Family Likenesses, with Portraits; Sketches of Gen. Grant, Wm. L. Yancey, and Thomas Addis Emmet, with Portraits; Phrenology of the Rebels, Illustrated; Wedding Rings; Choosing a Wife; The American Aborigines; Doings in Dunsonry; Curiosities of Phrenography; Hogging; A Wonderful Child; Growing in Grace; Hints the Idiot; Error of Education; Columbia's Phonographic Reporters; The County Girl, etc. Only 15 cents, by first post, or $1.50 a year. Address,
FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

Lockwood's, 675 Broadway.
10 COLLARS
FOR CENTS.
THE GENUINE
CLOTH LINED
PAPER COLLAR,
At Wholesale and Retail.
Gents Furnishing Goods
I have the largest and best selected stock in the city, and guarantee to please the most fastidious. Also Ladies' Paper Collars wholesale and retail.
SHIRTS
MADE TO ORDER.
The price of my established Shirt, is $1.50. In this department, I have nothing but experienced hands employed, and by employing such, I am always entitled to give work that will prove satisfactory to the purchaser.
NO FIT! NO SALE!!
Orders promptly attended to. All are invited to call on
CHARLES L. LOCKWOOD,
675 Broadway, N. Y.
Lafarge block.

Robert Cheeseborough's Patent Lifting Jack Screw, No. 1,039.
6 for……$25
6 for……15
6 for……10
6 for……5
Self-Measurement sent everywhere on application.
PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
There is an Gift or Use of, which compares with the Usig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, package paid, for $5 25; or with 8 boxes full mounted objects, for $7; or with 24 objects, for $15.
Address, HENRY CRAIG,
3 Broadway, New York.
A Liberal discount to the trade.

$22. WATCHES. $22.
A Splendid Silver Hunting Case Lever, that indicates the day of the month accurately, for $22; usual price $35 to $45.
$22. Genuine. $22.
Genuine American Lever Watches, in Sterling Silver Hunting Case, for $22; worth $35 at retail.
Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.
J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
208 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES FREE.
Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making over $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp or on active service will make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Package in endless variety and all sell prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. 8 or 15 per day Easy! on inside pages.
S. C. BURGARD & CO., 105 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!
THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for pocketing and swindling purposes.
We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND RELIABLE TIME-KEEPERS, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, as nearly as low a price as is asked for the foreign named Avertz and other foreign make, already referred to.
We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.
Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.
Wholesale orders should be addressed to
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

S T 1860 X.
Drake's Plantation Bitters.
They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They air agitate the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent premature decay and infirmities of age.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Tonic in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhausted nature's great restorative. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.
P. H. DRAKE & CO.,
202 Broadway, New York.

GREAT TRIUMPH.
STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great Industrial Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.
The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons appear to have the honor of producing the best pianos exhibited."

American Manufacture
STEEL COLLARS!!
Send One Dollar or One Dollar and a Half for a genuine turn-over Collar (no imported humbug) of the American Enamelled Steel Collar Co.'s manufacture to Box 5173, New York Post Office, and receive it by return mail.
Box 5173, New York Post Office.

(First Published August 1, 1863.)
Lloyd's Great County Map
OF THE
Whole United States.
AGENTS MUST SEE FOR THEMSELVES.
Price, in sheets, 50 cents, postage free.
Heavy Bound, Pasteboard Edition, $1 25.
[illegible] OUR NEW AGENTS' LIST IS READY.
Address H. H. LLOYD & CO.,
No. 81 John Street, N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.
A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Dial of Beautiful Enamel, a first time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 38 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.
FRANK LESLIE'S Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 29, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent time-keeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghien, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

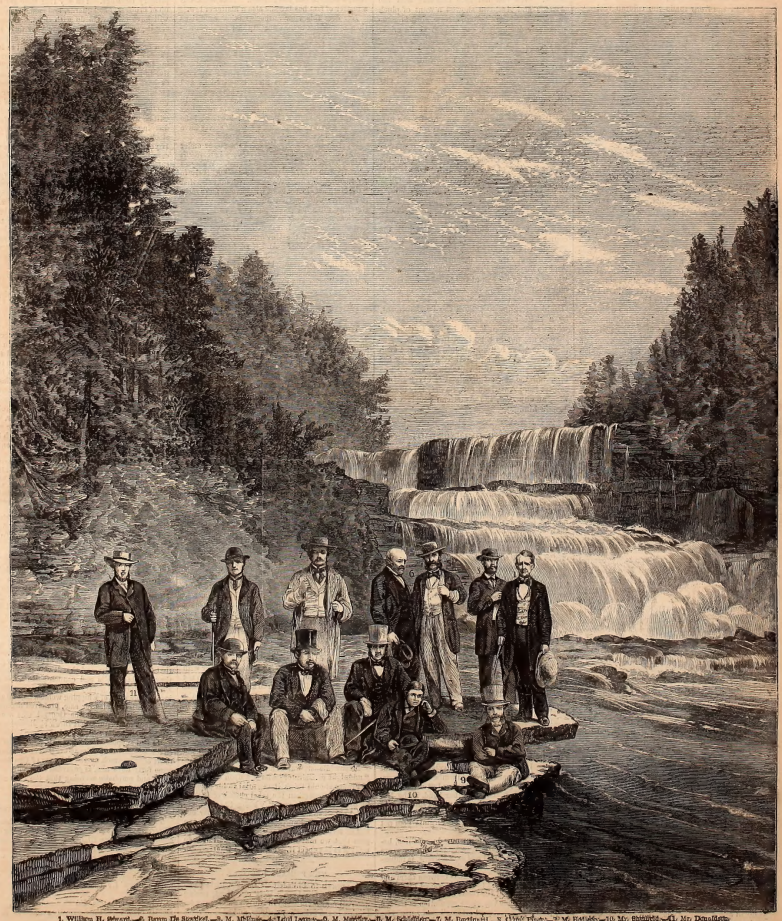
WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.
Made to Measure at $24, $30, $36 & $42 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

LADIES & GENT'S STEEL COLLARS AND CUFFS.
ENAMELLED WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they can be readily cleaned in one minute. No military man or traveler they are invaluable.
Price $1 each; sent by post on receipt of $1 15.
Wholesale and retail.
S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to dealers.
Agents wanted throughout the country.

BEAUTY.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses, a charming and perfectly natural color for the cheeks, or lips. Will not wash off, but remains durable for years. Can only be removed with vinegar, and warranted not to injure the skin. Mailed free from observation for one dollar and 10 cts.
HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 S. Seventh St., Philad.

Photograph Albums!
Elegant Styles, in Arabesque and Gems, from $1 to $25 each. Sent to any part of the country. Our Catalogues and Price List sent on the receipt of five cents. P.O. Box 4590. J. W. Lucas & Co., 173 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. C. S. SEA, M.D., with 25 years' successful Experience in Diseases of the Genito-Urinary Organs, may be consulted, 253 North Bo ol street, Baltimore, Md.



Vineland.
LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and extensive IMPROVEMENT OF VINELAND, and the healthful climate, 30 miles South of Philadelphia by Railroad. Cheap lands for crops, which are sure, and markets good. The soil is a rich calcareous marl soil, varying from deep loam to a sandy loam. Produces large crops of Indian Corn, Sweet Potatoes, Wheat, Grass, Grapes, and Peaches. Especially adapted to Fruits.
The climate is so mild and open that planting and all kinds of outdoor work can be done the entire winter. Most of the winter more resembles Spring than anything else.
Persons desiring a farm or Pay Location can have it, and been readily be settled by the climate alone. The water is pure, soft, and delicious.
10, 20, 40, 80 acre tracts at from $15 to $30 per acre, payable in cash, balance in 4 years. We have churches, schools, and good society. For business there are excellent openings. It is now the most interesting point East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Papers and list free. Reports and full information will be sent free by addressing CHAS. K. LANDIS, Proprietor, Vineland P.O., Cumberland Co., New Jersey.
From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag., Ed. N.Y. Tribune:
"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts in an almost level position, and suitable condition for planned and well laid out farms of any size of the Western States."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 351.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

1. William H. Seward.—2. Baron De Stoeckl.—3. M. Mülinen.—4. Lord Lyons.—5. M. Mercier.—6. M. Schleiden.—7. M. Bertinatti.—8. Chief Tyler.—9. M. Estrade.—10. Mr. Gurowski.—11. Mr. Donaldson.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS AT TRENTON FALLS.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MR. WILLIAM J. BARNES, OF UTICA, NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

THE TWO SHARP-SHOOTERS.

Two men went out from the fire-lit camp
In the autumn midnight gray;
Over the quaking, creaking swamp
To the edge of the woodland still and damp
With rifle and spade went they.

A hunting owl wailed out to its young,
And a picket stood as still
In the meadow below as the shadows flung
By the beaded tent lights thickly strung
On the silver-threaded rill.

Twas long ere the picket moved away,
And there was no time to lose;
The pits must be dug by the dawn of day:—
Said one, "We are digging graves, I say;"
And the other whispered, "Whose?"

With the morning light a column of steel
Moved upward along the hill
Toward the hidden pits, but a double peal
Close in the front made the column reel
A moment, and then stand still.

The check won a battle-field that day;
On the morrow the dead were laid
Head to foot in a trench of clay,
But two apart in the front that lay
Were buried without a spade.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1863.

THE FALL CAMPAIGN.

IT is pretty generally understood that General Lee is massing his forces for a third raid into Maryland and Pennsylvania. Rumor states—with considerable plausibility—that the rebel armies under Longstreet, Johnson, and Pemberton have been stripped of men to swell the invading force from Virginia. The losses at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg have been fully repaired, and it seems not unlikely that before the end of the month General Lee may lead fifty or 100,000 veterans across the Potomac to the familiar plains of Southern Pennsylvania. What is likely to be the result?

We have three armies co-operating with each other on what may be termed the field of operations. General Meade is in face of Lee with an army which is being swelled daily by arrivals of conscripts, and by the release of the forces which Governor Seymour's party political trickery kept here for the enforcement of the draft. General Rosecrans, with an army as large as can be manœuvred on any ordinary battle-field, is say nothing of a large corps under Burnside acting in concert with him, is crossing the Tennessee, and taking ground in Northern Alabama, and Eastern Georgia and Tennessee. General Grant, who has arrived at New Orleans, is massing his splendid veteran army for operations in Southern Alabama and Mississippi, and may be heard from, perhaps, before these lines are read. We have two more armies under Banks and Gilmore, which are operating with vigor in their respective spheres; but as their movements have no direct bearing on the probable issue of another campaign in Maryland or Pennsylvania, we pass them over for the present.

Now, if Lee takes advantage of the cool weather of September to move northward, as the necessities of the position will probably compel him to do, the policy of General Meade will be very obvious. It will be that of General Hooker—retreat. No opposition will be made to Lee's passage of the Potomac. He will be no matter where on the way. He will be allowed to enter Maryland and Southern Pennsylvania at his leisure. The conspiracy patrons who charged our volunteers six cents a glass for water, and of whom only one man in a whole village or town volunteered to fight against the invader, will be permitted to enjoy the society of the rebels to their heart's content. The banks of the Susquehanna, Pittsburg, and one or two other points north will be left to the mercy of the gentle some limit to Lee's march. But he will be suffered to get his army deeper into the Free States than he has ever yet penetrated. As soon as he has pushed to a reasonable point north his Southern communications will be cut. The Army of the Potomac will take position south of him, while fortified places, garrisoned by Northern militia, will shut him off from further movement northward. The result of this strategy, which was pursued from start at the War Department by General Hooker, will be a battle in which the odds will be enormously against the rebels, and in which their defeat will involve the surrender of their army.

Meanwhile General Grant will be taking care of Mobile, the fall of which—if properly attacked by land and sea—can not be a matter of doubt; and Generals Rosecrans and Burnside, penetrating the rebel country by way of Chattanooga and Knoxville, will complete its bisection east and west as Grant and Banks have bisected it north and south. Charleston is now as seriously menaced by Rosecrans as by Gilmore. If Chattanooga falls—and Burnside's operations, combined with those of Rosecrans, seem to render its fall certain—Rome and Atlanta follow, and Charleston stands defenseless on the land side.

Altogether, the fall campaign opens promisingly, and though the ultimate issue is in the hand of the God of battles, we think we are entitled to hope much.

THE BRITISH PIRATES.

THE British have launched another pirate, iron-clad this time, intended to prey upon American commerce, and to drive American vessels out of the carrying trade for the benefit of British bottoms. The craft is said to have got to sea. Her commander is a Southerner, but her crew, like herself, are British, and she is as thoroughly an English vessel as the Warrior or the Agamemnon.

It is suggested that she will come to New York to bombard the city. We deem it very likely. We can not help thinking that the Florida and Alabama showed a want of pluck in not coming here before. New York is comparatively defenseless. A British pirate might steam up our bay, under cover of night, destroy half the city with shells in three or four hours, and escape unshelled before morning. Steam and long-range artillery have changed the nature of maritime warfare, and no sea-board city is safe. We might safely bombard Liverpool or Southampton, and certainly we, the British, had taken to the piratical business. As it is, there is no good reason why the new iron-clad should not avenge upon New York or Boston the destruction of Charleston, and the chances are that she will.

Various suggestions have been made in the papers in view of such an event. Each journal proposes war, instant and immediate. Another advises a confiscation of British property. Others commend forbearance.

We will not embarrass the Administration by any recommendations on the subject. No man who has carefully and honestly watched the course of the Government can doubt that the President is jealously alive to the necessity of protecting our interests against foreign nations. And no one but the President really understands the matter or we can at all suppose that we require add a foreign war to the civil contest in which we are engaged. If, therefore, Mr. Lincoln should decline to consider the bombardment, by a British vessel, of New York or Boston, without retaliation, it will be safe to conclude that we are not in a position to retaliate. But if, on the other hand, he should intimate that an outrage should be instantly avenged by the seizure of every British vessel in American waters, or the instant dismissal of every British subject from American soil, he may rely upon it that, at any cost, the American people would sustain him.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NATIONAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS.

IN a late article signed B. J. L. there is a very clear statement of one view of the relations of the National Government to the rebellion. The doctrine of the article is, that unless the rebellion wholly succeeds it fails entirely; that the Union has not been affected unless it is destroyed; and that, of course, no State has been "gone away." The Constitution of certain States has been overpowered by rebels, just as the authorities of the city of New York were driven out by a mob, for a time, were paralyzed during the riot. When the riot was conquered the laws resumed their sway without conditions or "reconstruction." So it will be with the Constitutions of the States when the rebellion is subdued.

In this view the author allows that the States may continue to hold slaves and make slavery legal in their fundamental laws. But this will not long apply to new persons, because all the persons who are now enslaved were, with some exceptions, freed by the Proclamation. If South Carolina wishes to hold slaves hereafter she must buy them in Kentucky, Tennessee, or in some part of the district excepted from the emancipation edict. But he concludes that this is impossible. The practical re-establishment of slavery among a population of free men will not be attempted.

The objection to this view is that it deprives the Government of the power of securing peace. We will, for instance, the rebels are overpowered in Virginia, does the State Constitution become operative by the mere fact that arms have been laid down? If so, and all who are under the same instrument may at once send members to Congress, and thus be represented by the very men who were the struggle? On the other hand, if the National Government insists that no one shall vote in Virginia who has not taken the oath prescribed by itself, then the Constitution of Virginia does not resume its functions.

To maintain that the men now in rebellion, because they may be overcome by superior force, are therefore at once loyal and safe citizens, is impossible. The body of the people of the rebel section are in insurrection. War exists between them and the Government, and the war is waged by all the means and upon all the terms of war. By the necessity of the case the whole population is treated as belligerent, exactly as all Englishmen would be in case of war between America and England, however carefully some Englishmen might feel. Upon what other ground does the Proclamation rest? If the rebels are individuals, and not a community, why are the slaves of the community, and not of the rebel proprietors alone, emancipated? Clearly the same right which the Government unquestionably has to emancipate the slaves of a hostile community for its assistance in time of war, it has to secure peace when it has conquered the enemy, upon such conditions as it considers wise. It may insist upon guarantees exactly as it would in treating with a foreign power. For, practically—so far as fighting and the laws of war are concerned—the rebels have been a foreign power. If the war had been with English or French troops in possession of the Southern country, it would be conducted exactly as it is to-day. Therefore, when the military force of the insurrection is subdued, the United States Government will certainly hold the rebel section by the strong hand until it is satisfied that there is no danger to its peace; and it must itself be the judge of the fact satisfaction.

If some such general view be not the true one then Mr. Lincoln can deal with the rebels merely as rioters. But the law long since established that position. The Supreme Court held, and Judge Nelson did not dissent, that since July, 1861, a state of war has existed. Thus what was a matter of fact has become also a matter of law.

Nor does this doctrine involve any conditions than submission to the Constitution; for the emancipation edict being, as the President and the best authorities hold, a "measure" of the Constitution, it secures the condition which would be otherwise imposed as the security of peace. But the edict does, as we have shown, leave slaves are concerned, conflict with the State constitutions and laws which recognize slavery. It is not true, therefore, that those constitutions and laws are merely dormant, and upon the submission of the rebellious citizens will resume all their force; because all the persons once known as those laws as slaves have been freed by a power beyond the States.

Whether such States will have the power under their constitutions to establish slavery hereafter is a question to be hereafter considered. We agree entirely with B. J. L., that they are not likely to make the experiment. We agree with him also that "the National Government will have no more right to interfere with the constitution and laws of South Carolina when her people shall become loyal and obedient members of the Republic, after the rebellion, than before." We do not this very statement imply that the Government has the right during the rebellion? And if so, how can it be said that the Government's position is "utterly untouched in all its essential elements?"

The more thoroughly the question is considered, and in the most candid spirit of B. J. L., the better for the country now and always.

FRANCE IN MEXICO.

THE editorial article in the last number of the Weekly upon "The French Empire," stated very clearly the deliberate insult offered to this country by Louis Napoleon in putting his foot upon the Monroe Doctrine and the unfortunate tendency of the French occupation of Mexico to destroy the Mexican Republic. Meanwhile, in pursuance of the French policy, we accept, as the ultimate tendency of the French occupation of Mexico to destroy the Mexican Republic, the establishment of a throne by the Emperor, and Prince Maximilian, of the Hapsburg family, for a sovereign. Under pretends of securing the French debt he sent an army to Mexico, in the expectation that it would be victorious at the same time with the rebellion. The first necessity of the new Confederacy would be a strong alliance, and France could not have found a better ready. Of course so long as the rebels were fighting successfully there was no need of discussing recognition. But when some when the parent government owned its defeat, or when it was evidently defeated. But now that the triumph of the rebellion, which France had for its scheme, become doubtful, what must he do but relinquish the scheme or improve its prospects of success, and how can he do this more effectually than by recognizing the Confederacy? War with the United States, he will say, is certain if I do not recognize Mexico. But I can make it very doubtful, what must he do but relinquish the scheme or improve its prospects of success, and how can he do this more effectually than by recognizing the Confederacy? War with the United States, he will say, is certain if I do not recognize Mexico. But I can make it very doubtful, what must he do but relinquish the scheme or improve its prospects of success, and how can he do this more effectually than by recognizing the Confederacy? War with the United States will be only in fact what it is now in name. Only it will be a war in Mexico. It is, therefore, not wiser for me to risk war with the United States when both their hands are engaged in each other's throats?

Besides this, French recognition would give the utmost moral support to the rebellion, and there is no possible responsibility of declaring war, while it would certainly delight England and open the way for all foreign powers to follow.

Meanwhile one war at a time is enough. If the "midnight conspirator" who sits upon the throne of France should think it essential to his plans in Mexico to strengthen the rebel chance of success by offering a moral support which will imply material and warlike support, we could not alter any present course and purpose. But because we have had no serious foreign trouble we ought not to suppose that we may have none. The best way to meet it is to expect it. Forewarned is forearmed.

THE PRIMARY MEETINGS.

A FRIEND in Philadelphia sends a little pamphlet, which has been widely circulated, urging upon all faithful citizens the duty of active participation in the primary meetings, and adds to some excellent suggestions of his own the agreeable fact that at the late ward meetings in Philadelphia a class of men were present who have hitherto abstained from all part in them.

The war, it is certain, will teach us many things. Not the least important of them will be the truth, that we shall have as red the Government in vain if we do not with the same spirit purify its operation. The permanent which a despotic Government offers to every man is personal freedom from the annoyance of its management. The price that every citizen in a Republic must pay for its perpetuity is his willing share in the duties and vexations of its operation. Do we get any thing in the world without paying the fullest price for it; and do we soberly expect to have the greatest public blessing of all, a good Government, for nothing? And the officers of that Government are not elected at the polls, they are elected at the caucus which puts into our hands the ballots we are to use at the polls. It is in vain that you come to the polls declaring that neither John of the one party nor James of the other are fit men for the office, but that Joseph is precisely the man. Your choice practically lies between John and James. You may vote for Joseph, but only to increase the majority of a candidate you think unfit.

The work of this Government is done at the primary meetings. You say that they are made up of bruisers, blackguards, and ruffians, and you will have nothing to do with them. When you say it you deliberately abdicate your duty as an American citizen, and so far as you are concerned you take care that the Government shall be in the hands of rascals and bullies. If you are not willing to take off your slippers—to hire a horse, if you live in the country—to drive a hackney in the cold or heat—to see and hear and small disagreeable people—to argue with stupidity and to bear with prejudice, you are not fit to be a citizen of a republic. If you are a farmer, and think your corn will be weeded if you stay in the house for fear of spraining your fingers, what kind of crops can every stook of your miserable crop will cry Fool, fool! If you are a citizen, and think Government takes care of itself, that increased taxes, ever complicated burdens, growing crime, disorder, and civil war will cry Fool, fool! to you from every loss of life and every guarantee of peace overthrown.

It is not labor which you can honorably escape, because it can not be done by another. Every man breathes for himself, and he votes for himself. The duty can not be delegated, because every man's vote is wanted; and when you reflect upon the machinery of a primary meeting as it is now managed, upon the character of the men in most districts who control it, and upon the contemptible part of dummy which is left to the voter at the polls, your indignation, if not your patriotism, may be aroused.

Another day we shall return to these points, and often to the general subject.

CHIVALRY.

THE chivalric Quantrell did at Lawrence, in Kansas, upon a large scale, what has been done every where in the war upon a smaller and small scale by the chivalry. The ardent children of the sunny South, whether whittling bones into breastpins, or scooping skulls into cups, or shooting negroes by the light of a lantern, or hanging and torturing Union men, or devastating and massacring at Lawrence, or shelling a town in Texas, following account, before demanding its surrender, show the same fine sense of honor, and the same noble impetuosity, gallantry, and high spirit which have always marked their conduct in Congress and society:

NEWVILLE, CUMBERLAND COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

SIR,—In your account of the shelling of Corinth by the rebels, in your paper of July 26, you mistake in saying they sent in several flags of truce to General Smith, asking to be surrender the town, before commencing the bombardment. No flag of truce was sent in until the shelling had commenced some time.

The town was full of the many chivalrous acts which they were the authors of during their stay in our valley. Hoping you will make the correction, I remain, &c.

FORTY DAYS' WARNING.

IF any timid soul nervously asks whether he may not take the rebel invasion too much to heart and believe General Gilmore to be a barbarian and a monster, let him read the General's letter to the Spanish Consul in Charleston, who sent solicitous for the safety of his fellow-countrymen in that city. For what purpose did the veracious Beauregard and the Spanish Consul and other people in Charleston suppose that Gilmore was battering Sumter and Wagner? Did they fancy that his object was Folly Island? Are we to believe that it was the city, and that it was their duty, if they disliked shells and cannon-balls, to depart. Did the attacking party who are fighting for the inestimable right of whipping women, flaying men, and breeding babies for sale, preferred a fling of "chivalry" against the Yankees, and it was so wicked as to use guns that threw shells five miles. So the commander says, quietly:

"I had supposed that ample time had been given for this purpose [of departure]. The commencement of the siege, and the defenses of the interior, some forty days ago, is regarded as having given plain and emphatic warning that the city might be fired on at any time."

EASY QUESTIONS AND VERY EASY ANSWERS.

THE rebel Maury, in a letter to the London Times, says that "New York is becoming the champion of States Rights, and to that extent is taking the Southern ground."

Under whose auspices is it taking the rebel ground? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose election was hailed by the rebels as a good augury for their success? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose nomination did Fernando Wood, notoriously disloyal, enthusiastically support? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose speeches have constantly thrown the guilt of the rebellion upon the loyal free States? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose phrase is it that the Union must fall rather than slavery? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose "friends" are the wanton burners of orphan asylums and the remorseless murderers of innocent men and children? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose opinion was it, when the rebels "seceded," that the Government could not "coerce" States? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose hope was it that, under that foolish trick of words, the Government might be overthrown? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose counsel does S. S. Cox declare would complete the policy to be inaugurated by Vallandigham? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose nomination for President of the United States does Jeff Davis desire? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose election would help to restore the triumph of the rebels? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose position, beside that of his old political companion Vallandigham, is that of the Copperhead beside a patriot? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose head was metaphorically put in chancery and punched by General Dix? Horatio Seymour's.

Whose name will hereafter be classed with Aaron Burr's? Horatio Seymour's?

Of whose name have we now our own hearts, or Horatio Seymour's.

SHAKESPEARE'S BIRTHDAY.

The ter-centenary of Shakespeare's birth occurs on the 23d of April, 1864. England is making great preparation for the celebration. They have a National Shakespeare Committee, of which the Prince of Wales is expected to be President, and Lord Palmerston is Vice-President. This may be considered as a formal recognition of Tennyson as the head of living English poets. The Committee is composed of men of every variety; for it is Shakespeare as the representative Englishman, not Shakespeare the poet only, whose memory they propose to honor.

But Shakespeare does not belong to England only. He is hers by inheritance, and belongs to the language. Wherever the language of Shakespeare is spoken his lovers have an equal claim upon his memory. He is ours not less than theirs. He is American not less than English. It was in his day that the influences which made America stirred society. It was soon after his death that his contemporaries and their children planted America. We ought therefore to share in the celebration. His birth is our festival also. Cordelia and Rosalind, Hamlet and Mercutio, are ours.

Let our known and special Shakespeareans move in the matter and name a committee. Mr. Hackplanck, Mr. Hudson, Mr. White, have each edited the great poet. There are eminent Shakespeare scholars also. Why will they not combine and consider the whole subject? It is not necessary to do it in connection with the English movement. We paid our homage to Burns independently of that of Scotland and of the rest of the world. And the attitude of many eminent English literary men during the war has certainly not inspired cordial sympathy for a united celebration. Carlyle, Bulwer, Thackeray, Ruskin, and others have sneered, and great numbers of the magazines and papers have scoffed at a cause which concerns all liberty. But our interest is not with them, it is with Shakespeare. Let them honor him as they will. Let us also, in our own way and from our own hearts, offer our homage.

A FEW QUESTIONS.

VERMONT has elected a loyal Governor: a Senate unanimously loyal, and a House which counts only some dozen members who are opposed to the war. Vermont supports unconditionally and overwhelmingly the policy of the Government. Does any body believe that the great safeguards of civil liberty are endangered in Vermont, because she did not elect friends of Davis and Toombs to her Governor and legislature? Does any body believe that their safeguards will be more secure in Ohio than in Vermont, if Vallandigham should be chosen Governor of Ohio? Does any body believe that the rights of citizens or legitimate State rights are in any greater peril in Vermont, where a Copperhead is not Governor, than they are in New York where Seymour is? Are the principles of the Government and the Constitution any less in the hands of the men of Vermont they are in Kentucky? If every loyal State followed the example of Vermont would a single lover of the Union and the Government regret the result?

WHAT IS ALLEGED AND NOT DENIED.

IF there be any infamy in the word thief, it belongs to John B. Floyd. If there be any crime in purely cowardice and bloody Pilatism against just and equal laws, he was a criminal. If there be anything despicable in poltroonery, he was contemptible. But of what the merit, in Copperhead view, of being in arms against the Government of the United States; consequently the chief Copperhead organ in the country smoothly says of him, "it is alleged, and it has also been denied, that the treason of John B. Floyd had manifested itself while he yet held office under the United States Government, in the transfer of arms to the South to aid the cause of the rebellion."

It has also been alleged, but it has never been denied, that the treason of Copperheads manifests itself in a general loyalty to the Government, while all their sympathy is transferred to the South to aid and comfort the rebellion.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL HALLECK last week secured the appointment of twenty-four young soldiers, from our armies now in the field, to cadetships at West Point. The cadetship due to the Virginia Congressional district was given to a soldier who have distinguished themselves, and are otherwise qualified, to the Army of the Potomac. The cadetship due to Western Tennessee, Arkansas, and Mississippi, are to be conferred on General GRANT'S recommendation. So in the other departments. And General HALLECK further takes the ground that next year all appointments to West Point shall be made from young soldiers in the field, or the sons of officers who have rendered important services in this war; but that the appointments are to be taken from the various Congressions in the Northern and other States, but that the Congressmen in their recommendations are to be restricted to three classes of candidates.

Among the recent arrivals from New Orleans is Lieutenant-Colonel J. P. FOSTER, of the One Hundred and Fifty-eighth New York Volunteers, Colonel FOSTER has served under General BANKS in the Shenandoah Valley and in Maryland, and his regiment is in the Army of Port Hudson.

The steam sloops of war Hartford, Richmond, and Brooklyn, now at the Brooklyn Navy-yard, are to be put in order as soon as possible, and the sloops-of-war Boston, lately ready about the Navy-yard, are to be furnished with new boilers, and otherwise refitted for some special service not yet made public. It is rumor only that they will go with the Admiral to operate together as a special squadron on the coast of England and France.

Official information has been received in regard to the fate of Lieutenant-Colonel ALEXANDER MCDOUGALL MAJOR Brevet-Major, First New Jersey Cavalry, in the cavalry fight at Fredericksburg on June 9. They were killed in the first charge upon the rebel General STUART'S head-quarters. Brevet-Major Hall at the very moment General Stuart's body fell.

W. B. DEWEY, Assistant Adjutant-General, has been assigned to duty in the Army of the Potomac.

The following navy orders have been issued:

Lieutenant-Colonel LEONARD F. CLARK ordered to command the Niagara.

Commander JOHN GUEST ordered to duty at Navy-yard, Washington.

Commander JAMES P. SANFORD ordered to command the Sonoma.

Lieutenant-Commander J. T. NICHOLS ordered to command the Meadow.

Lieutenant-Commander FRANCIS M. ROE detached from ordnance duty at New York, and ordered to command the Ethan Allen.

Lieutenant-Commander WATSON SMITH ordered to command the Pearl Seeker.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN S. BARNES detached from the command of the Pearl and ordered to command the Ethan Allen.

Lieutenant-Commander RANCHOFT GHERARDI ordered to command the Chocura.

Lieutenant-Commander DANIEL L. BRAINE detached from ordnance duty at New York, and ordered to command the steamer Fulton.

Lieutenant-Commander WILLIAM F. TRUXTON detached from the command of the Fulton, and ordered to ordnance duty.

Lieutenant-Commander J. C. P. DE KRAFT detached from the New York Navy-yard and ordered to ordnance duty.

Lieutenant-Commander L. A. BEARDSLEE ordered to command of the Pearl Seeker.

Lieutenant-Commander S. L. BREESE detached from the Bureau, preparatory to command of the steamer Mississippi.

Captain JOHNSON, one of the personal aids of Major-General HUNTINGTON, has been promoted to the rank of Major. He will remain on the staff of General HUNTINGTON.

Under the new dealing with officers, justly or unjustly obnoxious, Colonel BOWMAN, Military Superintendent of Naval Stations, has been relieved, and Brigadier-General D. C. WESSOTT put in his place.

Major-General HUNTER, at his own request, has been assigned to an important command in the West.

General JOHN A. GARFIELD has written a letter denying a story of the appointment of Mr. CHASE to the Presidency, and conveying the assurance that the statement is without foundation of the people of the State of Ohio. We say that we had no idea himself personally reprobrite to Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, and that he has no such sentiments he has made.

It is understood that General PETER HAGGERTY, one of the efficient Chief Quarter-master of the Army of the Potomac, is to succeed to the Quarter-master Generalship made vacant by the death of General MEIGS.

Lieutenant-Colonel CHARLES G. HALPINE, lately upon the staff of Major-General HUNTER, and subsequently upon that of General HALLECK, has been temporarily assigned to duty on the staff of General DIX, at New York.

Commander TALCOTTS has been ordered to the West Gulf Blockading Squadron in succession to Captain Rigers, Colorado.

Commander ROWAN has been detached from the naval rendezvous at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and ordered to command the receiving ship at Philadelphia.

Commander LEROY has been ordered to command the sloop of war Dakota.

Lieutenant-Commander E. P. WILLIAMS has been detached from the Powhatan and ordered to command the Huron.

Lieutenant-Commander CHARLES E. FLEMING has received preparatory order to command the Sagamore.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN C. CHANDLER has been detached from the command of the Sagamore, and ordered to the command of the Monticello.

The Navy Department has received information of the killing at Natchez of Acting Master E. A. TOWLES, commanding the United States steamer Rachel Seaman. Mr. M'KEE, the Provost Marshal of that city, is investigating the circumstances connected with Mr. TOWLES' death.

Captain JOHN SAUNDERS, of the Sixty-ninth New York regiment, who was recently reported to have been courtmartialed and dismissed the service, "for drunkenness and unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," was honorably discharged August 19, in consequence of the conclusion of his company.

Captain JOHN L. BROOME, of the United States flag-ship Hartford, has been appointed to the command of the flag squadron, has been ordered to report for duty at the Marine Barracks, Washington.

The soldiers of the Third Army Corps are preparing to give General SICKLES a magnificent reception on his return to his duties. Over five thousand dollars have already been subscribed for the occasion.

Brigadier-General BEAL and a number of other rebel officers passed through Cairo on 1st inst. en route to Johnson's Island, to be confined in close quarters.

The Louisville Journal tells a good story at the expense of a colonel who was dismissed from the service on account of disloyalty. The colonel appealed to President LINCOLN, and after a long talk the latter, personally convinced of his loyalty, proposed to make him a brigadier-general, thinking he would almost be a certain fool to refuse. The officer gladly accepted, when, much to his chagrin, Mr. LINCOLN proposed to give him the command of a negro brigade. The friend knew colonel "didn't see it."

Colonel CHARLES HAMILTON JOHNSON, of the Marine Corps, has returned from his service in the Gulf squadron, and has now two barracks in two different naval stations, and is now at the Marine Barracks in this city. Captain ALLAN RAMSAY has been detached from United States sloop Richmond, and ordered to command at the Washington barracks. There are at present four vacancies in the Marine Corps, which will be filled by appointment by the Secretary of the Navy before the convening of Congress. This is a splendid service for retiring naval officers who desire some business of seeing the world.

LIEUT. LEVY recently arrested and conclered to the Old Capitol prison, has been released, and is now making an investigation of the charges alleged against him.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CAPTURE OF KNOXVILLE.

Official dispatches received in Washington state that General Burnside has captured Knoxville, East Tennessee, his cavalry having entered the place about the 4th inst. At Kingston the rebels did not show much fight but fell back, and finally retreated. There were several skirmishes on the way to Knoxville, the most severe of which was at Loudon, where the rebels were routed with considerable loss. General Burnside's losses during the advance have been trifling.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

The monotony of the siege operations at Charleston was varied by a grand engagement on the 16th inst., between the iron-clads and Fort Sumter, Wagner, and Moultrie, in which much ammunition was used, and in the accompanying cannonade with the attention it deserves. It will occupy when printed the large quarto volumes, with charts, diagrams, etc., but in this publication a large Congressional appropriation will be required. The Secretary of the Navy has not yet seen fit to read it, but is about instituting a committee of fifteen to be presided over by Admiral DUPONT himself, who will be charged with the duty of reading it, and reporting on it whether it be not in full by published as an official document.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE NEW REBEL RAMS.

The rebel iron rams at Liverpool are described as of enormous strength, and completely furnished with every protection for the gunners. One of them was off the docks, and was visited by a large number of persons, though the one which was reported to have sailed. It is said, however, that she will be ready for sea in mid-September. The English Government and people were becoming alarmed at the accumulation of rebel iron-clads, and the matter was already mentioned in this connection.

ENGLAND ALLAYED AT HER NEW NAVAL DOCTRINE.

The following extract is from the London Times of August 5:

"We hold and acknowledge it unlawful to equip vessels of war for the service of a belligerent power, pirates, and yet every cruiser in the service of the Southern Confederacy has been equipped in one of the open ports of this country. It is not the fault of the Government that it is so. As the Attorney-General openly avowed, but three must clearly be a fault somewhere, when we find that the law is so far evaded, and things done which we would rather see left undone, and which our own interests require should not be done.

We admit that the case is exceptional. It turns, in fact, upon the peculiarly anomalous relationship with which the Federals are enforcing a prodigious blockade. But the more exceptional object that we descried their whole naval resources, and have thrown the police of the seas into their hands, the more necessary it is that the seas-board of the Southern States matters would not have been left unprovided in the Admiralty Court. Who knows would the Florida be quietly hovering about the Channel but for the Admiralty Court decision in favor of the Alexandra? The kind of trade is left undistrained, and the Federals, instead of seeking out the pirate would-be cruiser in the open appearance, compunde of us for allowing them to appear at all. Whether, again, the dictum of Sir John Patteson in his powerful iron steamers everyday for the purpose of patrolling the coast of the new republic, whether that is to be sharply diverted to Charleston or Norfolk we should soon see what sort of a war we had to expect. Hitherto the Southerners have been left with this field of action entirely to themselves, and there is probably no one thing that it has they have recently proposed to throw their whole energies into than the trade. We have no complaint to make of the tension given to the trade in question as could hardly be avoided.

It is a hard thing to say, perhaps, that we may sell a hundred thousand rifles to the agent of a belligerent and a belligerent, and yet not a ship's hull; but we can only add that we shall abandon in accordance with the law, and that it is not our interest to invalidate it. We ourselves have been accustomed to see in the American War, during the Crimean war we addressed a protest to the Washington Government on the subject of a vessel believed to be destined for Russian use, and the Americans listened to us. When they, again, the other day, protested on the subject of the Alexandra, we listened to them, and did our best to defend alleged breach of law. On both sides, therefore, it is felt that neutrals should not supply belligerents with munitions of war; and yet a Confederate ship is said to be somewhere in British waters awaiting the appearance of the Federal steamer at a specified time. Is this right? We think not. It is not a question of sympathy at all, but a question of law, and we may once more ask, of British interests. If we were unhappily plunged again into war with the North we find reason to be glad we supported with greater zeal the representations of the Federals in the case of the Confederate cruisers.

THE BRITISH PIRATE "FLORIDA."

The Florida had captured and burned the ship Archer, loaded with coals, from Liverpool for New York, on the 31st ult., only thirty miles southeast of Kinsale, but was herself chased by a vessel of war the next day. It was uncertain what disposition had been made of the crew.

SPAIN.

SHE DECLINES TO RECOGNIZE THE CONFEDERACY.

The Spanish Government has just been again agreed to the Spanish Government to obtain recognition of the Confederacy, by offering to guarantee the safety of the possession of Cuba and Porto Rico. The Spanish Government declined.

MEXICO.

RUMORED DECLARATION OF MAXIMILIAN.

The Mexican correspondent of the London Herald explains. An American protest in regard to the French proceedings in Mexico is said to have been presented to the French Emperor during the current week. There is in Mexico, also, a Mexican Roman Catholic protest, and all, he accepted by Maximilian. The King of the Belgians recommended him to insist upon certain points which are equivalent to a refusal, and it is understood that the Emperor Maximilian has intimated that such acceptance must be followed by a renunciation of all his political rights as a scion of the House of Austria.

TURKEY.

BURNING OF THE SERAGLIO.

The Turkish seraglio was recently burned to the ground, and an estimate of the loss of property and destruction among the three hundred women, over one hundred eunuchs, and some hundred servants who is included it.

JAPAN.

ATTACK ON AMERICAN AND BRITISH VESSELS.

News from Japan, of a highly important character, to the date of July 4, is received by way of San Francisco. Actual hostilities between the Japanese and the Treaty Powers had commenced on the 25th of June by a Japanese ship, bound from Nangasaki to Kanagawa by an inland passage, was fired upon by Japanese forts and vessels, which had previously fired upon the American ship Pembroke. She was much injured, and had four men killed and six wounded. Subsequently the American steamer Wyoming visited the place to punish the Japanese for firing upon the Pembroke. She blew up a Japanese steamer and sunk another, and silenced nearly all the neighboring forts. She received twenty shots, and had five men killed and wounded. The forts were afterward attacked by two British war-vessels, and after a bombardment a detachment of British troops were landed, who destroyed the fortifications and an adjacent village. The loss was slowed very little light.

UNION STATE NOMINATIONS.

The following nominations, for the State Ticket, were made at the Union State Convention held last week at Syracuse:

For Secretary of State.....	PETER A. PORTER,
For Controller.....	THOS. W. OLCOTT.
For Attorney-General.....	JOHN CORNELIUS.
For State Treasurer.....	JOHN J. SCHUYLER.
For Judge of Appeals.....	HENRY E. SELDEN.
For Canal Commissioner.....	WM. B. TAYLOR.
For Canal Commissioner.....	W. B. TAYLOR.
For Inspector of Prisons.....	JAMES E. BAKER.

M'CLELLAN'S REPORTS.

The Herald says: "Well informed parties allege that General M'Clellan's report was only received at the Adjutant-General's Department three weeks ago, and that it will take one man nearly two months to read the accompanying documents with the attention it deserves. It will occupy when printed the large quarto volumes, with charts, diagrams, etc., but in this publication a large Congressional appropriation will be required. The Secretary of the Navy has not yet seen fit to read it, but is about instituting a committee of fifteen, to be presided over by Admiral DUPONT himself, who will be charged with the duty of reading it, and reporting on it whether it be not in full by published as an official document."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE NEW REBEL RAMS.

The rebel iron rams at Liverpool are described as of enormous strength, and completely furnished with every protection for the gunners. One of them was off the docks, and was visited by a large number of persons, though the one which was reported to have sailed. It is said, however, that she will be ready for sea in mid-September. The English Government and people were becoming alarmed at the accumulation of rebel iron-clads, and the matter was already mentioned in this connection.

ENGLAND ALLAYED AT HER NEW NAVAL DOCTRINE.

The following extract is from the London Times of August 5:

"We hold and acknowledge it unlawful to equip vessels of war for the service of a belligerent power, pirates, and yet every cruiser in the service of the Southern Confederacy has been equipped in one of the open ports of this country. It is not the fault of the Government that it is so. As the Attorney-General openly avowed, but three must clearly be a fault somewhere, when we find that the law is so far evaded, and things done which we would rather see left undone, and which our own interests require should not be done.

We admit that the case is exceptional. It turns, in fact, upon the peculiarly anomalous relationship with which the Federals are enforcing a prodigious blockade. But the more exceptional object that we descried their whole naval resources, and have thrown the police of the seas into their hands, the more necessary it is that the seas-board of the Southern States matters would not have been left unprovided in the Admiralty Court. Who knows would the Florida be quietly hovering about the Channel but for the Admiralty Court decision in favor of the Alexandra? The kind of trade is left undistrained, and the Federals, instead of seeking out the pirate would-be cruiser in the open appearance, compunde of us for allowing them to appear at all. Whether, again, the dictum of Sir John Patteson in his powerful iron steamers everyday for the purpose of patrolling the coast of the new republic, whether that is to be sharply diverted to Charleston or Norfolk we should soon see what sort of a war we had to expect. Hitherto the Southerners have been left with this field of action entirely to themselves, and there is probably no one thing that it has they have recently proposed to throw their whole energies into than the trade. We have no complaint to make of the tension given to the trade in question as could hardly be avoided.

It is a hard thing to say, perhaps, that we may sell a hundred thousand rifles to the agent of a belligerent and a belligerent, and yet not a ship's hull; but we can only add that we shall abandon in accordance with the law, and that it is not our interest to invalidate it. We ourselves have been accustomed to see in the American War, during the Crimean war we addressed a protest to the Washington Government on the subject of a vessel believed to be destined for Russian use, and the Americans listened to us. When they, again, the other day, protested on the subject of the Alexandra, we listened to them, and did our best to defend alleged breach of law. On both sides, therefore, it is felt that neutrals should not supply belligerents with munitions of war; and yet a Confederate ship is said to be somewhere in British waters awaiting the appearance of the Federal steamer at a specified time. Is this right? We think not. It is not a question of sympathy at all, but a question of law, and we may once more ask, of British interests. If we were unhappily plunged again into war with the North we find reason to be glad we supported with greater zeal the representations of the Federals in the case of the Confederate cruisers.

THE BRITISH PIRATE "FLORIDA."

The Florida had captured and burned the ship Archer, loaded with coals, from Liverpool for New York, on the 31st ult., only thirty miles southeast of Kinsale, but was herself chased by a vessel of war the next day. It was uncertain what disposition had been made of the crew.

SPAIN.

SHE DECLINES TO RECOGNIZE THE CONFEDERACY.

The Spanish Government has just been again agreed to the Spanish Government to obtain recognition of the Confederacy, by offering to guarantee the safety of the possession of Cuba and Porto Rico. The Spanish Government declined.

MEXICO.

RUMORED DECLARATION OF MAXIMILIAN.

The Mexican correspondent of the London Herald explains. An American protest in regard to the French proceedings in Mexico is said to have been presented to the French Emperor during the current week. There is in Mexico, also, a Mexican Roman Catholic protest, and all, he accepted by Maximilian. The King of the Belgians recommended him to insist upon certain points which are equivalent to a refusal, and it is understood that the Emperor Maximilian has intimated that such acceptance must be followed by a renunciation of all his political rights as a scion of the House of Austria.

TURKEY.

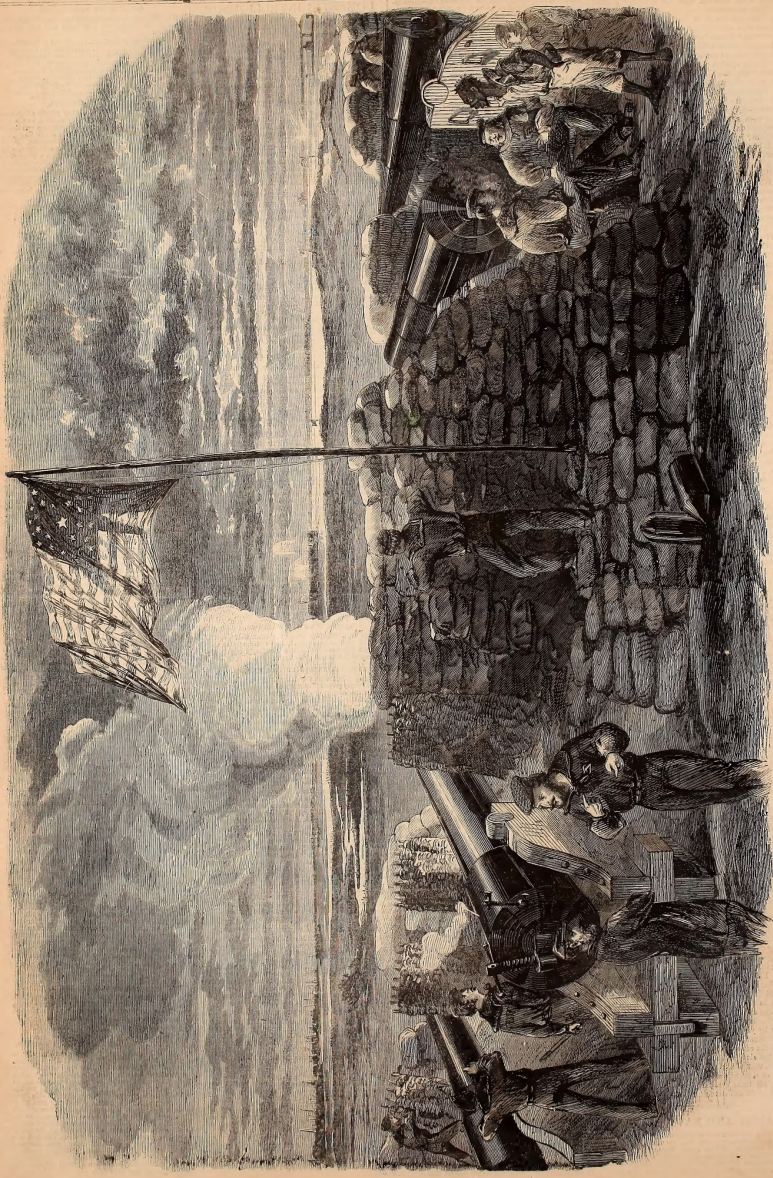
BURNING OF THE SERAGLIO.

The Turkish seraglio was recently burned to the ground, and an estimate of the loss of property and destruction among the three hundred women, over one hundred eunuchs, and some hundred servants who is included it.

JAPAN.

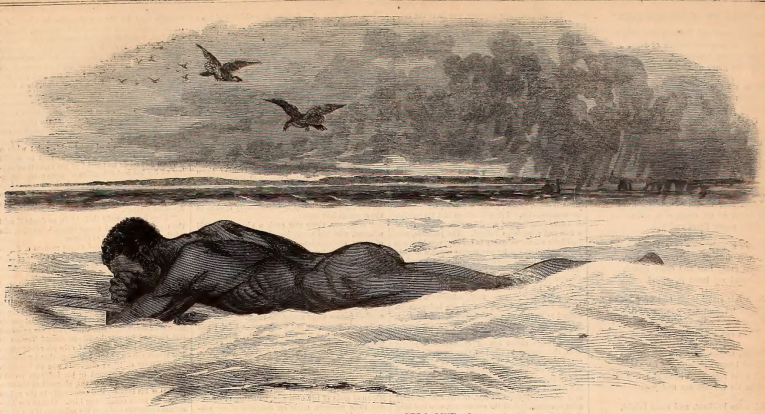
ATTACK ON AMERICAN AND BRITISH VESSELS.

News from Japan, of a highly important character, to the date of July 4, is received by way of San Francisco. Actual hostilities between the Japanese and the Treaty Powers had commenced on the 25th of June by a Japanese ship, bound from Nangasaki to Kanagawa by an inland passage, was fired upon by Japanese forts and vessels, which had previously fired upon the American ship Pembroke. She was much injured, and had four men killed and six wounded. Subsequently the American steamer Wyoming visited the place to punish the Japanese for firing upon the Pembroke. She blew up a Japanese steamer and sunk another, and silenced nearly all the neighboring forts. She received twenty shots, and had five men killed and wounded. The forts were afterward attacked by two British war-vessels, and after a bombardment a detachment of British troops were landed, who destroyed the fortifications and an adjacent village. The loss was slowed very little light.



UNION STATE NOMINATIONS.

The following nominations, for the State Ticket, were made at the Union State Convention held last week at Syracuse:



For Secretary of State.....	PETER A. PORTER,
For Controller.....	THOS. W. OLCOTT.
For Attorney-General.....	JOHN CORNELIUS.
For State Treasurer.....	JOHN J. SCHUYLER.
For Judge of Appeals.....	HENRY E. SELDEN.
For Canal Commissioner.....	WM. B. TAYLOR.
For Canal Commissioner.....	W. B. TAYLOR.
For Inspector of Prisons.....	JAMES E. BAKER.

M'CLELLAN'S REPORTS.

The Herald says: "Well informed parties allege that General M'Clellan's report was only received at the Adjutant-General's Department three weeks ago, and that it will take one man nearly two months to read the accompanying documents with the attention it deserves. It will occupy when printed the large quarto volumes, with charts, diagrams, etc., but in this publication a large Congressional appropriation will be required. The Secretary of the Navy has not yet seen fit to read it, but is about instituting a committee of fifteen, to be presided over by Admiral DUPONT himself, who will be charged with the duty of reading it, and reporting on it whether it be not in full by published as an official document."

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE MORNING CALL TO THE REBELS.—SKETCHED FROM THE NAVAL BATTERY BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE REBELS' LAST DEVICE IN THE TORPEDO LINE.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

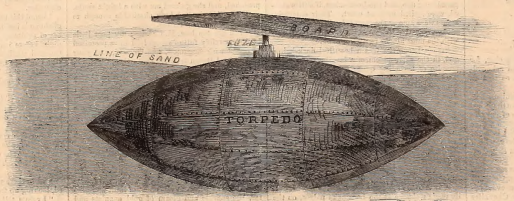


DIAGRAM SHOWING THE TORPEDO BURIED IN THE SAND.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE SWAMP ANGEL.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

"ONE IN A THOUSAND."

Roses, roses, oh! brilliant and bright
In the gorgeous month of June,
Raising your blushing queenly heads
In the glare of summer noon.

There are roses crimson, roses red,
Roses of amber hue,
Gazing with upturned loveliness
On heaven's deep azure blue.

Stately in presence, dazzling in tint,
Shaming the setting sun,
From the proud cup of the open flower
To the bud but scarce begun.

Too bright are ye in your conscious pride,
And your breath of summer hue;
No bond, no tie, could ever unite
This weary heart and you.

There's a little rose, by a little house,
On a little plot of ground,
Whose every root and every branch
Around my heart is wound.

'Tis a fair small thing of tender pink—
With no flaunting crimson dye—
And a world of sunny sweetness looks
From out its modest eye.

Unseen, maybe, by many who pass,
And known, perhaps, by few—
Oh! little rose, thou know'st full well
The tie betwixt me and you.

Oh! roses brilliant, and roses bright,
All lovely though ye be,
That little rose by the little house
Is the only rose for me!

SOPHIE'S RIBBON.

"You know him? Be careful, mon cher, for my sake if not for your own, how you acknowledge such a dangerous acquaintance as that in Novskoi in broad day."

And I felt—as any Russian companion wince and start as we walked, arm in arm, from the Noble Club, of which, like the other attachés of our embassy, I was a frequent frère. The person whose salute I had just acknowledged was still in sight—tall, well-dressed man of about thirty, with a pale handsome, Italian cast eye, and a long mustache.

"Know him? To be sure I do," was my reply. "In the name of all that's mysterious, Galitzin, what can be the harm of knowing the chevalier—I think, that is one his earl—ay, the Chevalier Gliska, nephew, or cousin, or something, to the old Prince Lecznska, at whose palace I have seen such a dozen times, waltzing as only the Guard can waltz."

But the young baron, who was generally gay enough, would not consent to make a jest of this occurrence, but muttered something about my "English imprudence," and soon afterward left me. It was not easy to guess the cause of the young Guardsman's evident nervousness, or to comprehend what particular peril there could be in knowing the chevalier, respecting whom I now began to feel some natural curiosity. Of his antecedents I knew very little, but that little was in his favor. He had been much abroad, was reputed to be clever and well-read, and the few words which we had exchanged at any time had given me the impression that he was agreeable. Yet Galitzin, who had been very kind and familiar with me ever since my arrival on the legation, seemed to shrink from even mentioning the stigma that attached to the chevalier.

It was from the chancellor at our embassy, a quiet, good-humored old man, with a taste for gossip, and a memory for St. Petersburg small-talk dating from the peace of '15, that I heard the truth.

"Gliska! Gliska?" he said the old Scotchman, taking a pinch to refresh his recollection. "Ah! yes, to be sure! the young man, Demetrius Gliska, is sone relation to the old Princess Lecznska, and was in the imperial service. Your friend's right. You had best fight shy of him, Mr. Acton."

"But why? Does he cheat at cards? Or has he a turn for what the doctors call homicidal monomania?"

"Nothing of the sort," answered the chancellor; "he's just a 'suspect,' and that's the whole of it; he's one of the black sheep of the political flock, waits all the world as chiefly noisy gay young exiles as your friend Galitzin, are fearful to rub shoulders with. To be sure, he's a Pole, and can't be blamed for what he did in behalf of his down-trodden country; but, man, he's fairly frowned upon by the powers that be."

On further pressing, Mr. Campbell informed me that the chevalier, who had once held a commission in the army, had been arrested on suspicion of a share in some conspiracy. He was found not guilty; but being unable to clear himself wholly in the eyes of government, had been compelled to serve as a private for three years in the Caucasus; had quitted Russia at the end of this term; and, after a long exile, had lately been permitted to return at the intercession of his powerful relatives. He was still under considerable suspicion, and it was more than rumored that his presence in the capital was due to his desire to render aid in some widely-spread plot for the enfranchisement of Poland and its imperfectly Russianized dependencies.

"If they catch him tripping, woe be to the lad," said old Campbell, uncularly; "he'll be lucky if he gets off with Eastern Siberia and airmine trapping for the rest of his days; more likely the mines or the knout, if the Czar's ministers happen to be specially ill-humored, or specially frightened, when the bubble bursts."

The old chancellor had seen so many abortive plots, painfully planned, warily kept, collapse in the miserable ruin of the plotters, that he had got to regard the Russian government as a conspiracy proof. This was peculiarly true as regarded the Polish conspiracy, many of whose chief females were understood to reside at St. Petersburg rather as hostages than as courtiers, though never venturing to absent themselves from the imperial presence on the ceremonious occasions. Among these were the Leczinskas; the old prince and princess; their cousin, heir to the princedom, resident in Lithuania and the government of Warsaw; and their grand-daughter, Sophie Leczinska. The prince himself was a gouty old man, with a taste for numismatics. I do not believe that his patriotism ever went beyond a mild sentiment in favor of a free and prosperous Poland. The princess, who had been a famous beauty in her day, was kind and hospitable, but not by any means capable of dabbling in political intrigues; while the grandson was as yet so young, and so heedfully kept under the eye of a tutor recommended by the Czar himself, that he could scarcely have imbibed any "revolutionary" ideas. Still, whoever was lord of the Leczinska lands, and of the influence attached to the great name of that illustrious race, was esteemed worth watching by the authorities.

The family had not always been so passive. The prince's eldest son, a high-spirited young man, had shared in the last disastrous revolt of the Poles, and died, in exile, of wounds received in the defeat of Ostrolenka. His young widow had soon followed him to the grave, leaving Alexis and Sophie, the one an infant, the other a girl eight years of age, to the care of their grand-parents. And the second son, who had long wandered, as exile, from court to court, had died far from his home and friends. All this happened long ago, and the Leczinskas, if still watched, were smiled upon at court. Their entertainments were among the most splendid at St. Petersburg, and the foreign residents, in special, met with the most kindly reception.

Sophie Leczinska was a beautiful dark-haired girl, in the early bloom of a loveliness that gave promise of surpassing brilliancy and majesty at a later period; but just then she was a bright-eyed young creature, simple and frank, and gay as a lark, more like an English maiden than the languid Russian damsels around her. Indeed, Sophie, by far the most attractive child I ever saw, was also most national. It was her pride to be a Pole; she loved to sing Polish songs, and to listen to Polish stories; and I remember how, when Sophie was in a very petulant, when her grandmother absolutely forbade her appearing at the empress's masquerade in the Polish cap, with eagle, and gold-bridled vest of the old Sarmatian pattern.

It is not surprising that I, who was most heartily made welcome by the Leczinskas, should be more than that of Roland, and a Leczinska might, as I said, I will know, reasonably expect to be thrown with some men of rank much more brilliant than mine. It must, however, be remembered that Sophie was not yet fifteen, that her education was strictly entailed, and I was at that time understood to be the next inheritor of a considerable property in Berkshire, which circumstance did not matter stood. I was regarded in the household as actually betrothed to Sophie. There had been no formal freaking of the ice, but I had been long fixed for our marriage, which, indeed, the princess desired to defer for a year or two on account of her grandchild's youth. But the lips had not yet been parted from her, but the affair was no secret.

And Sophie? With all my wish to relate calmly and fairly what occurred to her, even at this distance of time, be certain as to what were her feelings. Perhaps she herself did not realize their nature. I can only speak with certainty as to what she had merely looked down, with a timid blush and smile, when the old princess bade her look upon me as her future husband. That the girl had nevertheless the tacit consent thus given, nor is this expected in a continental country, and especially in a Polish household.

Gliska, being in some way related to the princess, and having frequently been in the Leczinska mansion in Poland, was often to be met in the family circle, where he was always welcome. He had been a year or two at the university, and was been early left an orphan, and both the prince and princess had a regard for him, which was probably in great measure on account of his father. Nothing could be more unlike than the bent of the exguardian's mind and that of his former charge. The kind white-headed master of the house had a soft easy nature, that shrank from disagreeable or painful topics, and a narrow, though cultivated intellect. He had travelled much, many foreign friends, and loved to recall by-gone intimacies among the wits and statesmen of the West. His correspondence, his French novels, and his curious cabinet of rare coins and medals, filled up his leisure fully. The chevalier, on the other hand, was calm and thoughtful, rather silent, but evidently not from lack of thoughts. When he did speak, it was always in well-chosen words, and with a certain suppressed fire and eloquence that told of great powers undeveloped.

I could not exactly make out on what footing Gliska stood with reference to Sophie Leczinska. They were cousins. Sophie, as a child, had been used to look up to the tall play-fellow so much older and wiser than herself—nothing would have been more reasonable than that they should have been on the same terms as brother and sister. Yet Gliska seemed to me rather to avoid his pretty cousin than otherwise, and Sophie rarely mentioned his name. There were times when I could not help feeling a thrill of jealous suspicion, as a new idea dawned in my mind that this apparent indifference, on Gliska's part at any rate, was mere feigning. But such impression were always fugitive, and were at once dismissed as idle fancies.

I was one night at a ball at the Gortschakoff palace, and happened to stand close to the open door of a conservatory in the white-glittering, fragrant of my proximity, were chatting of the Leczinskas and their prospects. One of them heard, accidentally, what there had not once seen some talk of a match between the chevalier and his beautiful cousin? Involuntarily I listened for the reply, which was as indifferently spoken as the question had been:

"Why, yes, there was such a plan. The old princess, who has a match-making turn, like most of your ex-beauties—your dead, general!—was eager about it long before mademoiselle was out of the nursery. But then come the exile, and the lad's lands were confiscated, and himself packed off to carry a musket against Shamyl in the Caucasus—so there was an end of the matter—cut the cards, marshal, if you please."

But the chevalier is pardoned," observed a cracked female voice across the table.

"True, madame; but poor—poor as Job; and not only penniless, but disgraced. No, no, the English fellow is a better parti, though I should not wonder if Sophie preferred the 'suspect.' Women are perfect riddles."

In the midst of the laugh that succeeded I moved away with tingling ears. A glance at Sophie's face, as she sat in the centre of a blooming group of girls of her own age, prattling of dances and their partners, made me ashamed of my suspicion. Her cheek was flushed on a fair fore head, surely, surely it was manifest on hers. I approached, and she greeted me with a bright smile, as I asked her if she had been charitable enough to keep an early dance for me.

"You are too late, Mr. Charles; my poor little book is terribly full of names! I have promised to dance with Rogamoff, and Oginski, and your great friend, Baron Galitzin of the Guard, and oh, so many more!"

"And with your cousin, Chevalier Gliska?" I asked the question with apparent playfulness, but I suppose there was something harsh and hostile in my tone, in spite of myself, which grated on the quick ear of my child. For Sophie glanced rapidly at me with the look of a frightened fawn.

"No!" she said, and her lip trembled slightly as she spoke.

Vexed with myself for my own unjust peevishness, I tried to make amends, and so far succeeded that Sophie smiled her cheerful composure, and recorded me a waltz. It was in one of the pauses in that giddy whirl, in the midst of light and glitter, the magnificence of gold epaulets and jeweled head-gear, and the dying fall of the music, that Sophie suddenly turned her eyes on mine, and said, with a sudden gravity,

"M. Charles, avow that you are jealous of my poor cousin Demetrius, and that you hate him."

I forgot whatever I replied in my surprise, but I know that Sophie contrived to convey to me the impression that the chevalier was the early playmate and companion of her childhood; that she regretted his misfortunes, and admired his patriotism; that she was only anxious to make four friends, and no enemies, and once more in the good graces of the Russian government.

"Poor Demetrius! I can not forget, dear M. Charles, how good and patient he was to me when I was a spoiled, sickly child, full of caprices and fond to peevishness. His misfortunes has suffered as much for our afflicted country. I, as you know, am a rebel at heart; I hate the Muscovites—I shall hate them always—but I have myself heard that last remark—but I can do so safely, because I am too young and weak to be dangerous to the Czar. It is different with him. He should not be jealous or cross, M. Charles, because I wish to prevent poor Demetrius from ending his days in Siberia."

I said something about my cousin's security, since his pardon, unless he were rash enough to enter into fresh intrigues against the emperor. I spoke with more than usual coldness than would otherwise have been the case, because I saw Gliska leaning against a pillar, at a distance, and regarding me with a look of watchful interest.

That night, as our sledges went whirling over the hard-trodden snow of the streets, there was a great bustle and confusion, and the startled horses were sharply checked by the rein and thrown on their haunches, while a double rank of soldiers drawn up across the principal thoroughfares. A harsh voice bade the drivers halt, and a number of policemen, accompanied by several officers mufled in gray watch-coats, went round from carriage to carriage, throwing the red glare of a lantern on the faces of the belated guests of the prince-minister, and asking with polished but imperious courtesy the names of those present, which were given by the names of those present, which were given by means of vehicles came to an abrupt halt, but some of the old residents took the matter very coolly.

"The first time this year!" said the senior attaché, who had taken a seat in my carriage; "I began to wonder if the police had gone to sleep. Two years ago I remember four such stoppages in a single winter. I wonder if they'll make many captions to-night?"

And I, as I had been but eight months in St. Petersburg, learned with some surprise that the favorite time for the secret police to select for a razzia against the innumerable plotters, Russian or Polish, was that of some great festivity or public reception. Half the conspiracies of the empire were hatched, my informant said, in the saloons of the higher aristocracy, under the very noses of the emperor and his ministers; and the best paid and most valuable spies were those who, from their rank and position, could enter such assemblies without provoking remark or distrust. No doubt something had transpired at the prince-minister's ball which had aroused the vigilance of the lynx-eyed police of police, and hence the impediment to our progress homeward.

The explanation had got to this point when a plaintive wail swelled to our driver that he might "go on as fast as he liked," at the same time taking off his hat and extending his open palm significantly. My informant stopped a few kopecks into it, and the man bowed low as he suffered us to pass by him and strike off by a side-street to the Admiralty quay.

"They have caught their bi'ds, no doubt!" said the more experienced senior attaché, treating the whole affair as a thing of course.

The next day we heard vague rumors of detections and arrests, some and many, others of only one or two persons. When I called, next morning, at the Leczinska palace, I found the old prince nervous and irritable, the princess agitated, and Sophie red with tears. She had a fright ful headache, her grandmother said, and was too unwell to leave her chamber. No doubt the heat and crush of the Gortschakoff assembly—those official people gave such shocking balls, where you were squeezed and elbowed worse than if the ill-mannered Tchines in Russia—had been too much for the poor dear child. But it was not on Sophie's account that her grandparents were so ill at ease. It was on Gliska's. Gliska had not returned to his lodgings on the previous night. His servant, alarmed at the nonarrival of his master, had come early to the palace to ask for news concerning him. One of the Leczinska chasseurs had seen the prisoners of the night before led out under the to the Concierge's, and was sure, or nearly sure, that one of them was the missing chevalier.

I heard this news with mixed feelings. An Englishman's instinct always rises in arms against an act of arbitrary oppression; and the arrest of the night before had in it something of tat-like and Oriental stealthiness that was peculiarly odious. But I had no sympathy or distrust of the chevalier, a smouldering jealousy which I tried to trample down, and I could not help feeling a vague sense of relief.

However, while I was copying a précis in the attaché's room at the embassy that afternoon, old Mr. Campbell came in, chuckling and rubbing his hands.

"Yon fine conspiracy has just turned out a mere bubble, my lads—a man's vanity in liquor," said he. "The chaps are set free, Gliska and the rest of them. Their captivity was over by luncheon."

"Then there was no real plot, after all?" I asked, looking up from my writing.

"I can't say," said the cautious Scot, shaking his head as he took a fresh pinch of high-dried; "the thing broke down for want of evidence—a verdict of not proven, as we say in the North. They say the Emperor had Gliska taken into his own cabinet, and questioned him there, but coolness cross-examine much out of the close fellow. And the story goes that his Majesty said, in a loud voice, before a side-de-camp, 'You may go, chevalier, but be careful how you give me the right to punish!' Nicholas is ill to thwart. He likes contradiction more than of honest, and I doubt if Gliska will do much more."

Gliska had, in effect, been set at liberty, and I met him that evening, calm and collected as ever, at the Leczinska mansion. He said very little about the exciting events of the night, or the formidable interview of the morning, but talked pleasantly on general topics. Sophie was present, having fortunately recovered from her headache, but she was silent and thoughtful, and I fancied that I detected a glance of intelligence once or twice between her cousin and herself. But I soon felt convinced that I was mistaken, for Gliska paid no sort of attention to Sophie. He addressed her rarely, and never with any particular show of interest; indeed, he spoke less to her than to her brother, a shy, sinewy-eyed stripling, whose Russian tutor was his inexpressible horror and consternation.

The noise the arrest had made in St. Petersburg society soon died away, and the usual round of gayeties went on. Gliska and Sophie's brother, Alexis and disaffection, had been myths. My own prospects unexpectedly improved. The relative to whose fortune I was to be heir, and whom I had never seen, since he had lived in morose seclusion, died, and I found myself rich enough to lead an idle life. As the life of a diplomatist, and without any choice, however, and at about the same time that I succeeded to this inheritance I seemed likely to rise in my professional career. Certain confidential and important task took place among the diplomatists, in consequence of which I was promised the post of senior attaché at one of the Southern courts as soon as the present occupant should vacate it: which would probably be in early summer.

Fortified by this intelligence, I was encouraged to renew, or rather to press, my suit for Sophie's hand; the old princess standing up warmly in the affair, the princess's objections to parting with her grand-daughter were by degrees overruled. As for Sophie herself, that was rather uncertain than asked for. Her grandfather blessed her and stroked her raven hair as caressingly as if she had been a child for whom some holiday treat was in preparation; her grandmother cried as she pressed her darling in her arms, and dilated on the happiness of her future life and the splendors of her prospective trousseau. It was settled that Sophie and I were to be married soon after Easter; that in the mean time milliners, lawyers, and jewelers were to be busy in providing laces, diamonds, and deeds of settlement; and that all was to go merry as a marriage-bell.

In all this arrangement the bride elect's part seemed a curiously passive one. Sophie Lecznikx neither ratified nor rejected the engagement which her nearest relations had thought fit to conclude on her account; she listened submissively to all the prince and princess chose to say on the subject, kissed their wrinkled hands in the ancient Polish fashion in sign of obedience, made me a formal courtesy, and left the room with downcast eyes and something like a smothered sob. After that Sophie always seemed to shrink from me; her spirits grew variable, her cheek thinner, her manner graver and more thoughtful. I ought to have read the lesson more acutely conveyed; but I was willfully blind to it, and lost too ready an ear to the assurances of the old Polish that Sophie's manner was merely the result of girlish timidity and a deep sense of duty. The aged princess, in especial, was confident that her grandchild esteemed me quite as highly as could be expected from "a young person bien élevée."

I must say, the old lady said, judge of the sentiments of a Polish girl as if she were a "Messa Angelaise."

Gliska's conduct left no room for fault-finding. He wished me joy, as the phrase goes, politely, but with no affectation of heartiness. Indeed we had never been intimate, though I had been at first disposed to like him well enough; but there was something dark and inscrutable in his bearing and disposition, very unusual among his rich, chivalrous countrymen. Perhaps the wretched years of degradation and suffering during which he had been a soldier in the Caucasus, and the cruel reverence to which he always shrank, had changed his character. He often reminded me of the traditional Italians of the Middle Ages: such Italians as Machiavelli knew, and Shakspeare painted.

He and I never met less frequently than now. He did not often spend his evenings at the Lecznikx palace, excusing himself on the score of pressing business, and throwing out hints which seemed to indicate that he was importuning the Imperial Chancellerie for the restoration of his confiscated estates. The old prince, always good-natured, in spite of his indolence and frivolous habits, offered his interest at court, and Gliska gratefully accepted the offer. He seemed preoccupied in his mind, and there were new lines of care on his forehead, and a harassed look in his bold keen eyes; but he teased Sophie with the same assiduent good-humor as before.

One day, when I was driving out of the city with one of the French attachés, young Dumanoir, to whom the sledge belonged, and who was not a little vain of his heavy arcana of Astracan fur, and of the spirit and beauty of his gallant horses with their silver bells, we had an unexpected rencounter. We had made a short cut through the wretched suburbs inhabited by the tshernol narod, or "black people," as the ill-fed poor of St. Petersburg are called, and were striking across toward the broad drive on the bank of the Neva, when we spun round a corner, and nearly ran over a group of four men in earnest conference. They started with evident alarm and evasion as they caught sight of us in that unfrequented quarter; and we on our part were surprised to see them, for more temperance companions could scarcely have met together.

The party consisted of a young Russian in black clothes, wearing a scrap of colored ribbon at his button-hole, and who was some government clerk or other member of the privileged bureaucracy of the empire; of a sergeant in the Guards, looking smart in his well-fitting uniform; of a long-bearded grizzled peasant, in a torn caftan and dilapidated boots; and of—Gliska. We nodded to him—the Frenchman and I—but he was too much startled to return the bow, and his pale face flushed like hot iron as we dashed by.

"What an odd quartette!" said I.

"Very!" said Dumanoir, dryly, knitting his black eyebrows; then he thawed into a laugh of unfeigned mirth, as he said, "I never saw rats so really caught. You are too guileless and unsuspicious, my dear colleague, for such a métier as our rascally one of diplomacy. We each of us have a double, whose true name is a watchword in the emperor's august mouth, conferring with his friends in this delightful and civilized quarter; and those friends are a discontented sergeant, a sulky Russkinik, and a hungry understrapper of some government bureau; and you wonder at their meeting on being seen by us! Foi de Dumanoir! My chief would never forgive me if I omitted to inform him of how well he welcome were to his Majesty Louis Philippe, King of the French."

I could not but own that there was something suspicious in the affair, though I with some laughing extorted from Dumanoir a promise that he would not mention what we had seen to any other than his embassador—unwilling as I was that the Lecznizka family should be annoyed by any fresh proceedings against their relative. But though I was not one of those who see a conspiracy in every gathering of men, I felt an innate conviction that all was not right. Gliska's politics were notorious, and his secret communing, in so low and barbarous a quarter of the town, with persons so unlike himself in rank and breeding, seemed ominous of coming troubles. I had heard—who had not?—of disaffection existing among the Poles, Finns, and Mahommedans, who had been forced into the Muscovite army; of disaffection among the educated servants of the state, weary of a career in which corruption and chicanery overrode zeal and merit; and of deadly hatred on the part of the fanatics of the old Greek faith—those grim Raskolnics of whom Dumanoir had spoken. A junction of such malcontents with the restless Polish nobles was exactly what the authorities most dreaded.

When, later in the day, I drove to the Lecznikx palace, I saw Gliska leaving it on foot. He seemed to avoid recognition, turning up the collar of his furred over-coat so as nearly to conceal his face, and hurrying on with a quicker step as he caught sight of my vehicle. I found Sophie, with sparkling eyes and a flushed cheek, alone in the great drawing-room: the old princess coming in as soon as she was informed of my arrival. Never had I seen Sophie look more beautiful; but her excitement, which I could not help connecting with Gliska's visit, caused me a sensation of pain as contrasting with her usual cold resignation, and its cause was explained.

Invitations had just been issued for a masked ball at the residence of Prince Wittgenstein, the Austrian embassador; and this ball, long projected, was to be by far the most splendid of the season. It was to have taken place long before, but had been postponed, and many of the intended guests had their fancy dresses prepared, while all the town talked of the ruinous cost of the decorations and the skill of the artists who were to turn the embassy saloons into subterranean halls. Sophie was wild with pleasure at the prospect of the fête. It was her first season, poor child, and she had truly a childish delight in the coming treat. Her aged relatives smiled as she talked with unusual animation of the fantastic splendors that were anticipated. It was said that the Emperor and Empress would be there. The grand-dukes and the Grand-Duchess Olga would certainly attend. Count Demidoff was to go as a Chinese mandarin, as Prince Kotzebu with the Sancy diamond to fasten the plume on his turban. The four beautiful daughters of the Sveitin minister would represent the Seasons; and so on, interminably.

It struck me that Sophie's interest in this ball was more than natural, but it never slackened during the few intervening days, and her spirits rose and fell in a capricious manner. At one time she was as happy and light of heart as a bird on a sunlit bough; at another there would be tearful drops clinging to her long eyelashes as she had the drooping head and dejected look of that same bird when prisoned in a cage. Her old grandparents did not observe these varying emotions.

"Les jeunes filles, my dear Acton," said the aged prince, lightly tapping his enameled snuff-box; "les jeunes filles are not to be read with them? They have whims; that is all."

The great night came, and with it came the south wind and a thaw. The first night became of the consistency of treacle, and the horses had to labor hard to drag the runners of the carriages, which had so lately been skimming along over a frozen surface, through the tenacious drift. But it was done, somehow, and the Austrian saloons at the Embassy began to fill with gusts, some in dominoes, and the majority in fanciful attire of every period and nation, which I need not describe the fête. It was splendid and tasteful in its way, and the crowd thickened and thickened, and the music swelled higher and higher, and half, or more than half, of the "society" of St. Petersburg passed in. The Emperor and Empress received Sophie's aged relatives and herself at the head of the imperial mouth, it was said, and a dangerous puzzle it was for the imperial lips. Sophie was known to have much self-control, but there were signs of suppressed anger under his placidity of aspect which I could not mistake.

The Emperor and Empress did not stay long. When they departed the masks were replaced, the music struck up, the Austrian and Polish aristocracy of Russia forgot the darkling glance of their master's eye. The dances went pleasantly on.

"M. Charles, will you be my partner?"

It was Sophie who spoke, and her voice quivered in a manner inexplicable to me, considering how ordinary were the words. She had on a rich Circassian dress of blue and silver she had chosen; but she would not have known me, in an ordinary domino of dusky black silk, but for my fair being exposed, through my not having replaced my mask. She was clinging to the arm of a Russian figure in Louis the Fourteenth attire: her brother, as I guessed.

"M. Charles, will you do me a favor?"

It was not very difficult to grant. She merely wanted me to affix to the breast of my domino a certain symbolical device, consisting of a scarlet ribbon with two fluttering ends—that was all. Hurriedly she thanked me for my consent, and insisted on my taking the knot in exchange for her own handa, though her slender fingers shook so much that they could hardly perform the task. I was in whim of the moment, and let her "mystify" some one, and oh, it was so kind of me to humor her, and would I please to wear it till after supper, and would I not? Of course had she asked ask her for a dance she was gone, lost in the mazes of the crowd.

"Hist! come nearer; the game's up!" said a man's voice, thick and husky with emotion, at my ear. I started. A tall man in a dark domino was by the alcove.

"It's all over," said the stranger, in his guttural French, spoken with a German accent; "some one has betrayed us. The troops are under arms, and the soldiers we counted on are disarmed and confined to barracks. Rest assured that the Emperor knows all. Gliska—"

"Monsieur, you mistake," exclaimed I; and the man shrank away. Scarcely had I time to dictate in my own mind the purport of what I had heard, when two or three masked persons came hastily forward, the foremost pointing me out to the others.

"That is he. I know him by the ribbon."

There was a pause, and a shuffling and whispering. I bethought me of the mystification Sophie had spoken of. Were these the friends at whose expense some harmless trick was to be played? I had little time to think, for one of the newcomers passed his arm familiarly through mine.

"Come quietly, Monsieur, to avoid scandal."

By this time my other arm had been grasped by another party's group. I made some hasty observation in French on the peremptory nature of the summons, fully persuaded that the whole was a masquerade frolic. The intruder spoke again, more sternly:

"You carry it off well, Sir. But your entreprises are discovered. You must come with us in the Emperor's name, or I swear to shoot you where you stand. Come on."

I was pushed and hustled, through a side-door, down a passage, and into the hall of the embassy. It was full of soldiery and gens d'armes. In a moment a cloak was thrown over my head, my wrists were chained together, and I was hustled out into the snow, and thrust into a sledge. There was a shout, a trampling and clashing, and I felt the jerk of the start. The sledge was going off at a rapid pace, in spite of the softness of the snow. Half smothered by the cloak over my head, I rattled or lay than sat in the place into which I had been thrown, while the jingling motion of the bells mocked me with the speed of our progress was great.

Presently the woolen wrapper that muffled my head was removed, and I could see the true state of the case. The sledge was traversing a snowcovered road, bordered by painted posts at frequent intervals. To right and left lay hillocks of mounds of snow, covering the past morass through which the road was made. Overhead was a wrack of hurrying lead-colored cloud, with the pale winter moon peeping out sufficiently to show the horseman of the escort, a party of dragoons of the Guard, who rode to right and left of the sledge, their burnished helmets and long white cloaks looming ghostly through the dim light. Beside myself, there were two persons in the kibitka, the one a tall military figure to the driver's left, a sergeant. The latter held a pistol in his gloved right hand; an excess of precaution, for I was bound and helpless.

I closed my eyes for a minute or two, and calmed my nerves by a strong effort. Then I looked again. Yes, nothing changed. Sledge raced, lashing whip, bounding horses, painted posts to mark the way, the mantled horsemen riding on either flank, the dreadful attitude of the armed man at my side—all real. And all these objects had but one significance—one which my soul shrank from. The Guards, the Tsar, the chains, the desolate wastes through which we were speeding, reminded me of many a dismal tale of exile to the glaciers and deserts of Northern Asia. Was I was actually on my way to Siberia, or I was mad.

My courage revived. It was impossible that an Englishman, and an Englishman in government employ, should be amenable to such a punishment, even had there been witness against the Czar been figured, whereas I was utterly unconcerned in Russian politics. Even the barbarian caprice of absolute power could not have taken umbrage at any act of mine, and then the idea that my arrest was some trick of Dumanoir's seized upon me. I tried the sergeant with French and German, but in vain. He knew only one language, and in answer to my few words of remonstrance he merely growled out the words, "Polish dog!" and pressed the cold muzzle of the pistol-barrel between my eyes as a hint to keep silence. I spoke no more.

Soon after this the wind veered round to the north, the moon vanished, the night grew piercing cold, and the flakes of driving sleet of snow came whirling down, and the horses could hardly struggle through the drift. Then all sensations were gradually merged in one—that of numbing, mortal effects of the intense cold.

Hours passed; post-stations were reached, horses changed, fresh relays took the place of the former escort; but I only grew colder and colder, and the blood in my veins seemed freezing into solid ice, and the very beating pains through every joint, and I remember moaning like a child in agony, and that was the last sound I had the power to hear, the last thing I remember being a flash of ruddy torchlight.

When I recovered I was in a warm bed, and beside it stood two men: one dressed in black—a doctor; the other, a tall officer in a long military cloak, with a white fur collar and snow in the crest of the room was an Ingrian peasant woman, heating some water in a samovar.

"He is coming to," said the doctor in French; "mortification had not really begun. It's only a slight case of frost-bite, with extreme debility."

"I'm glad to hear it" said the officer, in whom I recognized a certain Major Orloff, one of the imperial aide-de-camp. "The Emperor is truly displeased with the whole affair, and has positively forbidden any bloodshed. But how this Englishman came to wear the yellow knot of ribbon by which Gliska was to be recognized by the conspirators had not yet been plot really come to a head, and had the Czar's person been seized on, is a puzzle to all. I'd lay my life there's some hand in it."

"Very likely," said the doctor, with a sniff; "perhaps Mademoiselle Sophie Lecznikx contrived the mystification when Gliska found out that all was lost, and his arrest imminent. The runaway escape have not been caught, I believe?"

I groaned.

"Come away, doctor," whispered the good-natured aid-de-camp; "the poor fellow may wake and overhear us. And he will know quite soon enough that his fiancée deceived him from the first, and that she will be Madame Gliska when they get in safety across the Prussian frontier, of which the police prefect admits the is no doubt—so artfully were the chevalier's projects laid, to provide the means of escape in case of the failure of the conspiracy. Allons! Bad news flies fast."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY are book-keepers like chickens? — Because they have to "scratch" for a living.

MRS. Partington, hearing that a young man had set up for himself, said, "Poor fellow! Has he no friend that will set up for him? I'm sure he has, and she sighed to be young again.

A person shoving another to Charles Russell, said he must look sharp about him if they said a good thing he did not understand it. "Pray, Sir," said Charles, "did you ever pay Joan?"

A pert blockhead, who thought himself very smart, was once in company with Dean Swift. Rising from his chair, with a design to exit, he added, "For your manners, Mr. Dean, I set up for a wit." "Do you?" said Swift, very gravely, "why then, take my advice and sit down again."

A Quaker came before two judges at an assize as a witness, when he made frequent use of the words also and likewise. "Friend," said one of the judges, "I observe," why do you vary these words so often, have not they both the same signification?" "No, truly," said the Quaker, "their meaning is very different; as, for example, person Bettsworth is a judge upon this bench; thou art one also, but not like-wise."

As a solicitor of rather shabby appearance was passing through Bedford Street the other day, with his professional blue bag under his arm, he was accosted by a Jew, with "Cheese to sell, Sir, old cheese!" The lawyer, somewhat nettled at this address, from a supposition that Moses mistook him for an inhabitant of Roundabout, emitted a bundle of papers from their damask repository, and replied, "No, Sir, they are all new suits."

"Father, did Cæsta, that helped to kill Julius Cæsar, earn a great many honors?" "No, my dear, not that I know of. What makes you think he did?" "Because, father, I am reading here where it says, 'See what a rend the conspirators have made in my toga.'" Any way, ingenuous, and the mother looked delighted as the wisdom of her only son.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LAMBS ABOUT TO MARRY.—Do; but if your husband that is to be is given to gambling, let it be understood from the first to the mutton that you will give it up; and when you put the announcement of your nuptials in the papers, for the information of his bachelor acquaintance, the significant words, "No cards." A young husband who imagines young married weeks ago, and the happy bridegroom so far has not suggested even whist.

MATRIMONIAL EXTREMES HARMONIZED.

Being extracts from the list of bans published in the Preston Guardian for 1863:—

Thomas Black and Mary White,
Peter Day and Eliza Night,
Solomon Banks and Catherine Vale,
Samuel Bull and Susan Dale,
Isaac Sister and Jane Thatcher,
John Baker and Mary Ann Wood,
Daniel Hurly and Peggy Ball,
Roger Lane and Sarah Wright,
Stephen Head and Nancy Heart,
William Stone and Sarah Brook,
Joseph Reed and Helen Hay,
Thomas Green and Mary Wood,
Joseph Brown and Kitty Green,
John Nailor and Jenny Vyse,
William Castle and Nancy Hall,
Henry Spirit and Nancy Wood,
Joseph Men and Eliza Child,
Joseph Sherman and Sarah Wolf,
Thomas Brain and Mary Bear,
James Fox and Catherine Hare,
Alexander Butler and Mary Cock,
William Crane and Nancy Rook,
Andrew Smith and Susan Armour,
Charles Field and Sarah Corner,
Daniel Carrier and Susan Cook,
Joseph Dagger and Ann Knife,
William Large and Salty Small,
John Head and Mary Foot,
Andrew Clay and Lucy Stove,
Michael Bell and Rebecca Pea-en,
John Cheek and Julia Hood,
Edward Cole and Nancy Wood,
James Green and Sarah Birch,
Charles Chapel and Sarah Church,
Joseph Bunny and Nancy Brickle,
Thomas Hitchen and Dorothy Crabbs,
Harmonized by Joseph Clarke, for the Kirkaney Moderator.

June 4, 1863.

IMPORTANCE OF EMPHASIS.—A stranger from the country observing an ordinary roller-cake on the table, took it up and inquired what it was. "Why, sir, that is a cake for counting houses." Too well-bred, as he construed politeness, to ask unnecessary questions, he looked it over and over, and up and down repeatedly, and at last, in a paroxysm of curiosity, he exclaimed, "Well, I'll be darned, in the name of wonder, do you count houses with this?"

Wanted by the miserable—The loaf that produces crumbs of comfort.

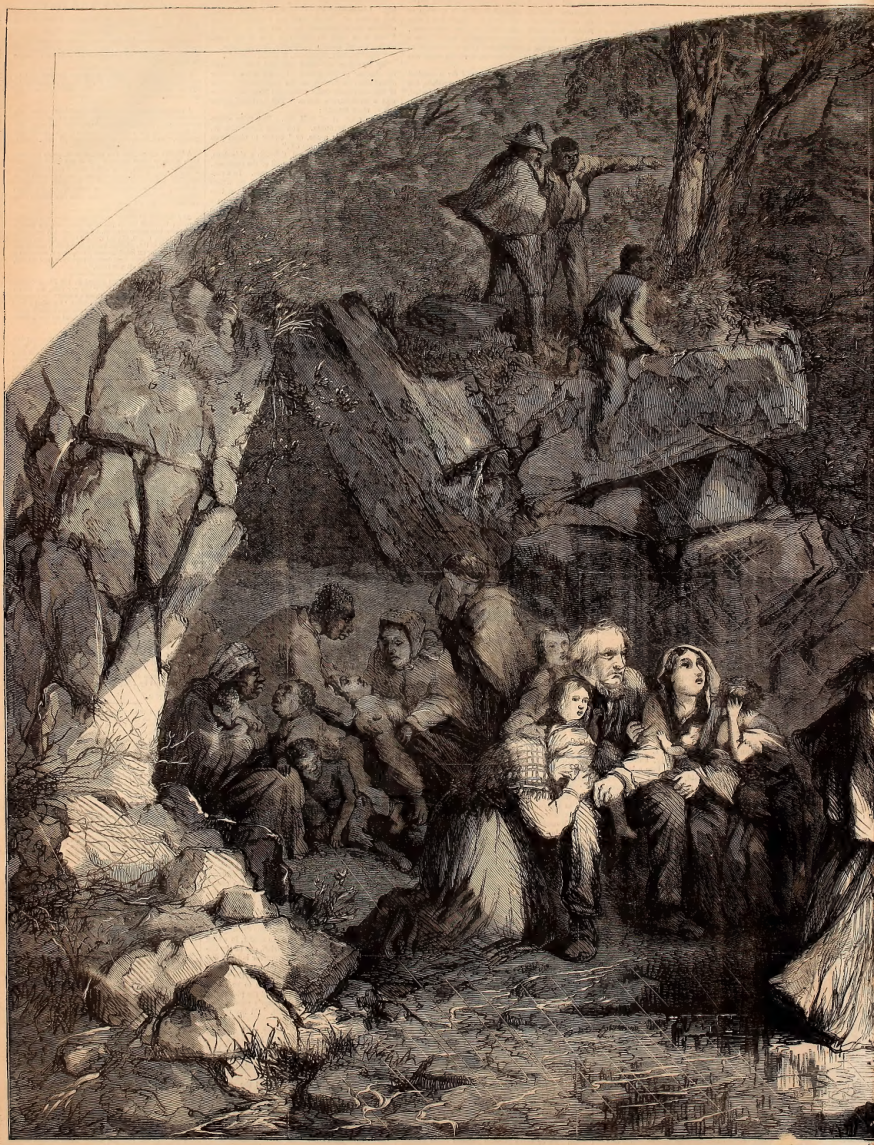
Cannot-ling a man appears to signify making a big gun of him.

When an extravagant friend wishes to borrow your money, consider each of the two you have for him.

"Is there any thing the matter with you?" said a physician to a person who had sent for him. "Oh, dear, yes, I am sick enough." "Well, what ails you?" said I. "I have no particular pain nowhere," was the reply. "Very well," said the doctor; "I'll give you something to take away all that."

MRS. B.—— desired Dr. Johnson to give his opinion of a sermon she had just written, adding that, if it would not do, she begged him to tell her, for she had other irons in the fire. "Why, my dear," said the learned casuist, she could bring out something else. "Then," said the Doctor, after having turned over a few leaves, "I advise you to put it where your other irons are."

AN INTERESTED WAITER.—When Morier Margaret was dining for Jew, Lord Melbourne, Sheridan, who always talked and Scotch upon the benefit, said, "Have you any wine, Sir?" "No, Sir." "No, Sir! how's coy opposition?" "No, I only want an interpreter to make you understand what your host says." "Why, Sir, he is civiled with a burst of laughter by the whole court, in which Jew himself heartily joined.



What the Emperor of France does when weary with State cares. Takes his little Nap.

A contemporary, in speaking of a newly-invented "metallic burial case," says: "It will last a long time," and is highly recommended by those who have used it.

"I have always been astonished," said Miss Smith, "at the anxiety of young ladies for husbands, and of old ones for sons-in-law." "I wonder Miss Smith," said Jew, what she Seeing her gazing toward the sky, "I wonder what she finds to look at." "That bear," said she, "which is told of as being "sat in the cloud." I wish he'd come down."

"I say, Brown, what's close shaver Jones-is—why, he'll assuredly shave a penny?" "Well, what if he does?" said Brown; "the less one expatiates about the better."

"How do you like tea, now?" asked a belle of her guests, as she sailed into the room, with a sweeping train of muslin following her. "Well," said he, "to tell you the truth, it is impossible for me to like you any longer."

SOUTHERN EXILES ON THEIR

WAY NORTH.—[See Page 603.]

VERY HARD CASH.

BY CHARLES READE, ESQ.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THERE was not a moment to lose, so Green emptied the pocket-book into his hat, and sifted the contents in a turn of the hand, announcing each discovery in a whisper to his excited and peering associates:

"A lot of receipts."

"Of no use to any one but me," said the prisoner, earnestly.

"Two miniatures; gold rims, pinchbeck backs."

"They are portraits of my children when young: Heaven forgive me, I could not give them up to my creditors: surely, surely, you will not rob me of them."

"Stash your gab," said Mr. Green, roughly. "Here's a guinea, Queen Anne's reign."

"It belonged to my great-grandfather: take it, but you will let me redeem it; I will give £5 for it, poor as I am: you can leave it on my door-step, and I'll leave the £5."

"Stow your gab. Letters; papers covered with figures. Stay, what is this? a lot of memoranda."

"They are of the most private and delicate character. Pray do not expose my family misfortunes." And Mr. Hardie, who of late had been gathering composure, showed some signs of agitation; the two figures glaring over his shoulder shared it, and his remonstrance once made Green examine the papers keenly: they might contain some clew to the missing money. It proved a miscellaneous record: the price of Stocks at various days; notes of the official assignee's remarks in going over the books, etc. At last, however, Green's quick eye fell upon a fainter entry in pencil; figures: 1, 4; yes, actually £14,000. "All right," he said: and took the paper close to the lantern, and began to spell it out:

"'This day Alfred told me to my face I had £14,000 of Captain Dodd's. We had an angry discussion. What can he mean? Drs. Wycherley and Osmond, this same day, afflicted me with hints that he is deranged, or partly. I saw no signs of it before. Wrote to my brother entreating him to give me £200 to replace the sum which I really have wronged this respectable and now most afflicted family of. I had better withdraw—'" Here Mr. Hardie interrupted him with sorrowful dignity: "These are mere family matters; if you are a man, respect them."

Green went reading on like Fate: "'Better withdraw my opposition to the marriage, or else it seems my own flesh and blood will go about the place blackening my reputation.'"

Mr. Hardie stamped on the ground. "I tell you on my honor as a gentleman there is no money there but my grandfather's guinea. My money is all in my waistcoat pocket, where you will not look."

A flutter of uneasiness seemed to come over the detective: he darkened his lantern, and replaced the pocket-book hurriedly in the prisoner's breast, felt him all over in a minute, and, to keep up the farce, robbed him.

"Only eight yellow boys," said he contemptuously to his mates. He then slipped the money back into Hardie's coat-pocket, and conducted him to his own gate, tied him to it by the waist, and ordered him not to give the alarm for ten minutes on pain of death.

"I consent," said Mr. Hardie, "and thank you for abstaining from violence."

"All right, my tulip," said Mr. Green, cheerfully; and drew his companions quietly away. But the next moment he began to run, and, making a sudden turn, dived into a street, then into a passage, and so winded and doubled till he got to a small public house: he used some flash word, and they were shown a private room. "Wait here an hour for me," he whispered; "I must see who liberates him, and whether he is really as innocent as he reads, or we have been countermined by the Devil's own tutor."

The unexpected turn the evidence had taken, evidence of their own choosing, too, cleared Mr. Hardie with the unprofessionals. Edward embraced this conclusion as a matter of course, and urged the character of that gentleman's solitary traducer; Alfred was a traitor, and therefore why not a slanderer?

Even Sampson, on the whole, inclined to a similar conclusion.

At this crisis of the discussion a red-haired peddler, with very large whiskers and the remains of a black eye, put his head in, and asked whether Tom Green was there. "No," said the Doctor, stoutly, not desiring company of this stamp. "Don't know the lad."

The peddler laughed: "There is not many that do know him at all hours; however, he is here, Sir." And he whipped off the red hair, and wiped off the black eye, and lo! Green ipse. He received their compliments on his Protean powers, and told them he had been just a minute too late; Mr. Hardie was gone, and so he had lost the chance of seeing who came to help him, and of hearing the first words that passed between the two: this, he said, was a very great pity; for it would have shown him in one moment whether certain suspicions of his were correct. Pressed as to what these suspicions were, he begged to be excused saying any more for the present. The doctor, however, would not let him off so, but insisted on his candid opinion.

"Well, Sir," said Green, "I never was more puzzled in my life, owing to not being near hand when he was untied. It looks all square, however. There's only one little thing that don't fit somehow."

They both asked in a breath what that was.

"The sovs. were all marked."

They asked how he knew; and had he got them in his pocket to show?

Green uttered a low chuckling laugh: "What me fake the beans, now I live on this side the hedge? never knew a cove mix his liquors that way but it hurt his health soon or late. No, I took them out of one pocket, and felt of them as I slipped them into the other. Ye see, gents, to do any good on my lay, a man must train his senses as well as his mind: he must have a hare's ear, and a hawk's eye, a blood-hound's nose, and a lady's hand with steel fingers and a silk skin. Now look at that bunch of fives," continued the master; and laid a hand white and soft as a duchess's on the table: "it can put the bracelets on a giant, or find a sharper's nail-mark on the back of the knave of clubs. The beans were marked. Which it is a small thing, but it don't fit the rest. Here's an unsuspicious gent took by surprise, in moonlight meditation fancy free, and all his little private family matters found in his innocent bosom quite promiscuous; but his beans marked: that don't dovetail nohow. Gents, did ever you hear of the man that went to the bottom of the bottomless pit to ease his mind? Well he was the head of my family: I must go to the bottom whether there's one or not. And just now I see but one way."

"And what is that?" inquired both his companions in some alarm.

"Oh, I mustn't threaten it," said Green, "or I shall never have the stomach to do it. But dear me, this boozing ken is a very unfit place for you, you are Champagne-gents not dog's nose ones. Now you part and make tracks for home, one on foot, and one in a fly. You won't see me, nor hear of me again, till I've something fresh."

And so the confederates parted, and Sampson and Edward met at Albion Villa; and Edward told his mother what they had done, and his conviction that Mr. Hardie was innocent, and Alfred a slanderer as well as a traitor: "And indeed," said he, "if we had but stopped to reflect, we should have seen how unlikely the money was not to be lost in the Agra. Why the 'Tiser says she went to pieces almost directly she struck. What we ought to have done was, not to listen to Alfred Hardie like fools, but write to Lloyd's like people in their senses. I'll do it this minute, and find out the surviving officers of the ship: they will be able to give us information on that head." Mrs. Dodd approved; and said she would write to her kind correspondent Mrs. Beresford: and she did sit down to her desk at once. As for Sampson he returned to town next morning, not quite convinced, but thoroughly staggered; and determined for once to resign his own judgment, and abide the result of Mrs. Dodd's correspondence and Mr. Green's sagacity. All he insisted on was, that his placard about Alfred should be continued: he left money for this, and Edward against the grain consented to see it done. But placards are no monopoly: in the afternoon only a section of Sampson's was visible in most parts of the town by reason of a poster to this effect pasted half over it:

"FIFTY GUINEAS REWARD.

"Whereas yesterday evening at 10 o'clock Richard Hardie Esq., of Musgrove Cottage, Barkington, was assaulted at his own door by three ruffians, who rifled his pockets, and read his private memoranda, and committed other acts of violence, the shock of which has laid him on a bed of sickness, the above reward shall be paid to any person or persons who will give such information as shall lead to the detection of all or any one of the miscreants concerned in this outrage.

The above reward will be paid by Mr. Thomas Hardie of Clare Court Yorkshire."

On this the impartial police came to Mr. Hardie's and made inquiries. He received them in bed, and told them particulars: and they gathered from Peggy that she had heard a cry of distress, and opened the kitchen door; and that Betty and she had ventured out together, and found poor master tied to the gate with an old cord; this she produced, and the police inspected and took it away with them.

At sight of the Notice, Edward felt cold and then hot, and realized the false and perilous position into which he had been betrayed: "So much for being wiser than the law," he said: "what are we now but three foot-pads?" This, and the insult his sister had received, made the place poison to him; and hastened their departure by a day or two: the very next day (Thursday) an affiche on the walls of Albion Villa announced that Mr. Chippenham, auctioneer, would sell next Wednesday on the premises, the greater part of the furniture, plate, china, glass, Oriental inlaid boxes and screens, with several superb India shawls, scarfs, and dresses; also a twenty-one years' lease of the villa; seventeen to run.

Edward took unfurnished apartments in London, near Russell Square: a locality in which, as he learned from the 'Tiser, the rooms were large and cheap; he packed just so much furniture as was essential; no nick-nacks. It was to go by rail on Monday; Mrs. Dodd and Julia were to follow on Tuesday: Edward to stay at Barkington and look after the sale.

Meantime their secret ally, Mr. Green, was preparing his threatened coup. The more he reflected the more he suspected that he had been outwitted by Peggy Black; she had led him on, and the pocket-book had been planted for him. If so, why Peggy was a genius, and in his own line; and he would marry her, and so kill two birds with one stone: make a Detective of her (there was a sad lack of female Detectives); and, once his wife, she would split on her master, and he should defeat that old soldier at last, and get a handsome slice of the £14,000.

He manœuvred thus; first, he went back to London for a day or two to do other jobs, and to let this matter cool: then he returned, and wrote from a town near Barkington to Peggy Black, telling her he had been sent away suddenly on a job, but his heart had remained behind with his Peggy: would she meet him at the gate at nine that evening? He had something very particular to say to her. As to the nature of the business the inclosed would give her a hint. She might name her own day, and the sooner the better.

The inclosed was a wedding-ring.

At nine this extraordinary pair of lovers met at the gate; but Peggy seemed hardly at her ease; said her master would be coming out and catching her; perhaps they had better walk up the road a bit. "With all my heart," said Green; but he could not help a little sneer: "Your master?" said he: "why, he is your servant, as I am. What, is he jealous?"

"I don't know what you mean, young man," said Peggy.

"I'll tell you when we are married."

"La, that is a long time to wait for my answer: why, we ain't asked in church yet."

"There's no need of that; I can afford a special license."

"Lawk-a-daisy: why, you be a gentleman, then."

"No, but I can keep my wife like a lady."

"You sounds very tempting," murmured Peggy, throwing her skirt over her head—for a drizzle was beginning—and walking slower and slower.

Then he made hot love to her, and pressed her hard to name the day.

She coquetted with the question till they came near the mouth of a dark lane, called lovers' walk; then, as he insisted on an answer, she hung her head bashfully and coughed a little cough. At which preconcerted signal a huge policeman sprang out of the lane and collared Mr. Green.

On this Peggy, who was all Lie from head to heel, uttered a little scream of dismay and surprise.

Mr. Green laughed.

"Well, you are a downy one," said he. "I'll marry you all the more for this."

The Detective put his hands suddenly inside the policeman's, caught him by the bosom with his right hand by way of fulcrum; and with his left by the chin, which he forced violently back, and gave him a slight Cornish trip at the same moment; down went the policeman on the back of his head a fearful crack: Green then caught the astonished Peggy round the neck, kissed her lips violently, and fled like the wind; removed all traces of his personal identity, and up to London by the train in the character of a young swell, with a self-fitting eye-glass and a long mustache the color of his tender mistress's eye-brow: tow.

From town he wrote to her, made her a formal offer of marriage; and gave her an address to write to "should she at any time think more kindly of him and of his sincere affection."

I suppose he specified sincere because it was no longer sincere: he hurled the offer into Musgrove Cottage by way of an apple of discord; at least so I infer from the memorandum, with which he retired at present from the cash-hunt.

"Mr. Hardie has the stiff, I think: but, if so, it is planted somewhere; doesn't carry it about him; my Peggy is his mistress: nothing to be done till they split."

Victorious so far, Mr. Hardie had still one pressing anxiety; Dr. Sampson's placard: this had been renewed, and stared him every where in the face. Every copy of it he encountered made him shiver: if he had been a man of impulse, he would have torn it down wherever he saw it: but he knew that would not do. However, learning from Jane, who had it from old Betty, who had it from Sarah, that Mrs. and Miss Dodd would leave for London the day before the sale, and Edward the day after it, he thought he might venture in the busy intermediate time to take some liberties with it. This he did with excellent tact and judgment; Peggy and a bill-sticker were seen in conference, and, soon after, the huge bills of a traveling circus were pasted right over both the rival advertisements in which the name of Hardie figured. The consequence was, Edward raised no objection; he was full of the sale for one thing; but I suspect he was content to see his own false move pasted over on such easy terms.

On the Monday morning Peggy brought in the letters, and Jane saw one in Alfred's handwriting. She snatched it up, and cried, "Papa, from Alfred!" and she left off making the tea, while her father opened it with comparative composure.

This coolness, however, did not outlast the perusal: "The young ruffian!" said he: "would you believe it, Jenny, he accuses me of being the cause of his last business."

"Let me see, papa."

He held her out the letter; but hesitated and drew it back: "My dear, it would give you pain to see your poor father treated so. Here's a specimen: 'What could they expect but that the son of a sharper would prove a traitor? You stole her money; I her affections, of which I am unworthy.' Now what do you think of that?"

"Unhappy Alfred!" said Jane: "No, papa, I would not read it, if you are insulted in it. But where is he?"

"The letter is dated Paris. See!" And he showed her the date: "but he says here, he is coming back to London directly; and he orders me in the most peremptory way to be ready with my accounts, and pay him over his fortune. Well, he is alive at all events: really my good, kind, interfering, pragmatical friend Sampson with his placards made me feel uneasy, more uneasy than I would own to you, Jenny."

"Unhappy Alfred!" cried Jane, with the tears in her eyes; "and poor papa!"

"Oh never mind me," said Mr. Hardie; "now that I know no harm has come to him, I really don't care a straw: I have got one child that loves me, and that I love."

"Ah yes dear, dear papa, and that will always love you, and never, never, disobey you in small things or great." She rose from table and sealed this with a pious kiss; and, when she sat down with a pink flush on her delicate cheek, his hard eye melted and dwelt on her with beaming tenderness. His heart yearned over her, and a pang went through it: to think that he must deceive even her, the one sweet soul that loved him!

It was a passing remorse: the successful plotter soon predominated, and it was with unmixed satisfaction he saw her put on her bonnet directly after breakfast, and hurry off to Albion Villa to play the part of his unconscious sieve.

He himself strolled in the opposite direction not to seem to be watching her.

He was in good spirits; felt like a general, who, after repulsing many desperate attacks successfully, orders an advance, and sees the tide of battle roll away from his bayonets. His very body seemed elastic, indomitable; he walked lustily out into the country, sniffed the perfumed hedges, and relished life. To be sure he could not walk away from all traces of his misdeeds; he fell in with objects that to an ordinary sinner might have spoiled the walk, and even marred the spring-time; he found his creditor Maxley with grizzly beard, and bloodshot eyes, belaboring a mile-stone; and two small boys quizzing him, and pelting him with mud: and soon after, he met his creditor, old Dr. Phillips, in a cart coming back to Barkington to end his days there, in an alms-house. But to our triumphant Bankrupt and Machiavel these things were literally nothing; he paced complacently on, and cared no more for either of those his wrecks than the smiling sea itself seems to care for the dead ships and men it washed ashore a week ago.

He came home before luncheon for his gossip with Jane; but she had not returned. All the better; her budget would be larger.

To while the time he got his file of the Times, and amused himself noting down the fluctuations in Peruvian bonds.

While thus employed he heard a loud knock at his door, and soon after Peggy's voice and a man's in swift collision. Hasty feet came along the passage, the parlor door opened, and a young man rushed in pale as ashes, and stared at him; he was breathless, and his lips moved, but no sound came.

It was Edward Dodd.

Mr. Hardie rose like a tower and manned himself to repulse this fresh assault.

The strange visitor gasped out, "You are wanted at our house!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

JANE HARDIE found Albion Villa in the miserable state that precedes an auction; the house raw, its contents higgledy-piggledy. The stair carpets, and drawing-room carpets, were up, and in rolls in the dining-room; the bulk of the furniture was there too; the auction was to be in that room. The hall was clogged with great packages, and littered with small, all awaiting the railway carts; and Edward, dusty and deliquescent, was cording, strapping, and nailing them at the gallop, in his shirt sleeves.

Jane's heart sank at the visible signs of his departure. She sighed; and then, partly to divert his attention, told him hastily there was a letter from Alfred. On this he ran up stairs and told Mrs. Dodd; and she came down stairs, and took Jane up softly to her friend's room.

They opened the door gently, and Jane saw the grief she was come to console; or to embitter.

Such a change! instead of the bright, elastic, impetuous, young beauty, there sat a pale, languid girl with "weary of the world" written on every part of her eloquent body; her right hand dangled by her side, and on the ground beneath it lay a piece of work she had been attempting; but it had escaped from those listless fingers: her left arm was stretched at full length on the table with an unspeakable abandon, and her brow laid wearily on it above the elbow. So lies the wounded bird, so droops the broken lily.

She did not move for Jane's light foot. She often sat thus, a drooping statue, and let people come and go unheeded.

Jane's heart yearned for her. She came softly and laid a little hand lightly on her shoulder, and true to her creed that we must look upward for consolation, said in her ear, and in solemn, silvery tones, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Julia turned at this and flung her arms round Jane's neck, and panted heavily.

Jane kissed her, and, with the tears in her eyes, proceeded to pour out, from a memory richly stored with Scripture, those blessed words it is full of, words that in our hours of ease or biblical criticism pass over the mind like some drowsy chime; but in the bitter day of anguish and bereavement, when the body is racked, the soul darkened, shine out like stars to the mariner; seem then first to swell to their real size and meaning, and come to writhing mortals like pitying seraphim, divinity on their faces and healing on their wings.

Julia sighed heavily: "Ah," she said, "these are sweet words. But I am not ripe for them. You show me the true path of happiness: but I don't want to be happy; it's him I want to be happy. If the angels came for me and took me to heaven this moment, I should be miserable there, if I thought he was in eternal torment; ay, I should be as miserable there as I am here. Oh Jane, when God means to comfort me, He will show me he is alive; till then words are wasted on me, even Bible words."

"Tell her your news, my dear," said Mrs. Dodd, quietly. She was one of those who take human nature as it is, and make the best of it.

"Julia dear," said Jane, "your fears are extravagant, indeed: Alfred is alive, we know."

Julia trembled, but said nothing.

"He has written to-day."

"Ah! To you?"

"No, to papa."

"I don't believe it. Why to him?"

"But I saw the letter, dear; I had it in my hand."

"Did you read it?" asked Julia, trembling now like an aspen, and fluttering like a bird.

"No, but I read the address, and the date inside, and I saw the handwriting; and I was offered the letter, but papa told me it was full of abuse of him, so I declined" to read it; however, I will get it for you."

Mrs. Dodd thanked her warmly; but asked, her if she could not in the mean time give some idea of the contents.

"Oh yes, Mrs. Dodd: papa read me out a great deal of it. He was in Paris, but just starting for London: and he demanded his money and his accounts. You know papa is one of his trustees."

"Well, but," said Mrs. Dodd, "was there nothing—nothing about—"

"Oh yes there was," said Jane, "only I—well then for dear Julia's sake—the letter said, 'What remains of the son of a sharper should prove a traitor?' You have stolen her money, and I am afraid—oh, I can't, I can't."

And Jane Hardie began to cry.

Mrs. Dodd embraced her like a mother, and entered into her feelings: Mrs. Dodd had never seen her so weak, and, therefore, never thought her so amiable. Thus occaped they did not at first observe how these tidings were changing Julia.

But presently looking up they saw her standing at her full height, on fire with wrath and insulted pride.

"Ah, you have brought me comfort, this cried. 'Womans, I shall hate and scorn this man some day, as much as I hate and scorn myself now for every tear I have shed for him."

They tried to calm her, but in vain; a new gust of passion possessed the ardent young creature, and would have vent. She reddened from bosom to brow, and the scalding tears ran down her flaming cheeks, and she repeated between her clenched teeth, "My words are so filled with skim-milk I can tell you: you have seen how I can love, you shall see how I can hate." And with that went haughtily and indignant out to expose the passion which overpowered her.

Mrs. Dodd took advantage of her absence to thank Jane for her kindness, and told her she had also received some letters by this morning's post, and should be under the necessity of leaving her part nor just to conceal their purport from her. She then read her a letter from Mrs. Beresford, and another from Mr. Grey, in answer to queries about the £14,000.

Sharpe, I may as well observe, was at sea; Bayliss diverted.

Mrs. Beresford knew nothing about the matter.

Mr. Gray was positive Captain Dodd, when in command, had several thousand pounds in his cabin: Mrs. Beresford's Indian servant had been detected trying to steal it, and put in irons; he lieved the lady had not been told the cause—out of delicacy: and Captain Roberts had likewise told him. As to whether the money had escaped the wreck—if on Captain Dodd's person it might have been saved: but if not, it was certainly lost: for Captain Dodd to his knowledge had run on deck from the passenger's cabin the moment the ship struck, and had remained there till she went to pieces; and every thing was washed out of her.

"Our only consolation," said Mrs. Dodd, "I mean Edward's and mine, is now, that the money was lost in the ship; and you can tell your papa so, if you like."

Jane thanked her, and said she thought so too; and what a sad thing it was.

Soon after this Julia returned, pale and calm as a statue, and sat down humbly beside Jane:

"Oh, pray with me," she said: "pray that I may not have been base to be wicked; and pray that I may not love, for to love is to be miserable."

Mrs. Dodd retired, with her usual tact and self-denial.

Then Jane Hardie, being alone with her friend, and full of sorrow, sympathy, and faith, found words of eloquence almost divine to raise her.

With these pious consolations Julia's pride and self-respect now co-operated; relieved of her great terror she felt her insult to her lovers' ends: "I'll never degrade myself so far as to pine for another lady's lover," she said. "I'll resume my duties in another sphere, and try to face the world by degrees. I am not quite alone in it: I have my mother still—and my Redeemer."

Some tears forced their way at these brave, gentle words, that gave her time.

Then she said: "Begin by putting on your bonnet, and visiting with me. Come with one who is herself thwarted in the carnal affections: come with her and see how sick some are, and we two in health; how racked with pain some are, and we two at ease; how hungry some, and we have abundance; and, above all, in what spiritual desserts some lie, while we walk in the gospel light."

* This was one of those involuntary insecurrsche which creep into mortal statements.

"Oh that I had the strength," said Julia; "I'll try."

She put on her bonnet, and went down with her friend: but at the street door the strange feeling of shame overpowered her: she blushed, and trem bled, and begged to substitute the garden for so road. Jane consented, and said every thing must have a beginning.

"You little angel," said she, "I see something of her old impetuosity, "you have saved me, was making myself worse by shutting myself up in that one miserable room."

They walked hand in hand for a good half hour, and then Jane said she must go: papa would keep dinner, and was sorry to part with her, and almost without thinking accompanied her through the house to the front gate, and that was another gate passed. "I never was so sorry to part with you, love," said she. "When will you come again? We leave to-morrow. I am selfish to detain you; but it seems as if my guardian angel was leaving me."

Jane smiled. "I must go," said she, "but I leave better angels than I am behind me. I leave you this: 'Humble yourself under the mighty hand of God.' When it seems most harsh, then it is most loving. Pray for faith to say with me, 'Lead us by a way that we know not.'"

They kissed one another, and Julia stood at the gate and looked lovingly after her, with the tears standing thick in her own sweet eyes.

Now Maxley was coming down the road, all grizzly and bloodshot, baited by the boys, who had gradually swelled in number as he drew nearer the town.

Jane was shocked at their heathenish cruelty, and would fain have driven the wretches away.

Instantly Maxley fell upon her, and began beating her about the head and shoulders with his heavy stick.

The miserable boys uttered yells of dismay, but did nothing.

Julia uttered a violent scream, but flew to her friend's aid, and crying "Oh, you wretch! you wretch!" actually caught the man by the throat and shook him. Maxley let go his hold of Jane Hardie, who instantly sank moaning on the ground, and he cowered like a cur at the voice and the touch of the daughter of the excited girl.

The stir filled with cries, and Edward ran out of the house to see what was the matter; but on the spot nobody was game enough to come between the furious man and the weak one. The consequence was her impetuous courage began to flag, and her eye to waver; the demented man found that out by some half sentient instinct, and instantly caught her by the shoulder and whirled her down on her knees: then raised his staff high to strike her.

She screamed, and was just putting up her hands, woman-like, not to see her death as well as feel it, when the stick fell, but without her: a rushing wind, a blow, that sounded exactly like that of a paving ram, caught Maxley on the jaw; and there was Edward Dodd down-ing like a grampus with rage, and Maxley on his back in the road; but men under cerebral excitement are not easily stunned, and knew no pain: he bounded off the ground, and came at Edward like a Spanish bull. Edward slipped aside, and caught him another tremendous blow that sent him staggering, and his bludgeon flew out of his hand, and Edward caught it; lo! the maniac flew at him again more fiercer than ever: but the young Hercules had seen Jane bleeding on the ground, and the fire of battle in full career such a murderous stroke with the bludgeon, that the people, who were running from all quarters, shouted, "Stop, Edward, for Jane, but for Maxley; and well they might: that awful stroke laid him senseless, motionless, and mute, in a pool of blood.

"Don't kill him, Sir; don't kill the man," was the cry.

"Why not?" said Edward, sternly. He then kneeled over his sweet-heart and lifted her in his arms like a child. Her bonnet was all broken, her eyes were closed upward and set, and a little blood trickled down her cheek; and that cheek seemed streaked white and red.

He was terrified, agonized; yet he gasped out, "You are safe, dear; don't be frightened."

She knew the voice.

"Oh, Edward!" she said, piteously and tenderly: and then moaned a little on his broad shoulder. He carried her into the house out of the crowd.

The poor old doctor, coming in to end his days in the Indian Archipelago, had all: he got out of his cart and hobbled up. He had been in the army, and had both experience and skill. He got her bathed and off, and at sight of her head looked very grave.

In a minute a bed was laid in the drawing-room, and all the women in the house—and Edward, trembling now in every limb, ran to Musgrove Cottage, while Mrs. Dodd and Julia loosened the poor girl's dress, and bathed her wounds with tepid water (the doctor would not have cold), and put wine carefully to her lips with a tea-spoon.

"Wanted at your house, pray what for?" said Mr. Hardie, superciliously.

"Oh, Sir," said Edward, "such a calamity! Pray come directly. Captain has struck her, has hurt her terri , terribly."

"Her? Who?" asked Mr. Hardie, beginning to be uneasy.

"Who? why Jane, your daughter, man; and there you sit chattering, instead of coming at once."

Mr. Hardie rose hurriedly and put on his hat, and accompanied him, half confused.

Soon Edward's mute agitation communicated itself to him, and he went striding and trembling by his side.

The crowd had gone with insensible Maxley to the hospital; but the traces of the terrible combat were there. Where Maxley fell the last time, a bullock seemed to have been slaughtered at the least.

The miserable father came on this, and gave a great cream like a woman, and staggered back white as a sheet.

Edward laid his hand on him, for he seemed scarce able to stand.

"No, no, no," he cried, comprehending the mistake at last; "that is not here—Heaven forbid! That is the madman's who did it; I knocked him down with his own cudgel."

"God bless you! you have killed him I hope."

"Oh, Sir, be more merciful, and then perhaps God will be merciful to us, and not take this angel from us."

"No! no! you are right: good young man. I little thought I had such a friend in your house."

"Don't deceive yourself, Sir; it's not you I care for: I love her."

At this bold declaration, so new and so offensive to him, Mr. Hardie winced, and stopped, bewildered.

But they were at the gate, and Edward hurried him on. As the house door he drew back once more; for he felt a shiver of repugnance at entering the house, of whose happiness he was the destroyer.

But cast it he must, and he did.

The wife of the poor Captain he had driven mad met him in the passage, her motherly eyes full of tears for him, and both hands held out to him like a pitying angel.

"Oh, Mr. Hardie," she said, in a broken voice, and with a sweet smile, and both hands, and led him, wonder-struck, stupefied, shivering with dark fears, to the room where his crushed daughter lay.

THE DIPLOMATIC EXCURSION.

WE publish on page 593 a reproduction of a photograph taken by Mr. W. J. Baker, of Utica, New York, representing the Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD CONDUCTING OF THE MEMBERS OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS AT TRENTON FALLS. Mr. Seward and the various foreign Ministers left Washington a few weeks since for a tour to the Watering-places, and visited Niagara, Trenton Falls, Saratoga, etc. While at Trenton Falls they were caught by Mr. Baker, and persuaded to sit for the photograph which he has kindly permitted us to use. The gentlemen represented in the picture are the following, and may be identified by the numbers affixed to them:

1. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.
2. BARON DE STOECKEL, Russian Minister.
3. M. MERCIER, French Minister.
4. LORD LYONS, British Minister.
5. M. MATSUDAIRA, Japanese Minister.
6. M. SOELLNER, Hanseatic Minister.
7. M. HERTSLETT, Italian Minister.
8. COUNT PIERS, Swedish Minister.
9. M. HOFFMAN, Prussian Legation.
10. MR. SHEFFIELD, Attaché of British Legation.
11. MR. BOULLIOT, State Department, U. S.

Mr. Baker, whose success in taking this picture has been very remarkable, is selling large numbers of copies, both in the large size at $3.00 and in card form at $0.50. They may be procured of Gaupil & Co., in this city.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

WE publish on pages 596 and 597 three illustrations of General Gilmore's operations before Charleston, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE SALUTE AT BREAK OF DAY.

"MORRIS ISLAND, Aug. 31, 1863.

"May be that the report of the 'Journal of Civilization' will say, as they read the caption to this letter, 'Sunrise gun; so the night is passed in quiet repose.' Ah, if the reader would certainly know, could he but see each morning the lifeless clay borne from the trenches, all its record being 'Killed in the night.'

"The firing at night is not, however, quite so heavy as during the day—may be the men are fatigued, may be the gunners are not so sure of their aim. The break of day is often the time for a salute that seems to shake the whole island quake.

"The sketch shows, I think, the most comprehensive obtainable view of the 'situation,' as we say by the camp fires in availing themselves of each swell and rift of sand for cover. The material and work are so vastly different from that at Yorktown that I find myself wondering, when in the trenches, 'Where shall I dodge next?'

"THE REBEL TORPEDOES.

"Since the assault upon Fort Wagner the rebels have planted torpedoes in the channel in front of their works. As we come to these with our saps they are removed with care and safety.

"A few nights ago, by the accidental explosion of one of these machines, a negro corporal of the Third United States Colored Regiment was blown out of the saps, and the next morning was seen, dead and entirely nude, evidently placed as a bait by the rebels for the Yankee torpedoes, they undoubtedly thinking that we would attempt his removal for burial on the coming night, and explode the trap. Not so: the saps went quietly on; and when at last the body was reached the whole affair was dug out—the negro buried, and the torpedo reserved for use, if need be.

"THE SWAMP ANGEL.

"One of our batteries upon Morris Island, built under exceeding difficulties, is looked upon with so much pride and interest by our brave soldiers that this sketch of it, by the light of a just full moon, will no doubt please the anxious ones at home, who look with glad eyes upon the rapid progress of this siege.

"Who built the battery and where it is is a sort of a secret that we are keeping from the rebels; as for a time the names, place, and kind of batteries are withheld."

UNION REFUGEES.

WE devote pages 600 and 601 to an illustration of SOUTHERN REFUGEES FLYING NORTHWARD. This is a scene which may be witnessed almost daily on any highway in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri. Vast portions of those States have been absolutely desolated by the war. Houses, barns, bridges, fences, gardens have been obliterated by the ravages of the soldiers, and countless families, many of them bred in affluence, and delicately reared, have been thrown upon the world, without food, money, clothing, or shelter. We hear daily of tales of suffering among these Southern exiles which barrow the soul.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

OUR artist, Mr. Waud, is enjoying the rest which has been vouchsafed to the Army of the Potomac; he has, however, made some sketches of visits to the Warrenton Sulphur Springs, which we reproduce on page 605. He writes:

"WARRENTON SULPHUR SPRINGS.

"This famous resort of bogus aristocracy was laid in ruins by Sigel's division at the time when Pope took his brilliant flank movement upon Washington. The Hotel proper is entirely destroyed; but the building known as 'Rowdy Hall,' and the others in the grounds remain—the former occupied as a hospital. In the grounds, under the grateful shadow of the trees—some of which show the marks of shell or canister—the First Division Head-quarters of the Third Corps, forcibly reminding the spectator of an Arab encampment at the foot of some secluded Oasis. This is especially the case at night, when the moon, lighting up the shattered columns and white tents, gives a ghostly and picturesque effect to the scene. The deepest shadows falling with softening influence on the harsh outlines of the ruin.

"The Springs attract a great number of officers and men by their supposed beneficial effect on the blood. The water is cold and clear, but not pleasant, tasting strongly of sulphur, worse of sulphureted hydrogen. It has occasionally been taken mixed with Red Rye; but it is fairly remarked that, though the water might be improved in that way, the whisky is certainly spoiled.

"GENERAL PATRICK'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

"During General Patrick's absence from camp this pretty bower was raised, as a token of esteem, by two Companies of the Twentieth New York Volunteers. Some of the men had been sent by the officers who enlisted them as to the length of time they were to serve. They had been told that they should, and deserved to, go home with the rest of the regiment; being left behind they refused to do duty, and were tried and sentenced. General Patrick, Provost Marshal of the Army, feeling that they were harshly used, procured their pardon and dismissal from service. These poor Germans had had the means to offer any costly present, but their humble offering was as acceptable to the General as if it had cost thousands. They are said to be superior set of men, and propose to enlist again as soon as they have seen their friends."

THE DESTRUCTION OF LAWRENCE, KANSAS.

WE illustrate on page 604 the BURNS of the once thriving city of Lawrence, Kansas, which was destroyed in fortnight since by Quantrell and his fellow-brigands. The attack on the place and the massacre of the citizens is unparalleled in history, and even casts into the shade the famous massacre of Cawnpore. We condense from the Herald the following account of the outrage:

The massacre took place at the noon of night, and the startled peaceful citizens were sent to their last account by the bullets of the assassins in the places of their burning homes, and in the agonized embraces of their wives and children. Not a house was spared, and scarcely a man will have fallen victims. These comprise the principal citizens, with the exception of such as are in the field. There does not appear to have been any resistance whatever offered. In the early morning of Saturday guerrillas—a regiment of the scenes that used to be enacted on earth—by the sacrilegious Indians, when villages were given to the flames by some Monster Brandt.

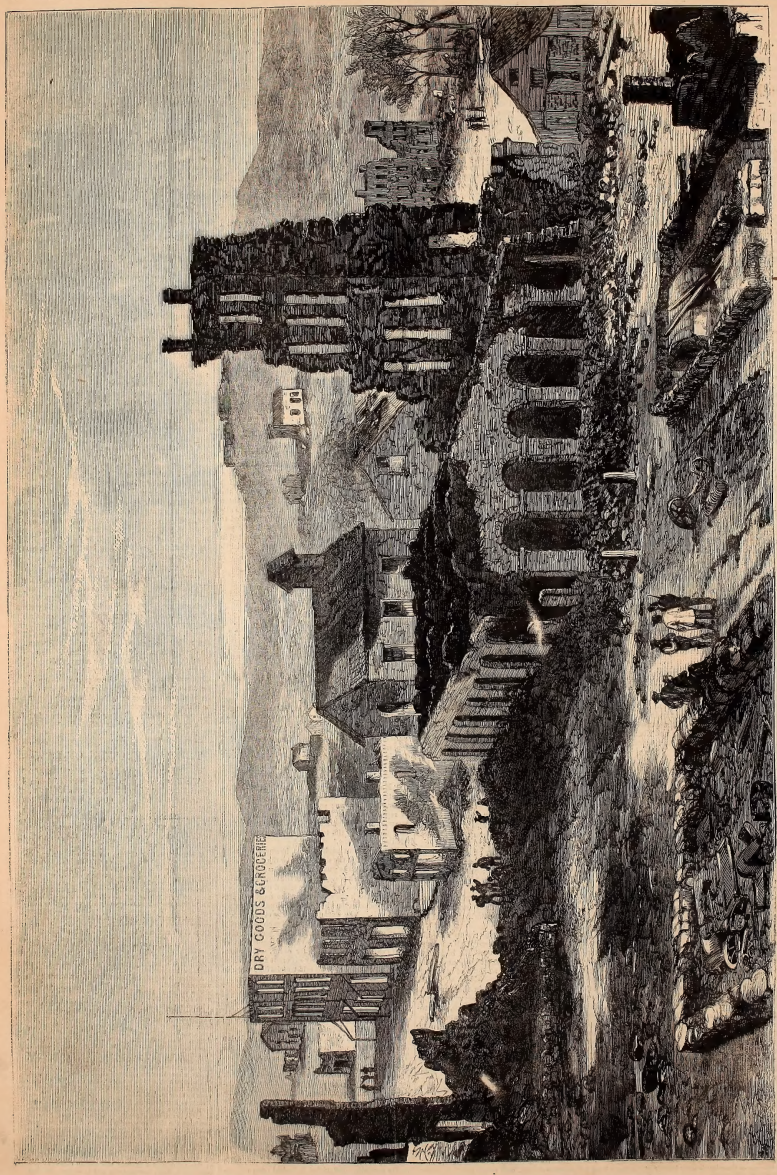
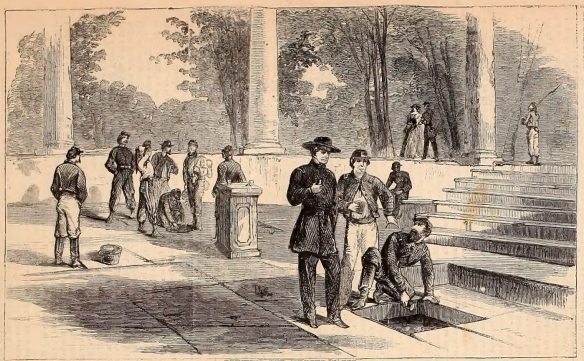
With all his howling, desolating band.



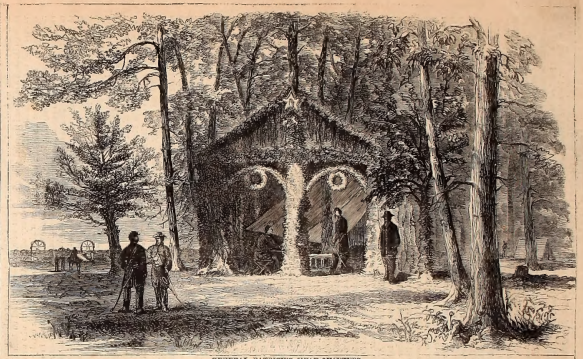
One instance is related of twelve men having been driven into a building and there shot, and the house burned over them.

Another is reported where twenty-five negro recruits were shot down.

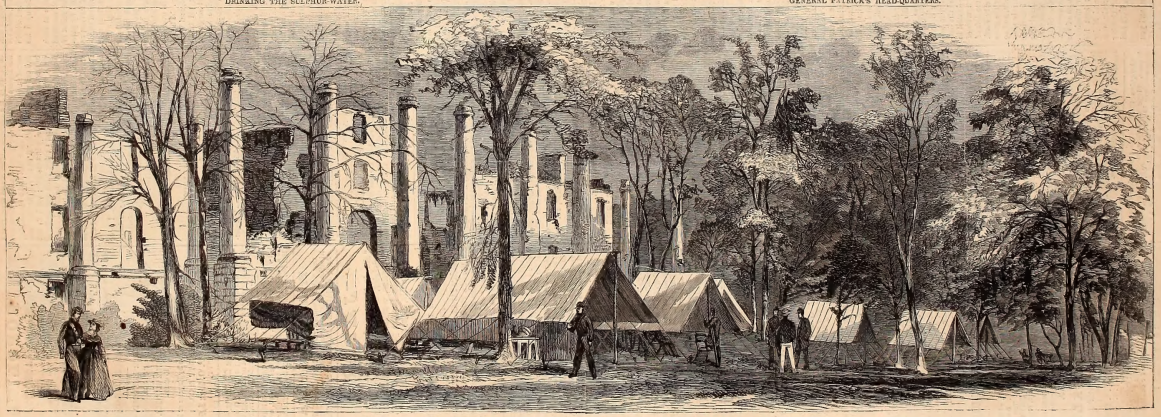


The bodies of the murdered people were thrown into wells and ditches.

There was but one hotel left standing, which was spared at General Ewing's request: he had been rendered there some years ago with all expenses. Its proprietor, however, was shot. The principal part of the city has been reduced to ashes, the loss being set down roughly at two millions of dollars. The banks were robbed, and the third only escaped because the safes could not be forced quick enough. Of course, whatever valuables the guerrillas could lay their hands on they carried off, and it is supposed that they are now dividing with their plunder in their blood homes, where they assume the character of Union men, and whence they will be able to start on a new harrowing and murdering expedition whenever they are called upon by their leaders.



Next to Leavenworth, Lawrence was the most thriving town between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains. It is situated about thirty miles west from Leavenworth, on the right or western bank of the Kansas River, which is here about eighty yards wide. The first has been known as the Delaware crossing. The river is crossed by means of a huge, flat-bottomed ferry-boat, operated by ropes that are suspended between the bluffs on each side. A substantial stone bridge was being built at this point, and a railroad was also in course of construction between Leavenworth and Lawrence—the first link of the Pacific road.



THE RUINS OF LAWRENCE, KANSAS.—SKETCHED BY A CORRESPONDENT.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

DRINKING THE SULPHUR-WATER.

GENERAL PATRICK'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GENERAL BIRNEY'S CAMP AT WARRENTON SULPHUR SPRINGS, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 603.]

HOW THE FIRST NEW JERSEY FOUGHT AT BRANDY.

"It was the prettiest cavalry fight that you ever saw," said the Adjutant, stretching his legs and lighting a fresh cigar.

"It was just my luck to lose it," I answered.

"Here have I been lying growling and grumbling while you fellows have been distinguishing yourselves. It was miserable to be taken sick just when the army got in motion, and still worse not to hear a word of what was going on. I almost wished that we had been a newspaper regiment, so that I could learn something about our regiment that day's work. Be a good fellow and play reporter for my benefit. Freshen hawse, as the nautical novelists say, and begin."

"Well, we were lying at Warrenton Junction, making ourselves as comfortable as possible after the raid, when, on the morning of the 8th of June, the whole division was ordered out in the very lightest marching order. That night we lay close to Kelly's Ford in column of battalions, the men holding their horses as they slept and no fires being lighted.

"At four o'clock on the morning of the 9th we were again in motion, and got across the Ford without interruption or discovery. Yorke, with the chief squadron, was in advance, and we all moved he managed so well that he bagged every picker on the road. Thus we had got almost upon the rebel camp before we were discovered. We rode right into Jones's Brigade, the First Jersey and First Pennsylvania charging together; and before they had recovered from the alarm we had a hundred and fifty prisoners. The rebels were then forming their ranks upon the hill-side by the church; they had a battery playing upon us like fun. Martin's New York Battery on our side galloped into position, and opened to answer them. Then Wyndham formed his whole brigade for a charge, except a squadron of the First Maryland, left to support the battery. We kept well in skirmishing order into them, sabre in hand, they broke like a wave on the bows of a ship, and over and through them we rode, cutting as we went. We could not stop to take prisoners, for there in front of us was the Twelfth Virginia, six hundred men, riding down to support Whiting. 'Pay Jove, Sir, that was a charge! They came up splendidly, looking steadier than we did ourselves after the shock of the first meeting. I do not know whether Wyndham was still with us, or if he had gone to another regiment; but there was Beckford looking full of fight, his blue eyes in a blaze, and his sabre clenched, riding well in front. At them we went again, and some of them this time stood us fairly. I saw Broderick's sabre go through a man, and the rebel gave a convulsive leap out of his saddle, falling senseless to the ground. It seemed but an instant before the rebels were scattered in every direction, trying now and then to rally in small parties, but never daring to await our approach. Now there were the open and plain before us, the drivers yelling at their horses, and trying to limber up. We caught one gun before they could move it, and were dashing after the others when I heard Broderick shouting in a stormy voice. I tell you, it was a startling sight. The regiment and White's Battalion had gathered together toward the left of the field, and were charging in our rear. The First Maryland was there, and Brodegick was shouting at them, in what their Colonel considered a 'very unguntlemanly manner,' to move forward to the charge. At the same time two fresh regiments, the Eleventh Virginia and another, were coming down on our front. Instead of daring at White's men the First Maryland wavered and broke, and then we were charged at the same time front and rear. We had to let the guns go, gather together as well as we were able to cut ourselves out. Gallantly our fellows met the attack. We were broken, of course, by the mere weight of the attacking force, but, following them up too, the whole field was covered with small squads of fighting men. I saw Broderick ride in with a cheer and open a way for the men. His horse went down in the melée; but little Wood, the bugler of Company G, sprang down and gave him his stirrup, setting off himself to obtain another. A rebel rode at the bugler, and succeeded in getting away his sword before he help came. As Wood went after a horse another fellow rode at him. The boy happened at that moment to see a carbine where it had been dropped after firing. He picked up the empty weapon, aimed it at the horseman, made him dismount, give up his arms, and start for the rear. Indeed, he went in again. Leaping bareback, Brooks, and Beekman, charged with twelve men into White's Battalion. Fighting hand to hand, they broke their way through, but left half of the men on the ground behind them. Hughes was left almost alone in a crowd, but brought himself and the men with him safe through. Major Beckford was last seen lying across the dead body of a rebel major with a gun. None of us thought any thing of two to one odds, as long as we had a chance to ride at them. It was only when we got so entangled that we had to stop enough to ride through a knot of men, so that he had to fight them. He struck one so heavily that he was stunned by the blow, but his horse was still in the way: swerving to one side, he escaped a blow from another, and, striking off the thrust of a third, managed to take him with his point across the forehead; just as he did so, however, his sabre, getting tangled with the rebel's, was jerked from his hand. He always carried a pistol in his boot. Pulling that out, he fired into the crowd, and put spurs to his horse. The bullet hit a horse in front of him, which fell. His own charger rose at it, but stumbled, and as it did Broderick himself fell, from a shot fired within not a length of him and a sabre stroke upon his side.

"I saw all this as a man sees things at such times, and am not positive even that it all occurred as I thought I saw it; for I was in the midst of confusion, and only caught things around by passing glimpses. You see, I was fighting as much as I could do. The crowd with whom Broderick was engaged was a little distance from me; and I had just wheeled to ride up to his help when two fellows put at me. The first one fired at me and missed. Before he could get over my his revolver I succeeded in closing with him. My sabre took him just in the neck, and must have cut the jugular. The blood gushed out in a black-looking stream; he gave a horrible yell and fell over the side of his horse, which galloped away. Then I heard a cheer, a fiery rein, plunged my horse, and went at the other one. I was riding that old black horse that used to belong to the signal sergeant, and it was in fine condition. As I drove in the spurs it gave a leap high in the air. That plunge saved my life. The rebel had a steady aim at me; but the ball went through the black horse's brain. His feet never touched ground again. With a terrible convulsive contraction of all his muscles the black horse pitched forward, my left hand on his head and side stone dead, pitching me twenty feet. I lighted on my pistol, the butt forcing itself for itself into my ribs; but my hand was still my hand, and I lay, with arms and legs all abroad, stretched out like a dead man. Every body had an eating time to do there, to attend to me; and there I lay where I had fallen.

"It seemed to me to have been an age before I began painfully to come to myself; but it could not have been many minutes. Every nerve was shaking; there was a terrible pain in my head, and a numbness through my side which was even worse. Fighting was still going on around me, and my first impulse was to get up and join in it. I crawled to it and sank down as I grasped it once more. That was only for a moment; for a rebel officer seeing me move, and, in the full confidence of danger roused me, and I managed to get to my horse, behind which I sank; resting my pistol on the saddle and so contriving to fire in my rear. As soon as the man saw that, he turned off without attaching me. I was now able to stand and walk; so, holding my pistol in my right hand and the rein in the other, I made my way across the fields to where our battery was posted, scaring some with my pistol and shooting others. I was determined not to be shot through the whole fight. When I got up to the battery I found Wood there. He sang out to me to yield and surrender to me a horse, as one of the men, who had just taken one, was going past, so Wood stopped him and took it for me. Just at that moment White's Battalion and some other troops came charging at the battery. The squadron of the Maryland, who were supporting it, met the charge well as far as their numbers went; but were, of course, flanked on both sides by the heavy odds. All of our men were in full face came swarming up the hill, and the cavalry were fighting over and around the guns. In spite of the confusion, and even while the struggle was at the same piece were being sabred, the men at that battery kept to their duty. They did not even look up or around, but kept on their fire with unwavering steadiness. There was one rebel, on a splendid horse, who sabred three gunners while I was chasing him. He wheeled in front, and dart away and then come sweeping back and cut down another man in a manner that seemed almost supernatural. We all shouted to the driving fellow away, but we could not catch or shoot him, and he got off without a scratch.

"In the mean time the fight was going on elsewhere. Kilpatrick's Brigade charged on our right. The Second New York did not behave as well as it has sometimes done since; but the loss of it would end us a great deal. The Tenth New York, though, went in well, and the First Maine (or Lincoln) Cavalry, as it was in spite of their superior numbers (Stuart had a day or two before reviewed thirty thousand cavalry at Culpeper), according to the accounts of rebel officers) we beat them heavily, and would have routed them completely if Duffie's Brigade had come up. But, however, was engaged with two or three hundred men on the left; the aid-de-camp sent to him with orders was cut down and killed on the road, and he is not the sort of man to find out the critical point in a fight of his own accord.

"So now, the whole line drew up still more reserves, and a whole division of theirs coming on the field, we began to fall back. We had used them up so severely that they could not follow us closely, except in the neighborhood of where the Second New York charged. There some of our men had as much as they could do to get out, and the battery had to leave three of its guns. We formed in the woods between a quarter and half a mile of the field, and, moving down to Howard Store, left of Buford, who was retreat toward Beverly Ford. Hart and Wynkoop sied hard to cover the guns that were lost, but they had no horses, and so had to leave them. The rebels were terribly punished. By their own confession they lost three times as many as we did. In our regiment almost every soldier must have settled his man. Sergeant Craig, of Company K, I have already named, is among Colonel Wyndham was wounded, but kept his saddle; Lieutenant-Colonel Broderick and Major Shelmire were killed; Lieutenant Brooks was wounded; Captain Sawyer and Lieutenant Crocker were taken prisoners; and I, as you see, have had to come in at last and refit.

"I have spun you a pretty long yarn, and you must feel pretty tired; but when the memory of the fight comes over me I get almost as enthusiastic and excited as when it was going on. I am so proud of the regiment, officers and men, that I am almost sorry for the promotion that takes me out of it. Of course I have had to be egotistical, and tell you what occurred to myself, as that was to me the most intensely interesting; but I do not want you to fancy that I think I did any better or fought any harder than the others. In fact, I know that most of the others did a good deal more than I did; but not having seen it, of course I could not describe their share of the fight quite so well as that w ich occurred in my own neighborhood and to my own person.

"Now I am going to bid you good-night. I have talked mo than is good for me, and you have listened as h. s is good for you. To-morrow I will come as h. ll you something about what we did around Aldie and Upperville."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Dyspepsia Tablets,

FOR INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c. — Manufactured only by

S. G. WELLING, No. 207 Centre St., New-York.

Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.

BOOK TRADE SALE, NEW YORK, Sept. 21, 22, and 23.—The Catalogue of Messrs. Leavitt's great BOOK TRADE SALE in New York will commence on TUESDAY MORNING, Sept. 22d. The Catalogue, 400 pp., is now ready, and is the largest Trade Sale Catalogue issued in many years. It embraces full invoices of the publications of nearly all the Publishers in the United States, which will be sold by auction without reserve. Parties wishing to buy at this sale can obtain catalogues by application to the Trade Sale Rooms, Nos. 498 and 500 Broadway, New York.

EVERY ONE WHO

Has learned or wishes to learn the best Shorthand, the Beautiful and Legible Art of Phonography, should send for No. 1 of the PHONOGRAPHIC VISITOR. Price, postpaid, 4 cents. It contains a complete Catalogue of the best Phonographic Instruction books. Address,

A. J. GRAHAM & CO., Phonographers, New York.

Portable Printing Offices.

For the use of the Army and Navy, Merchants, Druggists, and Business Men generally. These Printing Offices are now extensively and quickly used throughout the States and Canada, and are considered indispensable by those who have them. They are the best Printing Apparatus for durable, and the printing material is of the best manufacture. Full instructions for use accompany each office.

Press No. 1, 3x 4 in., $10 00.—OFFICE COMPLETE, $20 00
Press No. 2, 4x 6 in., 30 00.—OFFICE COMPLETE, 39 00
Press No. 3, 8x11 in., 59 00.—OFFICE COMPLETE, 100 00
Press No. 4, 12x18 in., 150 00.—OFFICE COMPLETE, 175 00
Press No. 5, 12x20 in., 99 00.—OFFICE COMPLETE, 180 00
Circular and Cut Sheets of Types, Cuts, &c., &c., free.

Adams Press Co., 31 Park Row, N. Y.

AND ALSO FOR SALE BY

CHASE & LEAVITT, 35 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

Office 429 Broadway.

The "Ridgewood" Patent Smoking Case.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by means of a valve, without an of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and available as a Pipe Case, thus saving the cost in every Tort and utility for Smokers. It is of various styles, at $1, $1 50, $2, $2 50, $3, $3 50, $4, $5 and $6, the latter richly plated and engraved. It is substantially made for service, and secure what it promises for all Smokers, at home or abroad, in the ARMY or NAVY.

Style, quality, and workmanship As a Present to friends, nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier, in Camp or on the March, it is invaluable.

Also is offered

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior flavor, and in style and quality to any granulated Tobacco in the market. Put up in packages to fit the Pouch (about a common cigar), or in larger packages as desired, for the general Trade. Officers, Soldiers, and Sailors, are invited to call and examine these Goods.

A liberal Discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail or Express, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cents.

The Attention of Sutlers is particularly Invited to these Goods.

All orders will receive prompt attention.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, Howard Street, New York.

Le Bon Ton. for September, Imported by S. T. TAYLOR, 497 Broadway, N. Y., is the most reliable Fashion Book for the ladies.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HANDYSIDE'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Something New.

Patent Fountain Marking Stamp and Pencil, for marking Bates, Packages, &c. 1000 Agents guaranteed 75 Dollars per month. Send stamp for circular, or One Dollar for sample, free by mail. E. F. CLARK & CO., Manufacturers, Box 35, Northampton, Mass.

Five quires (120 sheets) nice commercial note paper for 50 cents. Single quire, for a sample, 12 cents. 100 Envelopes to match, for 50 cents. 100 pd. do. 40 cents. All the above sent post-paid. Address GEO. E. SNOW & HAP-GOOD, Pathfinder Office, Boston, Mass.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Lace Fall-Pointions, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Caps Badges, or any other articles procurable in this city.

We will forward, on receipt of 50 cents, each, Photographs of GENERALS MCCLELLAN, BURNSIDE, GRANT, FREMONT, ROSECRANS, SIGEL, HALLECK, SHERMAN, HALLECK, SHERMAN, BANKS, HOOKER, MEADE, PORTER, HUNTER, and SLOCUM, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.

111 Fulton Street, P. O. Box 1,614,

NEW YORK CITY.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something urgently needed by every person. 10 samples sent by mail for 20 cents. Address Box 32, R. L. WALCUTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, male and female, of respectable age, to learn a genteel and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 39x51. Price, $1,000.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

JAPAN,

"As it lives and moves—as it eats, drinks, dresses, and sleeps—as it rides, walks, jokes, bathes, and goes to the play—as it buys, sells, digs, sows, and reaps."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Japan. With Map and numerous Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

It abounds in graphic descriptions of life, manners, and scenery. Language, religion, domestic manners and habits, all have their place. . . . The author has neglected to give us those minute and delicate touches which present the scenes depicted forcibly to the mind's eye of the reader.—London Times.

The pictures of Japan as it lives and moves—as it eats, drinks, dresses, and sleeps—as it rides, walks, jokes, bathes, and goes to the play—as it buys, sells, digs, sows, and reaps—are most tempting and very capital pictures they are. . . . We have no hesitation in saying that this book on Japan, As a narrative, it is excellent; and as combining the results of large observation and close study among a strangely-interesting people, it possesses an importance for all thinking readers.—London Athenæum.

We have reason to be thankful for this amusing details and the graphic sketches contained in "The Capital of the Tycoon."—London Examiner.

All things, small and great, native feudalism and European discomforts, the tricks of the Tycoon's Government and the drift of English diplomacy, Japanese courtesy immodesty and European merchants' aggressiveness, the system of agriculture and—handsome—the total want of the oligarchy and native caricature, all are described with a fullness which leaves on the reader's mind the impression of absolute reality. Indeed, the whole Japanese style is clear and simple, he mind has few prejudices, and he has a general power easily and luminously applied. His book will be read with almost excited interest.—London Spectator.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By JOSEPH KAY, ESQ., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister-at-Law, and Member of the Learning Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. JEAFFRESON, Author of "Olive Blake's Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Lover," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

FANNY KEMBLE'S GEORGIA PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York; author of "Lectures on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

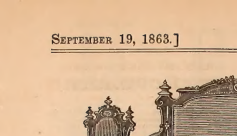
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.



HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISEMENTS in HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Dollar per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Meeks' Cabinet Furniture Warehouse,
No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE. ☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c,
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

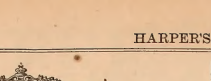
SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
1000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " "	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Ins., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Sleeve Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
1000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Gold Holders, Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, including what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.



AGENTS.—Those setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
308 Broadway, New York.

$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unrivaled, and valuable articles, large size PRIZE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOVELTY PACKAGES containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Borders, Beautiful Emblems, Gold Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Compositions, Camp Companions for Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writers' Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Comic Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Receipts, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price of a Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 TO 500 PER CENT PROFIT ASSURED. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c., and sent by Express safe to all the Posts of the Army, South or Southwest. A PLEASED SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH LEVER, and correct timepiece presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our free Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. A. G. RICKARDS & CO., 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Ointment will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1.—Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

THE STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLE.—Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1863. The best and only reliable billiard table manufactured. Balls, Cues, and every article relating to billiards, for sale by PHELAN & COLLENDER, corner of Crosby and Spring Streets, New York.

The Phrenological Journal

For SEPTEMBER, now ready, contains Physiognomy Illustrated; Family Likenesses, with Portraits; Sketches of Gen. Grant, Wm. L. Yancey, and Thomas Addis Emmet, with Portraits; Phrenology of the Sisters, Illustrated; Wedding Rings; Choosing a Wife; The American Aborigines; Doings in Dahomey; Curiosities of Photography; Flogging; A Wonderful Child; Growing in Grace; Illness, the Idiot; Errors of Education; Climatine; Phonographic Reporters; The Country Girl, etc. Only 15 cents, by first post, or $1 50 a year. Address

FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

GLASS: LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Gilsa Signs and Silver Cards, with Designs, to order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S Old Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St. ☞ Established 1826. ☞ For Specimen by Mail, send two stamps.

CANVASSING AGENTS
WANTED
All Parts of the Country
FOR THE KETTELL'S ENGLISH AND GERMAN
History of the Great Rebellion.
The business will pay. For terms address
N. C. MILLER, 5 Park Row, New York.

BOOK AGENTS' HEAD-QUARTERS.—The AUBURN PUBLISHING CO. want experienced agents in all parts of the country for the latest, largest, and best-selling HISTORY OF THE REBELLION, and other popular Agents' books. Apply soon to E. G. STOKES, Auburn, N. Y.

495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
The Grover & Baker Machines have taken the First Premium at the late State Fairs held in NEW YORK, ILLINOIS, PENNSYLVANIA, NEW JERSEY, MICHIGAN, TENNESSEE, VIRGINIA, IOWA, MISSOURI, NORTH CAROLINA, OHIO, INDIANA, ALABAMA, CALIFORNIA.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

McClellan, Grant, Dueens, Banks, Meade, Gilmore, Burnside, Hooker, Foster, and Sigel. All on the same pattern as the cut, only differing in battle-ground and date. Perfect photograph like, seen in each pin. Pencil back and front in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. Agents wanted to send out the army. The undersigned is the exclusive right of manufacturing this and the issues of this beautiful keepsake and record of gallant acts.

LOUIS PHILLIP, 609 Broadway, N. Y.

Will warm food for the baby, heat water or steep herbs, &c., for the sick, make water hot for shaving or toddy, cook a few oysters, boil or fry eggs, make tea and coffee, toast bread, &c., &c., in less time and expense than by any other means known. Used on any lamp without obscuring the light. Price 25 cents; by mail, postage paid, 50 cents.

Also a Patent Lighter, for lighting lamps without removing the chimney. Price 10 cents.

E. P. GLEASON, Manufacturer,
135 Mercer Street, N. Y.

CORPS BADGES.
Made to Order, and Sent by Mail on Receipt of Price mentioned.

Terms Cash in Advance.
Send for Catalogue.
Address DROWNE & MOORE, Manufacturing Jewelers,
No. 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Printing Office for $12.
Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest yet made. Card and Job Presses are invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 13, and $23. Prize of an Office, with Press, $12, 25, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S
AMBROSIA
is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and falling of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

Fraudulent

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was thick, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five feet four inches in length—when let down reaching to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

MRS. L. A. BEEBE, No. 608 Broadway, New York.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.
DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 609 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

National Union League.
Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,
308 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door use and sight. Perfect perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 2 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the best transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
609 Broadway, New York.

Mr. Rice Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 8th, 1863. For circulars address A. B. WIGGIN, A.M., Rising Sun, Westchester Co., N. Y.

A LONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal of Hedden River Institute, Claverack, Columbia County, N. Y., offers 14 weeks' board and tuition for $47. Term opens Sept. 16. (Both sexes.) If circulars, who board in the Institution with the pupils. Write for catalogues.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN EASILY EARN A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—No stock in trade required except those found in every household; price, $1 10; per cent., demand stocks or bonds. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address C. MUNRO, BROWN & CO., No. 74 Bleecker Street, N. Y.

H. A. Harvey, 84 Malden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, RODS, CORDAGE, and YARN, Steam Reeling, Twich, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blacking Cord, Lamp Wick, Twine and Sergeant Yarn, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,
The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it tachometer, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 18 carat gold. It has the improved rubyention lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $294. Sample watches, in best workmanship, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Railway Timekeepers,
With Heavy Sterling Silver Cases,
Especially Adapted for Railroad Use.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has heavy solid sterling silver cases, beautiful white enamel dial, handsome figures, with the most regulated movement ever constructed to run and keep exactlcal time! Price, per case of half dozen, $60; by mail, $1 05 for postage. If registered, 20 cents additional. A safe delivery by mail guaranteed. Sold only by the case.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER is also furnished in handsome silver plated cases, and in all other respects the same as the silver ones, while in appearance they are fully equal. Price, $48 per case of half dozen. Postage, $1 05. Registering, 20 cents. Sold only by the case.

Our importations are invoiced personally by no other house, combining greater accuracy to timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically gotten up, offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The prices in all parts of the world are constantly attest the superiority of our watches. They economize amplest, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Expensive, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Excels all other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"Is an improvement on ordinary levers, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 8.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish Americ., May 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg. Pa., Chronicle, July 31.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ., Government, April 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ TERMS CASH: INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk. Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY UPON IT. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of $1 25. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to the garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals. Patented June 30, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's price, $60; Civilian's, $80. Send for a Circular. J. W. WESTON, Agt., 401 Broadway, N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.
THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

TESTY OLD GENT (to Butler). "Claret! Yes! Yes! Put it down; and pray, SIMPSON, don't blow upon my head so!"

PROFESSIONAL RECIPROCITY.

COUNTRY PARSON. "ROBINS, I'm sorry I don't see you at Church more regularly."

CONSCIENTIOUS BUTCHER. "Well, Sir, I knows as I did ought to come to Church oftener than I does—the lots o' meat you has o' me."

RETURNED TO THE CITY.

DR. B. C. PERRY, the Dermatologist, having filled his Boston engagements, can be consulted at his office, 4 Bond Street, New York, for all diseases of the Hair and Scalp, Premature Blanching, Moth, and Freckles, and all Cutaneous Diseases. For full particulars, send stamp for a Circular.

American Enameled
STEEL COLLAR CO.,
94 Fine Street, New York.
C. H. WELLING.

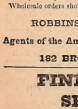
American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packing or ballasting purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most unobjectionable character, AS ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Averes and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which mean will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.



Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers. Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York. 99 Kilby Street, Boston.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of palm oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for shaving, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

H. T. HUTTRIDGE & CO., 34 and 35 Dey Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

STAMMERING.

Cured by Bates' Patent scientific appliances the only known means for the rapid and permanent cure of Stammering, Stuttering, &c. They took the Prize Medal at the last London Exhibition.

For cure by Use of Pamphlets and Drawings describing the same, address H. G. L. MEARS, 377 West 23d Street, New York. P. O. Box 2076.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, JOHN B. ROBINSON, late PRATT, ROBINSON & Co., 190 William St., N.Y.

Vineland.

LANDS—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and Thriving SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND—solid and healthy climate, 30 miles South of Philadelphia by Railroad. Precious large crops, which can now be seen growing. The soil is a rich calcareous sand soil, varying from a clay loam to a sandy loam. Produces large crops of Indian Corn, Sutter Potatoes, Wheat, Grass, Grapes, and all kinds of fruits. Specially adapted to Fruit.

The climate is so mild and open that planting and all kinds of outdoor work can be done the entire winter—most of the winter more resembling Spring than anything else.

Persons suffering from Pulmonary Complaints have been vastly benefited by the climate alone. The water is pure, soft, and delicious.

10, 20, and 30 acre tracts at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable 1 cash, balance in 4 years. We have churches, schools, and good society. For business there are excellent openings. It is now the most improving point East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The best by with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Pamphlets containing Reports and full information will be sent free by addressing CHAS. K. LANDIS, Proprietor, Vineland P.O., Cumberland Co., New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag., Ed. N. Y. Tribune:

"It is one of the most attractive fertile tracts in the eleven best positions, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 2-5 Broadway, Moffatt's Building, cor. North Street, Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for Circular.

WATCHES FREE.

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $10 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNIQUE, and entirely new to the old styles; containing all NEW Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your Friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers can easily go out as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW CIRCULAR for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. So a "15 per day Fact" on inside page.

S. C. RICKARD & CO., 162 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

"Get the Best."

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL THISTLE & CO'S ENTIRELY NEW PRIZE STATIONERY PACKAGES. They are the largest, best, and cheapest manufactured. Circular sent free. Best inducements to Agents.

THISTLE & CO., 130 Nassau Street.

STERLING SILVER HUNTING CASE WATCHES for sale by mail to all who will pay Great Attention to Prices and Goodness. Profits 200 per cent. Sells rapid. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for Circulars.

W. H. CATELY & CO., 68 Ann Street, N. Y.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Cruig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unequaled. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $3 75; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $8.

Address, HENRY CRAIG,
535 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

STEEL COLLARS

AND CUFFS,
ENAMELLED
LILY WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by Post to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 10.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.

ALSO

FRENCH FLANNEL OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment in New York, $4 75, $5, $5 75 each; all cut one yard long.

A stock, Price List by mail on receipt of the cart. The cost of postage must be enclosed—83 cents for each shirt.

Send the size of your neck.

ALSO

ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50.

A LARGE STOCK OF

SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS,

ALSO

FINE WHITE SHIRTS

to order, $3, $3 50, and $4.

Send for Price List and Rules for Measurement, to

S. W. H. WARD, FROM LONDON,

No. 387 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy.

Exterminates Catarrh, Rose and Bronch, forever. Price $3. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot 202 Broadway.

American Manufacture
STEEL COLLARS!!

Send One Dollar for a "checker," or One Dollar and a Half for a genuine "BIRD EYE" collar (to imported humbug) of the American Enameled Steel Collar Co.'s manufacture to BOX 5173, New York Post Office, and receive it by return mail. Box 5173, New York Post Office.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Swiss Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adopted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 28 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have conducted two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

Photograph Albums!

Elegant styles, in ARABESQUE and GOTH, from $1 to $25 each. Sent to any part of the country. Our Catalogue and Price List sent on the receipt of five cents. P. O. Box 4590. J. W. LOCKE & Co., 173 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. C. S. SEAL M.D., with 15 years' experience, Rooms for Non-residents. Correspondence confidential. 153 North Bond street, Baltimore, Md.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They straighten the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.

They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak man strong, and are exhausted nature's great remedy. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and we mean with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a genius stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE & CO.
202 Broadway, New York.

Gold Pens and Cases,
Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' Pens	$ 75	Engraving Pens	$2 00
Med. "	75	Union "	2 50
Large "	1 25	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Commercial Eureka	$ 2 25
Large Eureka "	1 50	Mammoth Eureka	3 00

The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last (10) Ten years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen now in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a Circular, containing engravings, giving the exact sizes and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.

Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.

E. S. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 15 Maiden Lane,
New York City.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet. Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
AND
47 Hampton St. Birmingham, Eng.

COMPOSITE
SILVER WATCHES!

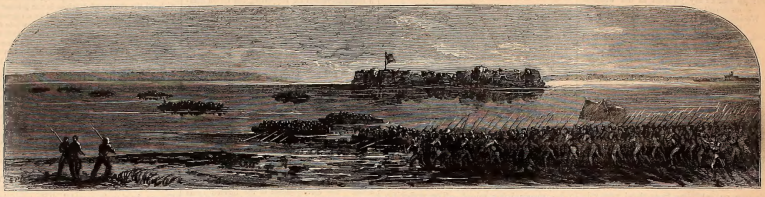
FIRST CLASS HUNTING COMPOSITE WATCHES, EQUAL IN ALL OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND APPEARANCE, TO CHRONOMETERS IN PRICE, THEIR CASES HAVE BEEN SUBJECTED TO SEVERAL APPROBATIONS! An imitation or bullion that is can hardly be detected from the solid metal by the most experienced jeweler. Stamped and being made all through, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving.

Two numbers with the scientific spirit of the times, which causes it to be manufactured from a beautiful alloy—almost identical with the counterpart of Gold—which can, and has only to be seen once but in confidently, the immediate purchase of one or more of these SILVER IS GOLD once!

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In having hunting cases, hermetically sealed, dust proof, and fever and heat proof, in neat rosewood case, by the half dozen (60) pairs, in 1 lb. 8 oz. packages, for $9. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very re-dily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred of ordinary bullet fort-i sing!-pay by any one of ordinary capacity in three days. TERMS, CASH IN ADVANCE. Money by express or mail, in a registered letter at our risk.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers,
Lyon-ware, cor. Cedar Street, N. Y.



Color your own Photographs.—DILLON'S PERFECTED COLORS. $1 per Box. Sold by all Druggists.
J. S. DILLON, 17 Astor Pl., N. Y., sp. plate.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 352.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—EVACUATION OF MORRIS ISLAND BY THE REBELS ON THE NIGHT OF SEPTEMBER 6, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 621.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—CHARGE OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT UPON THE REBEL RIFLE-PITS, AUGUST 26, 1863.

SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 621.]

TO THE REPENTANT SAOUTH.

"Unless the errors of the past are promptly retrieved, the future holds no promise."—From a Richmond Paper.

RETRIEVE the errors of the past? Ture brother's blood is kallin,
From East and West, from Nawth and Sauoth,
where yu her laid 'em low.
Kin yu stop the blood from leyal hearts this verry
minuit fallin—
Kin yu bring again to life the gallant boys we laid to krawl?

Go tu the grave where Baker lies—where Lyon
is a-sleepin,
Go kall up the heroick three who fell in Baltimore?
Give back tu ev'ry home bereaved the dear wuns
in Death's kreepin,
And wash the stain ov treeson from orf Freedom's holy shore!

Oh! yu needn't say yu went tu war withowt
no friendly warnin,
We all'ays told yu, from the fust, jest howr
the thing wood be—
Thet yu'd find yure "cap ov freedum" was a cap ov sum fine worms,
And yu a preshus larfin-stock fur awl the wurld ta see!

So yu reely hev begun tu think yu was a bin-
dikated nashens.
Tu open fire on Sumter's walls, and tawk ov
revolushun?
Yu'd rather not hev bin the fokes aour Nawth-
men tu awaken,
An' yu wish yu'd stood up manfully fur the Constitushun?

Wa'al, I'm glad yu Suthern rebbels ar a-kumin tu yure senses;
I'm glad tu heer yu tawk about "the crorss ov the Jue"—
It's time yu hed begun tu overhawl yure vain pretenses,
And put away yure darlin sins:—I hope the change 'll last!

CHARITY GREDES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1863.

THE GERMANNIN DANGERS.

THE occupation of Chattanoga by General Rosecrans; the capture of Knoxville and Cumberland Gap by General Burnside; the retreat southward of the rebels in Virginia, and the consequent advance of the Army of the Potomac; the steady progress of General Gilmore toward the reduction of Charleston; the development of Union feeling in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana; the expulsion of the rebels from the greater part of Arkansas; the departure of an expedition which will probably have the effect of clearing out the insurgents from Texas, and firmly planting the Stars and Stripes once more on the Rio Grande: these are the events of the day, and it is not presumptuous to say that the most fervent sanguine hopes of an early accomplishment of the National purpose in the present conflict, and measurably, set at rest the apprehensions which were once entertained touching the issue of the struggle. On the other hand, the triumph of the Union party by an overwhelming majority at the election in Kentucky, and the still more overwhelming Union victory at the elections in California and Maine, coupled with the indications of an equally decided manifestation of loyal sentiment at the coming elections in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, may fairly be regarded as relieving us from the next greatest danger, namely, divisions at home. In whichever side we look, in this country, the symptoms are all favorable and the prospect serene.

The only remaining cloud which overhangs the national horizon comes from abroad; and it must be admitted that it is a cloud of formidable appearance.

The Emperor Napoleon is involved in an enterprise in Mexico which, as he knows perfectly well, is so obnoxious to the people of this country that pending but the engrossing nature of the war in which we are engaged prevents our resisting him with force of arms. Even now the measures which the diplomatists are weaving him that our first step after the subjugation of the rebels will be to expel his troops from Mexico. The question arises—will he wait till then? Or will he avail himself of the present helpless position to secure a foothold in Mexico, and then intrench himself against our future attack by an alliance with the Southern Confederacy? We know that Mr. Slidell, the rebel envoy to Paris, has had several audiences of the Emperor lately, and also that he has been closeted with the French Secretary of State. Was it proposed at these interviews that a joint recognition should take place—that of the rebel Confederacy by France, and that of the Mexican Empire by the rebel Confederacy? If not, what is the purpose of the shower of pro-slavery brochures that are being issued from the semi-official presses, seemingly for the purpose of educating French opinion up to the slave-driving standard?

Of course, it is easy to see that a recognition of the rebel Confederacy by France, involving sooner or later a war with this country, would be fraught with more evil for the French than it could yield benefit. Indeed, it is hard to see what advantage the French could hope to reap, under any circumstances, from so unnatural an alliance and so unnatural a war. But the dangers which we can see in the enterprise may not be so clear to the view of the Emperor; and even if they were, he has already involved himself in an operation in Mexico out of which there is no possible escape without loss and discredit.

On the other side of the channel our affairs look better, but still are not pleasant. Three iron-clad rams are rapidly approaching completion, two on the Mersey, one on the Clyde. Every one knows that these are for the service of the rebels, and that they are intended, not to rob and burn defenseless merchant vessels, like the Alabama and the Florida, but to blockade New York and Boston, and to break the blockade at Mobile and Wilmington. Every one in England, from the Queen downward, is perfectly aware of this fact. Yet the Government pretends to discover some impediment in the way of executing the Neutrality Law, and the Prime Minister, when urged by Mr. Roebuck and Englishmen, who seem still to retain a sense of decency, actually justifies himself by declaring that the British Government can not be coerced by foreign menaces. The language which raved maniacally when Captain Craven watched the Sumter off Southampton, and actually threatened to ship a broadside in a storm when he dared to refit, now bellow to us across the water—"What don't you send cruisers here to look after Laird's iron-clads?"

It is so clearly the interest of Great Britain not to establish a precedent which would some day react fatally against herself, that, under ordinary circumstances, one might scold up upon these vessels being seized. The probability would seem to be that after some more bluster against the Yankees by Lord Palmerston, and some more quivocation by Earl Russell, the law will be carried out—not from any regard for us or fair dealing, but simply from a dread of future retaliation in kind. But it is not always safe to calculate on the wise thing being done. The equipment of the Alabama and the Florida was a great mistake as England could have controlled, as she can control, the next war she goes to war; yet they are both at sea, burning our ships.

What, then, are we to do? Senator Sumner has proved to us, within a week, in an oration of remarkable eloquence, brimming with legislative and apt precedent, that recognition is impossible, and that we are legally and in fact at war with Prime Minister of England and France, instead of being Chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs. This country, he says, assurances would be very comforting. As it is, our policy is clearly to prepare for the worst, and then, if it doesn't come, return thanks to God for dangers escaped. But meanwhile we must push on the armies: on from Chattanooga, on from Knoxville, on from Culpepper, on to Charleston, on to Mobile, on to Texas. We must push on the draft too, and voluntary enlistments of every man—be he black, brown, or white—who can carry a musket. If we have a million men in arms Europe will respect us. We must, above all, push on the construction of iron-clads. These are your best peace-makers and peace-keepers. There should not be the cost of an iron-clad in every dock-yard throughout the United States, and contracts made for iron plates enough to shield the greatest navy in the world. With a million men and one hundred powerful iron-clads we should be safe; otherwise not.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

In spite of the warnings of foreigners the public credit of this country continues to be destroyed, and the people will not—blockheads that they are—understand that they are utterly ruining themselves. The Rebel Congress borrowed another little sum of $50,000,000 from the Banks. The whole thing was settled in about ten minutes; and the only question which gave rise to any debate in the discussion of the details grew out of an unsuccessful attempt of the Banks to secure the privilege of taking more than they did.

The conversions of 5.20 Bonds—to which we have drawn attention more than once—is utterly unexampled in financial history. We are informed by Secretary Chase that "the sum of sales sold most of the Bonds, for the following interesting statistics on the subject:

The sales of Five-Twenties to September 1, 1863, were as follows, viz.:
Through the Loan Agencies	$126,425,000
Through the various subscribing Agents	19,575,000
Total sale to September 1	$146,000,000

The Secretary of the Treasury has now completed arrangements for placing the Five-Twenty Bonds Europeanwise. New plates have been engraved, and new devices adopted to protect the Coupons and the Bonds themselves against counterfeiting. The delay in delivering Bonds during the month of August was necessarily occasioned by these precautions. Now that they are completed, greater rapidity in the production of Bonds will immediately follow the issue of the Coupons of October 1st, and the demand for Five-Twenties continued good: there are indications at the Agencies that the continued success of our arms will greatly increase the demand during the next few weeks.

We continue to have considerable inquiry for Five-Twenties for the foreign market. The German Bankinghouses are the principal buyers of Government Stock for shipment.

THE LOUNGER.

HOW SHALL WE VOTE?

A YEAR ago, in the last political canvass in this State, the Democratic Party sought to tag every man which aims only at the sure and final salvation of the Government and country, strenuously supported the nomination of General Wadsworth for Governor. It did so because it saw that his success would be a bitter blow to the enemies of the country at home and abroad, while that of his opponent would be hailed with joy in Richmond, London, and the New York Post Office. This alone was a sufficient reason for supporting the Union nominations of last year.

The logical consequence of the success of a candidate who was acceptable to our enemies was the riot of July. Ten days before the riot that candidate, now Governor, had assured at the National Government, and at the war for supporting rebellion, and had covertly threatened mob violence. Our papers and papers that must strongly support the election last year were the direct instigators of the riot, by their fierce and wanton slanders of the Government, and their constant inflammatory appeals to the basest passions of the most ignorant class. They declared that the draft was an unconstitutional and tyrannical measure, by which poor white men were to be dragged off and forced to fight to free negroes. This was the ground taken by all the members of the party from the Governor down. The wild and wicked riot that followed they called an uprising of the people, and a great popular movement. The Richmond papers exulted. The correspondent of the London Times announced that the civil war had reached New York, and all the hostile Press of England applaud declared that our great and vital successes in the field were neutralized by the outbreak in New York. On the eve of the riot, on the Saturday before the Monday, when he knew that the city was without troops, and when, according to his own statement, the chance of trouble was so great that he had sent his Adjutant-General to Washington to beg that the draft might be stopped, the Governor, whose election was hailed by the foreign and domestic enemies of this country, went out of his way to make an inflammatory speech to a mob on Monday, and did not appear until Tuesday noon, when the first words of the chief magistrate of the State to the most cruel and lawless ruffians were—"My friends."

Another election is at hand. The same eager regard of friend and foe to the issues of the war still continues. The question of national salvation is still pending. There is no technical pretext for opposition. How, then, will loyal men, who sincerely wish the absolute triumph of the National Government, vote? There are as before two tickets in the field, as before two platforms or sets of resolutions. But resolutions are words, and words adroitly used conceal things. One of those tickets is equally for the most earnest friends of the Richmond papers, of the rebel leaders, of the men who hate the Union and the Government. Its success would be hailed by Davis and Toombs as a victory of theirs. Davis's organ suggests the advance of Lee into Pennsylvania as a means of strengthening the hands and hands of traitors to support this ticket and of securing its success. It is sustained by the sympathy of Vallandigham and of every man in the free States who wishes to end the rebellion trumph; and it is the ticket for which the Governor of Mississippi, Pendleton Wood and Benjamin his brother necessarily work. The characters of the candidates upon the ticket are not in question. They are but individuals, by which the success of the ticket is the success of the managers in this State, who are known to all loyal men as the friends of the rebels.

There is another ticket, which is hated as cordially at the New York Hotel as it is in Richmond, and which every loyal man would fain vote for. It hears of rebel sympathizers abroad as another grand proof of the resolution of the country not to yield to the insolent menaces its foreign enemies. It would show the rebels that in our victories we were resolved as firmly as in our disaster to maintain the national authority safely and forever. And while thus it extinguished hope in rebel minds it would show all loyal hearts in the land that the Union party was still united in patriotism as it is in power.

Every voter in the State will support one of these tickets. Every voter in the land, also, sympathizes with one or the other. Shall we vote as Davis and Vallandigham advise, or as the unconditional maintenance of our free, just, and popular Government demands?

WHAT A JACKSONIAN DEMOCRAT SAYS.

One of the most extraordinary and trenchant political works of the day is a letter lately published in the Boston Journal by "A Jacksonian Democrat," addressed to the Democrats of Massachusetts, and written, as the Journal informs us, by a distinguished Worcester Democrat—one of a Democrats who nominated a Webster Whig for Governor. This doctor of the Jacksonian school has a philosophical, logical, and brilliant mind, and conclusions his summary by saying:

"Yet now, more on the continent so much as in the sincerity of the great body of democratic Communities—a discovery—not Democracy is the Democratic party so sincerely—not thoroughly despised." And so asks why, and answers, "Because we abandoned our principles to follow our leaders." "Because when South Carolina hated freedom, and honestly proclaimed its hatred, we who hated slavery meanly pretended to like it."

The Jacksonian Democrat then proceeds to a most scorching review of the consequences of this policy to "our noble old Democratic party." He shows how it utterly degraded it; how "the parade and the dregs of society were sluiced for years through the public offices into the managing committees of the great political parties." "Even the offscourings of the public offices came our former leaders and their tools, the present Breckinridge and Vallandigham Democracy have played at government for us during many years, and what they have done with us about ruining a party or a country is hardly worth considering." He continues: "Genuine Democracy no more resembles the Democracy these men have built up yet than the beast-steak resembles offal, or than brookfish resembles shoddy." "The Democracy we have had to put up with displayed a masterly inactivity when a common man was to be benefited, but worked with all the energy of delirium in the interest of any nonprofit who had been suckled by a negress." "This kind of Democracy produced the whole Abolition agitation, and handled it from the very beginning with a sure ineptitude." "The Democracy we have had to put up with originated in the intellect of Mr. Calhoun, and exasperates the bile of Mr. Jefferson Davis."

This terrible Delegate to the Democratic Convention then sketches Calhoun and his influence. "It has been the deadliest Democracy that ever seen in America." "General Jackson was one of the men who saw through him; and as the old hero was not able to fortify himself against his patriotically hated hate to the last—him, and his principles, and his friends, and every thing that was his. On his death-bed he regretted that he did not have him hung." The Jacksonian Democrat shows how Calhoun used his party to ruin it and to divide the nation. He must have an "issue." "The tariff had been exhausted, and would not answer. Slavery he thought, would." "Mr. Calhoun's agitated the mute question just as soon if it had coincided with geographical lines. And he could not have found a stronger weapon he made quicker use of as well as upon the slave question, if he could have received the same help on it from those Northern men of the same democracy successfully encouraged him in the 'fatal exercise of domineering talk!'" The disdainful pen of this indignant Democrat then sweeps by step into the declension and fall of the party. It "could not help growing conveniently and even inconveniently small [he speaks of Massachusetts], soon, its whole party and soul was to be 'as a man a nigger.' I think it lucky for the shoe business that their leading minds did not apply their energies to that. As they had, they would have to open up every shoe-shop in the United States in a year." As he proceeds to show that the leaders of the under Democracy revolted from these leaders in that they now desire to resume their leadership. He declares that he has always been a Democrat, but never abandoned the name for "National" or any other. "I would like, with your assistance, to reclaim the use of [the name] entirely from those of us who have never deserted or betrayed it. And I have a right to complain that while Mr. Breckinridge and four hundred thousand of his party are murdering their fellow-citizens in Virginia, some hundreds of them make use of my party name while defending orphan asylums and resulting peace in New York." This Jacksonian then continues: "On this point (if the newspapers report him correctly) Mr. Wood has always been at home with the Honorable Fernando Wood. He thinks that no Democrat can support a war against South Carolina for Secession. Mr. Calhoun thought so, too. General Jackson, on the contrary, intended to hang Mr. Calhoun the moment he attempted to put Mr. Wood's theory into practice. Mr. Wood's natural attention to excuse a rebel may yet be carried out by some of his party, though upon a different principle, on Jefferson Davis, and why. And if Mr. Wood should happen to be that person, his efforts to overthrow the Constitution have been as strenuous, as indefatigable, and as meritorious, that it is impossible not to wish him the fullest success."

The Jacksonian disciple continues his scathing analysis of the fearful blundering of the usurping party leaders: shows that they are "political meninblack of the basest interest"; that "the South has never broken any compromise of the Constitution," and they know it; declares that he does "not blame the South for attacking the Constitution, but for denying that they broke it;" that he "despises Mr. Seward for his want of comprehension" in asserting a higher law of conscience instead of the highest law of the public safety; criticises Southern "chivalry" and "gentility"; exposes the shallow pretence of the Democratic party to advance the cause of slavery by agitation at the South; accuses the Southern Democrats of "meanly picking a quarrel with the North," and of "cowardice" if they had remained the Administration could have been checked; and "therefore I am compelled to say to them, that if the stream of secession should tear us on so far, I shall behold with much resignation the corpse of the last rebel hanging in the rear-rank of the last slaver."

And this is a Jacksonian Democrat, who is for the Government "actively and without conditions." Another Democrat! Of course. Which is the Democrat, this man or Vallandigham?

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

IN his recent speech Mr. Sumner, Chairman of the Foreign Committee of the Senate, has collected and condensed all the flagrant instances of foreign hostility to us during the war, and has enriched, with all the lights of history and precedent, his view of the traditional foreign policy of Great Britain upon the subject of Slavery. His speech is a clear statement of what ought to be, and what has been the conduct of European nations in questions of intervention. But our present interest is not a consideration of the question, what will be, and in their conduct.

International law is the custom of nations. There is no other court of arbitrament than the pleasure of the different governments. If any of them differ upon a point of the law it may be referred to another, or the view of each may be referred to arms. In all cases it may be truly said that a nation tolerates no international custom which it does not think to be advantageous. Mr. Sumner cites the various occasions upon which Great Britain has intervened in the interest of liberty, sometimes alone, sometimes in concert; but always because, being a liberal government, she considered liberality in other nations safer for herself. Neither Great Britain nor any other nation adopts a principle merely because of its morality. It is when morality is seen to be allied to interest that the interest is sought and the morality prescribed. And the more quotes Wilberforce to prove that Great Britain had been a commercial gainer by an anti-slavery policy. Unquestionably she has been. But without the security of commercial gain or political power would she have been an anti-slavery nation?

There is no more selfish nationality than the British. Mr. Roebuck stated the British principle precisely when he said at Sheffield—"I am ready to fix for the interest of Great Britain is the interest of the world." The question in our foreign relations, therefore, as regards England is not what she think her interest requires? Mr. Sumner shows us how steadfastly she has stood for increasing freedom in every State, but certainly Mr. Sumner is quietly assented to what the Senator calls the greatest political crime of the last century, the partition of Poland. And William Pitt was a Tory. When Fox reproached him Pitt said: "In general policy I am ready to confess that this partition is unjust." Still he assented. It is not, therefore, whether it is wrong to recognize the rebels as a power, nor whether it has been her habit to do so, nor whether it will help found a new and barbarous power, which Great Britain will consider, but whether it is for her commercial and political advantage to see this country ruined and its government overthrown. Great Britain, which has maintained an anti-slavery policy, and frowned upon the basis of "ideas" and submits to Louis Napoleon, will do exactly what they think their interest demands. And if their action is entirely according to their traditions, they will decorate it with as fine a name as they have hitherto bestowed upon a course diametrically opposite.

Of course we do not say that moral considerations have no influence upon national action, for they are the highest source of all true national progress. And it is undeniable that the greatest political philosophers and the wisest men see that justice is coincident with interest. But when men are fels slowly and reotects it slowly. They influence political action, and public opinion at length controls national action. Mr. Sumner's speech is a noble appeal to that higher reason which controls human affairs. But it is not addressed directly till us whether we are likely to have a foreign war.

"CONCILIATION."

Our friend Governor Horatio Seymour has been making another speech. It is remarkable that when nothing was to be saved but the country, Mr. Seymour declared that the Government had no power to "coerce" rebels, and that when the rebels began to coerce the Government Mr. Seymour retired to the frontier of Minnesota. But when Mr. Fernando Wood put him upon the track as a candidate for Governor, and his political prospects were to be saved, he found his tongue, and used it to say that the rebels had criticised the Union, and upon themselves, and that there was very good reason for the conduct of the rebels. And now that there is hope of helping his prospects still further, Mr. Seymour makes speeches and writes letters without end. Indeed he has done so much of this work that the public which worked very hard at the his election, now says, "He can talk more without saying any thing, and write more without meaning any thing, than any other man we know."

His latest speech up to the time of this writing was before the Democratic Convention at Albany, in which he demanded "a conciliatory policy." What do he and men like him mean by conciliation? Grant the enormous conspiracy against the Government. For two years it has made bloody war. Its intention is frankly expressed, its object plainly declared. It aims at a dissolution of the Union by means of forcible revolution. Mr. Seymour proposes "conciliation." The rebels demand reparation because "what they allege is not a radical and essential incompatibility, and Mr. Seymour suggests "conciliation." They refuse to obey laws which we think Mr. Seymour can not call unconstitutional, and he turns to the Government—that is, to the people of the country—and says, "Let's conciliate." In the same manner and with the same principle, when the brute mob of New York, infuriated by rum and his provocation, were burning and murdering defenseless houses and persons, the same Mr. Seymour called them, still reeking with human blood, "My friends," and then makes a jest of the phrase in his Albany speech.

What does he mean by "conciliation" to rebels who not only have not asked for it, but who treat at him for suggesting it? The only "conciliation" possible is to yield to some of the rebel demands. Unless rebellion is obey the laws. We resist it with blood. The Government is advised to say, "My friends, don't do it. Please to let us know the conditions on which you will obey." The adviser considers himself "a statesman" for proposing such a course, and his name is Horatio Seymour.

Mr. Seymour will remember that his political and patriotic sponsor, Mr. Fernando Wood, made the most servile apology to Robert Toombs and the State of Georgia because he could not prevent the seizure of arms intended, as Mr. Wood knew, to slay loyal citizens of the United States. Mr. Robert Toombs is one of the ringleaders of the rebellion to which Mr. Seymour offers "conciliation," and on the day after the offer was suggested Mr. Toombs's letter was printed, in which he says: "I can conceive of no extremity to which my country could be reduced in which I would for a single moment entertain any proposition for any union with the North on any terms whatever." Now it is for the sake of establishing a new political partnership with Toombs, Davis, & Co., that Mr. Seymour makes his proposition. "Let us stop," he says, "and, my friends, to Toombs, "and make me President, and you shall have every thing you want." Unluckily for him, and not to put too fine a point upon it, Toombs spits in his face.

What does his Excellency think of his chances of "conciliating?" Let him ponder whether it was Seymour's saying and acting "My friends," or the rifles and howitzers that put down the riot.

COAXING REBELS.

THE Albany Democratic resolutions say that, in view of the recent [sic] manifestations in North Carolina and elsewhere, a "conciliatory policy" should be adopted. But the Convention forgot to consider a very important and decisive point. It is, whether any rebel desiring to lay down his arms and return to his allegiance has been prevented by the Government from doing so. If not, how can the Government "conciliate" him? If he has been prevented, where and when? As for the Union in North Carolina, we have not heard that one of them submits to the laws it will receive their protection. But the return of one State from the fear of tyranny and misrule is the assurance of a single brigade in a battle. The opposing General does not stop fighting until all are conquered or all have surrendered. The impression that the citizens of the United States who live in the State of North Carolina submit to the Government they have always loved and supported is fictitious. If we could know the answers to the Carolinians will cause the Georgians to lay down their arms, the answer is plain enough, as Mr. Lincoln says: "If the citizens come to rebel it will be time enough to talk about amnesty."

Coaxing rebels to obey the laws may be a pretty policy for a party in extremity to suggest. But the people of this country have been taught by dire not mean to coax but to coerce rebels, and they will go on crushing, not conciliating, rebellion.

TWIN CRIMES.

ONE of the Copperhead papers, with a complacency which could be found only in a dull devotee of the slaveholding idea, says that secession is whatever, speaks of the "twin crimes of Abolition and Secession." Why did it not complete the list of similar twins? Why did it not say that secession, the twin crimes of parricide and filial affection; of incest and wedlock; of arson and humanity; of burglary and decency; of horse-stealing and truth and falsehood; of murder and self-sacrifice; of capital offence and Christianity; of treason and drunkenness; of right and wrong. By the same wise classification we have also the twin criminals America Benedict Arnold; Washington and Jefferson Davis; Washington and Benedict Arnold; Tousaint L'ouverture and Gordon, Aaron Burr and Hamilton; Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln; Robert Smalls and Robert Toombs; Morgan and Theodore Winthrop; Quantrell and Robert Dale Owen.

The Copperhead philosophers base their claim to conservative patriotism upon their denial of the fundamental principles of the Government and civilization—as if disbelief in God and the devil proved a man to be sincerely religious.

A BRAVE BARD.

Two days after losing his leg at the battle of Fair Oaks one of our German Volunteers consoled himself with singing. The following is indebted to "Constant Reader" in Baltimore for the MS.

L-E-G ON MY LEG.

God leg, thou wast a faithful friend,
And trusty wast thou to me;
I thank thee most that, to the end,
Thou didst stick by me free.

Strange paradox, that in the fight
Where I of thee was thus bereft
I lost my left leg for the right,
And yet right's the one that's left.

But while the sturdy stump remains
I may be able yet to patch it;
For even one leg more pains
To make an L-e-g to match it.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL GILMORE has been appointed Major-General of Volunteers, in consideration of his services before Charleston.

GENERAL HUNTER, Chief of the Ordnance Bureau, has retired from Washington, and General KEIM, late of the Washington Arsenal, summer charge of the bureau temporarily; and Captain HUNTER, of the Ordnance Department, has been appointed to the command of the Washington Arsenal.

The trial of Captain C. M. LEVY, Quarter-master, was suspended because General Meredith was prevented by sickness. He is charged with having defrauded the Government by furnishing inferior supplies for the use of troopers in his department. His friends are confident that the charges will be explained and withdrawn.

Major FALLS, First Pennsylvania Cavalry, has been ordered to report to General HATCH, at Philadelphia.

Lieutenant-Colonel JOHN SEDGWICK, Battery B, Fourth Artillery, has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant in the same regiment, vice [illegible], in command of his old battery, one of the most effective in the service.

Captain JOHN ROSSMAN has been detached, rick, from the command of the Conemicus, and is waiting for orders.

Lieutenant A. T. MACKENZIE's orders to the Naval Academy have been revoked, and he is ordered to the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Lieutenant-Colonel GEORGE G. MEADE has been detached from the Ordnance Department at New York, and ordered to the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

DR. DRENAN, of the gun-boat Commodore Jones, was shot on the night of 11th in Norfolk by a sentinel. He started in a boat from Kimberly's wharf to cross over to the Naval Hospital, when he was hailed by the sentinel. Not hearing him, he kept on his way until he was shot and very dangerously wounded.

Captain HENRY Dwight Assistant Adjutant-General to General SMITH, has been appointed Colonel of the One Hundred and Forty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers.

Colonel POWELL, of the Sixty-fifth New York Volunteers, has been discharged from the service.

Captain A. M. PENNOCK, First Captain of the Minnesingers, arrived from Cincinnati of the train from depôt of Camp Illinois, has arrived at Washington on a short leave of absence.

General HOOKER, it is reported, is about to be assigned to an important command.

A grand review of rebel officers have recently been murdered out of service, including nearly every member of Jefferson Davis's Staff. The last still remains at Bonnie Brig, Pennsylvania.

A new Monitor, the Passaic, was launched at Jersey City on 12th. She is 220 feet long, 46 beam, 13 depth of hold, and 74 draught.

Commander Green has been ordered to the command of the Galatea, and Lieutenant-Commander FLEMMING to the Sagamore.

Captain WEBSTER, of the ship Constitution, captured by the privateer Georgia, says that his vessel was taken on the 16th of June, in lat. 50° 21' south, long. 80° 30' west. The prize was commanded by Captain MAURY, who was recently in command of the Sumter for three years. The prize-crew plundered the Constitution, taking from her all valuable property. On the 18th of June the prize captured and bonded the ship City of Boston.

General BERRY, Chief of Artillery, has been ordered on the tour of inspection.

The official orders detailing Generals MEADE, HANCOCK, and BARRY, away from their Brownie are similarly worded, and do not leave the impression that the officers referred to are to be permanently relieved.

General SANDFORD, of Florida, and Generals Vollentere was just week made Brigadier-General.

The Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, member of Congress from Indiana, left for the front on Monday last, Wednesday, was roughly treated by some soldiers on a train of cars on 17th. Several soldiers, with the officers present, attempted to kick the soldiers, however, forced him to leave the train before he reached his destination.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHARLESTON.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
HEAD-QUARTERS, IN THE FIELD, Sept. 7, 1863.

Major-General H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief, U.S.A.

GENERAL:—I have the honor to report that Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg, on Morris Island, are in our unopposed ground the crest of the counterscarp of Fort Wagner on the main front, extending to the gorge, and no other was used to carry the place by assault at nine o'clock this morning.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

About ten o'clock last night the enemy commenced evacuating the island, and the whole seventy-five of them made their escape from Cumming's Point in small boats.

Captured Artillery: Fort Wagner, 11 guns, one battery manned by Colonel Rolett, of South Carolina, and garrisoned by detachments of effective men; and Battery Gregg by between one and two hundred.

Fort Wagner is a very large and formidable kind. Its bomb-proof shelter, capable of holding eighteen hundred men, protected it from the most terrible bombardment to which any work was ever subjected. We have captured nothing but a battery and a very large supply of excellent ammunition.

The city and harbor of Charleston are now completely covered by our guns.

I have the honor to be, General, very respectfully your obedient servant,

Q. A. GILLMORE, Brigadier-General Commanding.

THE "WERHAWKEN" AGHOUND.

The Weehawken, while making an attack on Fort Moultrie, which is a terrible explosion of gunpowder agroune, and had to receive a terrific fire from a hundred rebel guns. The Weehawken was struck by fifty-seven, nestled by the Monitors, and poured an overwhelming fire upon the rebel guns at the other batteries to turn and silenced for a time the guns of such. She fought the fight gallantly, and was only struck twice after reflecting serious damage upon all her assailants, being hardly touched. The Weehawken subsequently got off without damage.

UNSUCCESSFUL ATTACK ON SUMTER.

An assault by our troops on Saturday thirty in number—was made on Fort Sumter on the night of the 8th, but it proved unsuccessful. The fort was defended by one hundred sailors and marines, under command of Lieutenant Wilkins, of the Navy, assisted by Captain Stevens of the Patapsco. Upon attempting to land they were fired upon by musketry, and also by signal fire from the batteries which could bear upon Sumter, together with the broadsides of the ironclads, were opened upon the defenders. Fifteen officers, who had landed on the fort, were captured. Three officers were knocked in pieces, and eighty sailors and marines were killed or wounded. The Richmond Enquirer of 11th confirms the account of the rebel losses. Captain Stevens, in addition, the capture of four boats and three colors. Our officers are held prisoners in Fort Sumter.

CHARLESTON TO BE SHELLED.

It is stated that the following message was recently forwarded to Washington by General Gillmore, asking for instructions as to the course to be pursued. The answer was ordered to continue the bombardment until the city surrendered.

THE LATEST.

The latest dates from Charleston are to Saturday, the 12th instant, at which time the firing was revenig by United States transport Nellie Peate, which arrived at Fortress Monroe at 7 A.M. on Sunday, the transport had landed the rebel-boat Commodore had arrived from Morris Island with prisoners. The rebels had been firing over Fort Moultrie, but our troops had possession of a large portion of Sullivan's Island, and were throwing shells between Forts Sumter and Moultrie. This was the condition of affairs when the transport left. The steamer Penia was passing Charleston bar, at four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the captain saw a white flag flying on the walls of Moultrie. It was said that the fort fired its last gun at four o'clock P.M.

CHATTANOOGA OCCUPIED.

CAMP NEAR TRENTON, GEORGIA, Sept. 9, 8.30 P.M.
Major-General H. W. HALLECK, Washington, D.C.

Chattanooga is ours without a struggle, and East Tennessee is free. Our troops, the enemy's flank and rear, progresses, while the tail of his retreating column will not escape unmolested. By this side entered Chattanooga about noon. Three north of the river there are crossing. W. S. ROSECRANS,
Major-General.

DETAILS OF THE AFFAIR.

Dispatches dated Chattanooga, September 9, say:

Generals Wood and Wagner entered this city at eleven A.M. The enemy was shelling the town when we left on hour before. We have taken two steamboats, one horse-boat, and sixteen locomotives. We have taken a few stragglers or prisoners. The rebel works are very strong. The demolition of the whole railroad bridge by the rebels. Bragg discovered the flanking movements of M'Cook and Thomas on Monday night, and immediately began to withdraw his troops upon the road to Rome. Johnston had reinforced him with two divisions.

CHATTANOOGA, September 10.

General Rosecrans entered this city to-day. Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, is celebrating mass in the cathedral at his request. Nearly all the citizens left three weeks ago, with their household goods. Very few returned.

CUMBERLAND GAP OUTS.

CUMBERLAND GAP, TENN., Sept. 9, 1863.

Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

I have telegraphed you our movements up to the occupation of Knoxville by our forces. Since then a cavalry force has been sent up the railroad to within a few miles of Bristol, capturing some three locomotives and twenty cars. Another force, composed of two regiments of infantry and two regiments of cavalry, I brought to this place in person to relieve General Shackelford, who was here with two regiments of cavalry, Colonel De Courcy being on the Kentucky side with a brigade. Colonel Garrard in that direction before leaving Kentucky. The infantry brought with them a battery of six-inch, three-sixty mules—in fifty-two hours. The garrison here, consisting of one two thousand men, and fourteen pieces of artillery, made an unconditional surrender at three P.M. to-day without a fight.

A. E. BURNSIDE, Major-General.

FIGHT AT CULPEPPER.

The details of the advance, the fight, and the victory of General Pleasanton's cavalry—under Generals Buford, Kilpatrick, and Gregg—at Culpeper on Sunday, show that it was not only a brilliant but an important affair, and may probably be regarded as the advance movement of General Meade's army. The cavalry crossed the Rapidan at several points and the bands of the enemy's patrols coincided with Stuart's cavalry and the light artillery of the army, after a short series of skirmishes, drove them from point to point until they reached Culpeper, through which town they charged, driving out the rebels in confusion, and capturing over one hundred prisoners and three guns, over Ty-Rapidan and over Culpeper. A large portion of ordnance stores were found in the railroad depôt at Culpeper, the property of Eighth Corps, and the Army of Tennessee attached. General Buford's division followed up the enemy beyond Cedar Mountain, and encamped on the banks of the Rapidan.

VICTORIES IN ARKANSAS.

The rebels were driven from Fayetteville, and retired forty miles westward to Fort Washington. Official intelligence of the capture of Fayetteville, Smith, Arkansas, reaches at Leavenworth last week. The rebels, four thousand strong, under Generals Hindman, Marmaduke, and Colonel Stirling Blunt, had dispersed in all directions. General Davidson and the 36th and 37th Iowa Metes, are now at Little Rock, on the 57th ult., and drove them across the creek. The rebels, under Hindman, burned eighteen miles of bridges behind them and betook themselves to the woods. The abandonment of Little Rock must have immediately followed this movement.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.

The President has issued a proclamation suspending the writ of habeas corpus in all cases where, by the authority of the President, military, naval, and civil officers of the United States, or any of them, hold persons under their command or in their custody, either as prisoners of war, spies, or aiders or abettors of the enemy, or officers, soldiers, or seamen enrolled or drafted or mustered or enlisted in the land or naval forces of the United States, or deserters therefrom, or other military persons or persons charged, etc. The authority of all civil courts in these cases is thus set aside, until after the proclamation of the end of the rebellion of the President is declared to be continued in force during the existence of the war, or until Mr. Lincoln shall see fit to revoke it.

ATTACK ON THE RALEIGH "STANDARD."

The Richmond Enquirer of the 11th instant says: The office, types, and presses of the Raleigh (N.C.) Standard, edited by William Holden, have been destroyed by a party of soldiers, under Col. Holden in the vicinity of Graham.

In return for this outrage the citizens and friends of the Standard destroyed the office of the Greensboro' Patriot. Governor Vance reached the spot after the work of destruction was nearly completed, and succeeded in the end in desist, rebuking them for the act, and telling them that the mob example had been set by the Holden Standard.

UNION SENTIMENT IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Letters from General Foster's Department in North Carolina show very plainly the Union sentiment of the people are growing. Meetings have been held in different parts of the State in support of the Union Party, and whose loyal opinions have provoked the recent attack of the rebel soldiery.

RIOT AT MOBILE.

A dispatch from Memphis says that a fearful riot occurred in Mobile on the 4th instant. A party of soldiers' wives, to the number of six hundred, paraded the city, with exciting notices on their banners, such as "Bread or Peace." The soldiers offered no opposition to the display, but in some instances the citizens struggled to arrest the progress of the procession. Intense excitement prevailed.

JEFF DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

The Charleston Mercury has a savage article on Jeff Davis. It says that he had lost the confidence of both the army and the people.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REBEL RAMS.

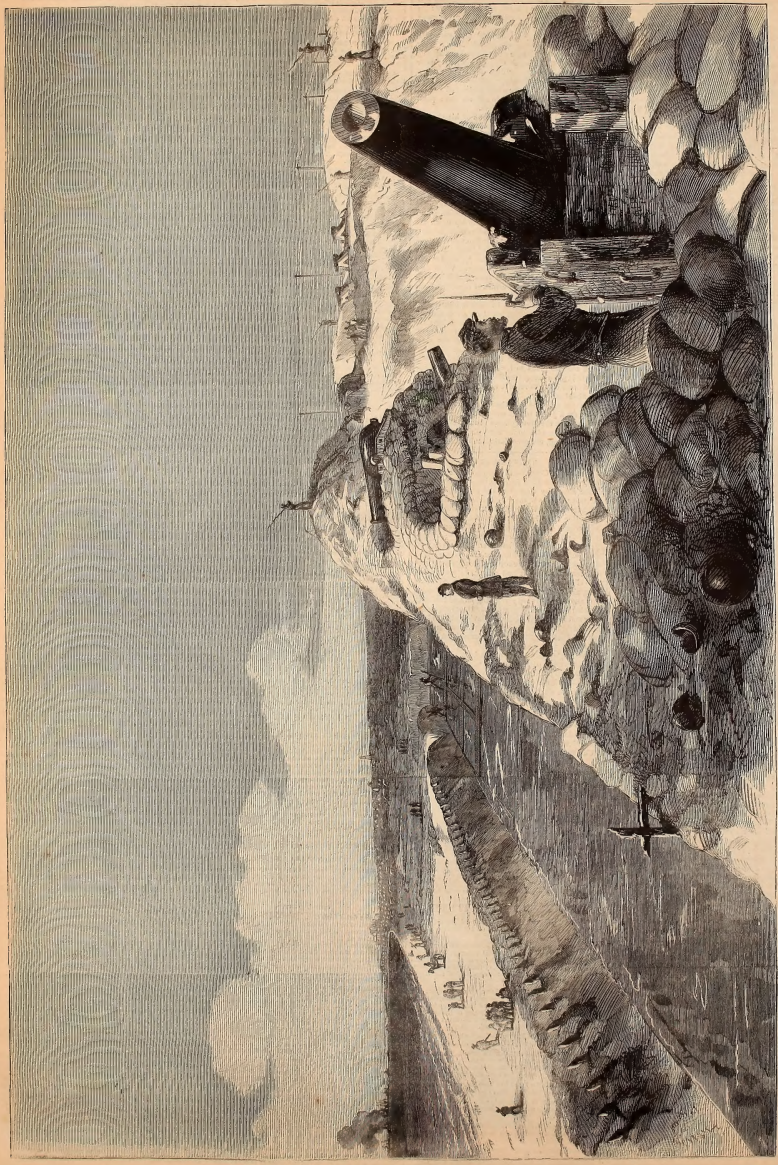
EARL RUSSELL has replied to the memorial of the Emancipation Society praying for the detention of the rebel rams at Liverpool, that the Foreign Enlistment act. He says that the subject of the detaining of the rebel rams has been engaged the attention of the Government, but has not for to obtain them until sufficient evidence to justify such a course. "Government and the intention" is not "evidence on a friendly Government." The memorialists do not ask for any act, but merely say they are "informed" that a rebel ram is fitting out in a British port. Such general representations can not be undertaken without "affidavits of credible witnesses, as in cases of misdemeanor and crimes."

FRANCE.

THE PIRATE "FLORIDA."

The Paris Moniteur defends the admission of the pirates Florida to the ports of France on the ground of the treaty between the two countries, which permits the privateer to enter, but not to ship material to enable her to refit. The Moniteur further regrets that the Confederates so billeteously, her reception for repairs is "accordling to the ordinary principles of international law."

AUSTRIA.



THE ARCHDUKE MAXIMILIAN.

The leading journals of Vienna are taking a strong position against the acceptance of the Mexican throne by the Archduke Maximilian. The Vienna Presse says, No. private news of any kind has been received, but it must be believed in the triumph of the Southern rebels, and now when "the sovereignty of secession is already decided," he wishes to plant some prince on it, then withdraw the French army and leave him to his fate.

MEXICO.

THE SHAM GOVERNMENT.

Our latest news from the city of Mexico, by way of St. Francisco, is to the 10th ult. The Juarez party still hold the representatives of foreign Powers that a legal government exists at Vera Cruz. The French have received a recognition of the powers vested in them. The ministers of the United States and of Central America remain, explaining that they should continue to recognize the State, government until they received instructions from home.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.—VIEW FROM THE SEA-FACE OF FORT WAGNER.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 621.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—SCENE OF THE DESPERATE ASSAULT UPON WAGNER, JULY 18, 1863—A SHELL FROM FORT JOHNSON.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 621.]

FOUNDLING'S WHEEL.

HAL AUCHESTER and Charley Dayter, boys of fourteen, were sauntering on the east side of a certain up-town street, dingy with tenement-houses and beer saloons, desolate with wastes more hopeless than those of Babylon, and thrown incommensurably out of countenance by a sprinkling here and there of raw brick houses, forlorn outposts of a civilization that in New York at least sets westward; the whole more unsightly in that clear golden air than on days of drizzle and of slush, for just as the sweet April time draws out into the light dank things whose nature it is to hide and crawl in dirt and bulge, so now in the wretched street, warmed into life, seemed to have spawned; and in all its stagnant gutters and black-oiled human kennels were swarming with men, women, and children, wild-eyed, ragged, noisome, hateful to behold.

Now sauntering per se is not a special irritant to human nature that I wot of, but the way that these two young cockerels of aristocracy did it seemed a throwing down of the gauntlet to mankind-and-woman in general: and presently murmurs followed in their wake, compliments ruined upon them from the door-steps, and just as they reached a half-dog collar-way something heavier,—a shower of stones.

Hal and Charley faced about at once with rustpicious promptness on the truth, I think, that common ay by means certain that this was not what, in their inmost hearts, these young savages desired. The quarrel was an old one, dating back in a general way to Cain and Abel; for these boys in particular, Hal in those days that they wore tall boots, and the sans coulottes about them toes several sizes smaller. The position was not of their own choosing, but was one which at least gave them a formidable as they appeared. Among their assailants were not more than four or five grown boys: the rest were all fry, throwing with more zeal than stone, but good principally for dodging and yelling.

These beholding the valiant front opposed to them stopped at prudent distances and looked to their leader, a veteran in service of this sort whom our boys had dubbed Danton; a hero relying very much on his avoirdupois, who came at them with a heavy battering-ram fashion, taking Hal, who stood a little in advance, first.

Hal that young gentleman been a stone-wall his demolition had been certain; as it was, he simply stepped aside, and behold one sans culotte sprawled!

"Dirt thou art, and unto dirt thou shall return," quoth Hal, looking down upon him. The crowd yelled, and on it fell Charley waved his hat.

"Hurrah! they are backing down."

Foolish Charley! hallooing before well out of the woods. For even as he spoke down fell Hal on the pavement, white and senseless, hit by a stone.

Only a street fight. No mighty matter in itself; but Lacheis spins with fine threads. A miserable quarrel about a dirt civilization a mere nothing, and this street squabble must needs put on airs of destiny and be related because of its consequences. For as it happened, for some time past Auchester's boy had been specially gray for reasons, and being in town she found the clatter of Broadway grievous, its thong inappropriately loose she had turned into a side-street, and, busy with certain thoughts, she hardly saw the increasing dinginess and squalor of all about her, but, as I said, short by the crowd, and the sight of Hal prostrate, and Charley on guard and defiant.

It was the first time in her life that she had ever found herself face to face with a necessity beyond the rule of propriety, and without a precedent bearing upon it. In such a young lady's mind as hers wherever it was decorous to suppose a young lady possible, she had been carefully instructed from pantalets up, and in the present contingency a gentlemanly sound nothing better or nobler than to gather up her weary skirts and glancing still wider apart from the leader remain where instinct roused to assert itself pitied the two boys so busily bested, and wished, in spite of her, if she could do any thing to help them; and as has been the case in many another moral conflict, a brute, blundering motion that was not even an instinct came to her after all; for, while she hesitated the crowd, obeying one of those mysterious impulses common to crowds, urged back upon her with a wave-like motion, drew her in like so much helpless foam on the dark mass, and carried her with its recoil back close upon the ring about the prostrate youth and pushed and jostled her, not a little terrified at such rough handling, fairly face to face with Charley, at whom she looked straight without knowing him: and no wonder—bruised, grimed, and bleeding, his destiny could hardly have been sure of him in such a plight.

He, however, took in this dainty apparition and its consequences at once.

"Harry's sister, by——!" (we omit the expletive, for we don't think as well of swearing as Charley did) spoke forcibly to himself, thinking the pleasant prospect I rows with the governor, and preaching at the 'paternal' generally! Miss Auchester, what ever brought you here?"

Jessie looked up confounded.

"Charley! You!"—and with that she spied Harry just before her, white and still as to the peace of death; and uttering a little cry, down she went on her knees beside him, lifting the poor head in her arm, kissing it frantically.

"Oh, they have killed him!" she cried, looking up in anguish at Charley.

On hearing that all his valorous assailants betook themselves to their heels, seeing a gallows in perspective.

"Scared by a girl, after all," said Charley, looking after them with huge contempt, to Jessie, to whom he would have been never the wiser had the earth opened and swallowed them.

Somebody, not Charley, stooped down beside her.

"My dear Miss Auchester, there is no cause for alarm. The wound is a trifle."

Jessie looked up hastily.

"Jack! you here! Oh! what shall I do?" And in that one phrase gave up a host of Spartan resolutions and an everlasting coolness of two weeks. A smile, that left undisturbed the gravity of his mouth, shone out in the depths of his eyes, and, looking into hers with a little gentle triumph and very much of tenderness.

"Do? Not very much. Allow me to call a carriage, and don't look so terrified. Parole d'honneur, the scratch is not worth your paleness."

Jessie hesitated. The prescription was simple, but it called a dangerous wound a scratch, and that she resented; and it set aside at once the everlasting question of woman's right to be an foolish fashion of trust and dependence—fashion, like most of those belonging to the Valley of Humiliation, sweet and unconscious. Besides, it involved compromises. If he aided her at all he must go home with her, and once there, return that night would be impossible; and then for very shame's sake he must ask him to stay, and—all these "ifs" admitted as facts, no one knew better than she that she would infallibly ask his pardon for having offended him within the next half hour.

Jack waited quietly till he met an upturned, puzzled look.

"Well?" he said.

Jessie looked from him to Harry with a sense of pitiful hesitation and poor pride.

"Do what you will, only help Harry." And having said that, she turned and averted face, as it suddenly occurred to her that really there was no reason why she should not have said so at once and looking steadily before her, as, under the circumstances, there was hardly any other course left open.

Meanwhile, under the ministrations of Charley the practical, Hal had revived, and was looking at his sister in ludicrous dismay.

"What is it, Jessie, severely, "you might have been killed."

"Not so easily. All the fellows of club get into these scrapes."

"Your club! A boy of your age!"

"Boy! When, then, does the man develop?"

"I beg pardon, sir," spoke of a club. What are your occupations there?"

Hal colored slightly.

"That isn't a girl's business. We smoke and play billiards."

Jessie turned away with a gesture of despair.

"Never you mind," hissed Charley in his ear. "If she makes you trouble just drop a hint about that long, tall, thin fellow with the cane which they looked at each other. Verbum sap." And he marched off whistling.

By this time Jack had the carriage in waiting. Jessie made a final effort for dignity.

"Mr. Winthrop, we are giving you too much trouble."

"Oh! if you do not wish it," stepping back.

"But I do wish it," holding out her hand imploringly.

The hand was taken and kept for a moment.

"We have a truce, then."

"No, peace."

"It would be pleasant to know why there was war. Could I have been told my fault, I might have repented."

"If you do not guess I shall not tell you."

"I wish you were calieces," broke in Hal, peevishly. "I could tell you what's your shoulder; now I am afraid of spoiling that shining stuff of yours."

"What of that, you unkind boy? You know that I love you; only when you smoke and fight—"

Hal gave himself a peevish twist. "Always hammering at the same nail: you goad a man into mischief. Besides, what does a girl know about it? I say, Jack, I was tied down to parlors and the west side of Broadway."

"A man! Oh!" and then, warned by a wise instinct, Jessie turned away from the carriage, leaning the head on her shoulder, while Jack looked on jealously, and thought "The young Cheetah's!" All this while they could not prove a word, and then there was a dusty railway which to be endured, and then a carriage waiting to bowl them along over cobble-stones, and then a long drive with an old house to be respected for its date and substantiality, to be loved for its comfortable air; its deep-bowered, square-windowed, ivy-chairs; its piazzas; turning its back on the road, fenced in from it in fact, as if, to alter Walpole a little, its builder had said, "I have proved a prospect never to let him see the highway; but looking lovingly on grassy slope and winding path, going down to the river, around which the willows, bending half in the leafy frame of their boughs a picture; a rounded purple bluff, a lovely point of land, a long stretch of river, and sky, and sweet odors, and bird-trillings, in such measure as it pleased our gracious God to give out of yield of land, a house in the last of their blossom lined the lanes that led to the old house, and, with every breeze that stirred, came in through the open casting through the warm golden air like summer snow; great trees burzed madly about, as if in utter bewilderment amidst their sweets; birds rose before them and skimmed away over the broad meadows on either side; voices of singing came from men in the fields, and, if the boughs parted over an inlet, there was the river, and some lazy sail straying past.

"Lovely!" said Jessie.

"Lovely!" echoed Jack, looking straight at her.

"Slow, I say," snapped Hal, whose head ached to crossness.

"Poor child! no club-room," cried Jessie, sympathizingly.

"If you don't drop that—"

But she had already turned her guns in another direction.

"Mr. Winthrop, it was singular that you stumbled on us so opportunely. How happened it?"

As she spoke he had moved on his hand to help her from the carriage, and for all answer he looked down at her, meeting her eyes and holding them with that singular smile in his own that broke up their calm depths like light in water, yet in which the mouth took no part. Then Jessie paid the penalty of disobeying Holy Writ, and not counting the cost before going into battle. For life, for the majority at least, is dual. There is a life of conventional talking and acting for the world, and there is an inner life of thought and desire, into which we take those nearest us in spirit, and show them what we will. That is the rule, burdened like other rules with its exception; but, struck as she had been inevitably over-sure, benumbed by the spell of a stronger will, or taken by surprise, self-control shall some time forget its office, and just at times into her very heart-core thought to that other alert and victorious spirit.

So it fared with Jessie, and such a moment was that in which she left him her on the sunny lawn, still holding her hand; and he had known it and seized it, read in that instant what she had written from him all winter with shyness and coldness, proclaimed it to her with his look, and she could not keep it—attempted not, and she had not wished or meant it. Her eyes sank before his, her face began to burn with blushes. At that moment back came Hal from a private excursion to the housekeeper's room, in full cry:

"Jessie, I say, Jess, you had better look sharp. There has been an invasion. The home is full of people. Pierre M'Clane and his mother and sisters, Sally Lennox—"

"Company," cried Jessie, and fled swiftly up the stairs to her room, where her maid was waiting. Her she promptly sent away, perhaps a little better to prepare her blinds at Windermere, musing on the piazza below; but I have noticed that some evil fate always attends such peeping, for just as she had got her eyes in position a clear voice rang out, "in quesio semplice," from the shrubbery, and a lady, in garden-hat and walking-dress, came sailing round the corner of the house, walking with springy, elastic grace, and affecting gallantly to be out of breath as she came walked. She held out her hand to Jack with the air of one talking possession of lost property.

"Mr. Winthrop! Is it possible?"

"Why not?"

"I was not aware that you knew Jessie. She is a good friend of mine. I was so glad that you came! I had resigned myself to be stupid!"

"Thank you."

"For what? Because Nature gave you a voice to read and hands to act as silk-reels. That is what I like you for. Will you come in the drawing-room? It is cool there. The other ladies haven't completed that great thing, their toilet, yet. You shall read to me, or talk—if you have any thing to say."

Thus far Jessie had heard involuntarily; and as she stood motionless from surprise she could not but see that Miss Lennox laid a with a burst of laughter in Winthrop's hand, and that before his steady look the color came singing in her clear brown cheeks, and her long, dark eyelashes fell with a burst from ward sweep; and seeing that she moved quickly away from the window—happy face below zero, fast-beating heart—with a fierce indignation.

Did men love the thing Beauty simply wherever found; or had they individual preferences, as we had supposed? Could this man—for once, in her anger, she spoke out plainly to herself—did he, by the look and tone that she had thought her own, and stored up for future thought as her own special and peculiar treasure, mean simply, "You have such eyes and voice that I admire them as I do all that is beautiful, and here is my seal of approval; and you have stately neck and pouting lips. I appreciate them also; and so on through the gamut?" Did the honor on which she had leaned with such unshaken faith; the steady tones, truthful to the last in their very modulation, live, after all, simply in her dream?

Why the too loved a stately form, a handsome presence; yet had she stood with Pierre M'Clane as she had done with Jack a moment since, she would have held herself profaned! Whence, or from whom, could men received this birthright of justifiable falsehood, allowable perfidy? she asked herself, cold and sick at heart.

Music sounded within and people crowded to the drawing-room, as they always do, contradiction only knows why, as no one ever listens. The dowagers chatted in groups, or sat easy-chairs: the girls giggled inanely in the bow-windows—for was there not a cause? Two or three young men, conscious in this story or worth particularizing, but rejoiced the hearts of these damsels! Meanwhile Miss Lennox played and sang, her voice, her very features living sparkling impossibilities among the keys, while she talked sotto voce with Mr. Winthrop leaning over the piano, occasionally breaking off to chant a verse of some ballad or a wild refrain, with a bird-like caprice not unbecoming.

A faint cloud of violet hung along her dress; in the black coils of her hair nestled heliotrope and geranium, half white, half scarlet; and the effect music and the perfumes and scents seemed to Jack in some odd way reflections of each other, and both a part of the atmosphere surrounding her and him. She talked and sang with jasmine, and water half in shadow half in white moonlight, making the keys echo her in their own way, and he listened as the Sirens to the Siren once, but they Ulysses tied himself fast.

Pierre M'Clane looked on critically. He had stayed at the door himself, and with Miss Lennox. Meanwhile his hands were busy with the violets in a little Sevres shell, pulling them to pieces as he looked, and strewing them on the marble slab.

"What have my flowers done to you that you should treat them so, poor things?" asked a voice close beside him.

A sudden, indescribable something, like a ray, or perhaps more properly a shadow, came upon Mr. M'Clane's face, rested an instant, and was gone. Then he looked up quietly.

"Done to me, Miss Auchester? Pleased me. It is the way of the world."

"Need it be yours?"

"That depends," he answered, with a curious intonation. "Some men have guardian-angels. I can not tell what one might make of me; and talking of guardians, suggests your brother."

"Romaine?"

"Yes. He is off for Washington. I met him at the depôt. He has taken unto himself a boat, and I am to tell you that you will find it here."

"Then there is just time for a row before coffee, and you will get the people together and into the boat, won't you, Mr. M'Clane?" she said, silent that way. Tell them to make ready at once."

But though her tones was clear and even joyous her face was pale, troubled, anxious, almost stern, as she stood where Pierre had left her, looking at the violets with an absent air.

Mr. Winthrop came up to her.

"Are you not going? Let me get your shawl."

"I shall indeed not."

"This is spring, not summer."

Jessie raised her eyes to his face with a look that puzzled him. It is a pity that books have no dictionary, for what she meant was this: "I have no one in whom to trust. My brother, a guardian but in name, is my chief torments and anxiety. My burden is heavier than I can bear; and you have failed me, and now come to tease me about a shawl."

He unfortunately translated it willfulness, perversity.

"Suicide is a sin," was his comment.

She answered with a hasty downward move of the hand, and catching up her nubo wound it once about her head, looking at him defiantly the while. At that he paled a little and went away. Then this consistent child repented and wished that she had been good, till she saw him by the side of Miss Lennox's boat! At that she untwisted the end of the nube from about her throat and suffered it to hang loosely over her shoulders, then getting into the boat the evening breeze struck her, and spite of herself she shuddered.

"Let me get your shawl," said Pierre, anxiously.

"No, it is here," answered Jack's voice, as he quietly wrapped it about her shoulders, whispering at the same time,

"You have revenge you like, only let it be one that will not react upon yourself."

To resist would have been a scene; to take it off against others so Jessie sat still, crimson to the temples, and conquered.

"Mr. Winthrop is irresistible," said Pierre, meanly.

"Superior force is apt to be," retorted Jessie.

Jack heard and darted a look of keen reproach. Miss Lennox heard also, and smiled to herself as trailing her fingers through the dark water, she began to sing.

The woman murmured as if in answer. The lights reflected from the banks seemed striking upward like so much radiance streaming out from coral palaces below. The boat glided into the middle stream, just commencing to sparkle in the moonlight, and the oars, having her to the gold, dance of the current, they were drifting on as if straight into a golden paradise. Pierre M'Clane sat with folded arms looking gloomily off at the dark shore lines.

"If it could be always so," he muttered.

"What?" asked Jessie.

"Life; if we could drift through it as we are now."

"Drifting per se is monotonous. It is the rest from turmoil that is pleasant."

"Is there any peace in ever climbing up the climbing wave? But you have not come yet to weariness of life."

"Why should I? I can not think with such oppress a measure condition of life, but rather a consequence of a self misunderstood, energies misdirected."

"What of hopes disappointed? The purpose of ears blasted?"

"I know nothing of that!"

"Strange! I thought that it was your hand that had dealt the blow."

"I never could interpret mysteries."

"I will explain."

"No, it matters nothing to me."

"You have to say that, and declare as you will that it matters nothing, sooner or later you will find that it does concern you," answered M'Clane, and he had fire.

Jessie was possessed of some small spirit, and it rose on this occasion.

"Mr. M'Clane," she answered, coolly, "between mere drawing-room acquaintances so much energy is quite superfluous"; and then she dropped him a cool of her notice as if he had not been.

Pierre bore it patiently, expecting his revenge on the way back, but Jessie refused that through, and sleeping past him as the boat grazed the beach ran breathlessly up the shadowed walk; and so it happened that she was in the very arms of a gentleman—fortunately an old gentleman, and of a grave appearance.

"Mr. Romaine," she cried, giving him both hands. "At last, then, you are going to be good, and give yourself a vacation?"

Mr. Romaine patted the little hands, and looked into the fresh upturned face with pity, if that had been possible.

"My dear little girl, I came on business."

"Business: hush, the roses are budding, and you will scare them back. Come and get a cup of coffee."

Here is your coffee, made as you like it, and this is cream, and I can remember that much."

As she chattered she was trying to lift a candelabrum from the mantle: a massive branching thing, too weighty for white fingers and slender wrists. She uttered a little exclamation, and Mr. Rempon being abstracted heard her not. Then,

"Superior force is not always so undesirable," said some one, as the candelabrum was taken from her falling grasp and placed upon the table. Jessie turned quickly and slipped her hand through Mr. Winthrop's arm.

"Oh, Jack, forgive me! I have been so sorry, so ashamed." (N.B. He had not spoken once to Miss Lennox in the boat.)

"There was no need."

"It was mean, shameful to say that; but I was vexed—"

"At what?"

"The people are coming in. Let me go. I want to give Mr. M'Clane some coffee. He looks wofish."

"Why were you vexed?"

"How can I tell? I am always perverse with you; I don't know why. Let me go."

She slipped from him laughing, and went as she had said to Mr. M'Clane, carrying him a little cup about as large as a nut-shell, and quietly glided to "Let us have peace," she said, offering it to him.

Pierre surveyed her in astonishment. Her color had not risen, but the pure opaque white of her complexion seemed to dazzle and glow. Her eyes had deepened into the blue that you sometimes find on a sunny leaf, and overflowed with a light soft and subdued.

"Do you know the meaning of the Scotch word, fay?" he asked, abruptly, and with a curious glance at Mr. Brompton.

"Yes; but I am not that. I am happy. I have come not to life's weariness, but its enchantment. I could say, but I am immortal."

"Here is the book," struck in Julia M'Clane's voice, who had been disputing near them. "Now listen," and she read out:

"I only know my mother's love,
Which gives all and asks nothing,
And this new loving sets the groove
Too much the way of loathing."

Now explain the last two lines mamma only," went on the fair Julia. "Mr. Walton insists that the meaning is obvious. I confess that I do not understand them."

"Still it is very simple," answered Pierre. "What refers to the perversity that is a marked symptom of the grand passion."

Then some subtle magnetism impelled Jessie to lift her eyes to those of Mr. Winthrop's, which were fixed meaningly on her face, and the words lightly spoken a few moments before came burning into her memory—"I am always perverse with you." Not all doubt the significance of such words, and past doubt also the answer of her crimson cheeks. She gave the cup hastily to Pierre, and darted into the open fragrant hall, cool and rustling with the night breeze. The library door was open, the library itself deserted. Jessie sank by a single jet of flame burning low in its globe, and a cheery fire of logs kept to expel the damps. Sitting down on the low broad hearth she listened as in a dream to the murmur of voices and the tinkle of china and silver going on in the drawing-room.

A step sounded on the walk just without the window; the vines about it rustled; some one came behind her chair, and a hand rested lightly on her bowed head. Mr. Winthrop had followed her, and now evasion, coldness, would be of no avail; her girl's artifices would serve her no further; but it has occurred to great generals to wrest victory from the moment of defeat itself, and so it happened to Jessie. Turning, flushed, trembling, reluctant, she spied an end of yellow ribbon dangling from his pocket. In an instant she had seized it.

"Why, this is mine."

"Speak more accurately. It was yours; it is mine now."

"By what right?"

"That of discovery."

"I shall claim it, and, pending the suit, it shall remain in my possession."

"Perverse again."

At that word the grew scarlet, and, snatching the ribbon, flung it into the fire. Jack made a hasty move to arrest her; falling in that, thrust his hand into the flame, brought out the yet waved blazing, crushed it in his palm, and bestowed the charred remnant in his pocket, and sat down quietly.

Stricken with remorse, Jessie dropped on her knees beside his chair.

"Oh, Jack! would have given you twenty ribbons. Let me see your hand."

"No; it is nothing," he answered, coldly, and looking over her head.

"But I will see it," using her taper fingers as a lever. "How can you be so unkind? If you want revenge, take a nobler."

At that he showed her his fingers and palm, both blistered.

Jessie exclaimed, and, catching the poor hand in hers, pressed it against her lips. Then, utterly appalled and shame-stricken, tried to escape; but as well try to wield Thor's hammer. He held her fast; he drew her toward him; looked close into her eyes; studied his lips as if about to speak; evidently released her—steps and voices were echoing in the hall, coming that way; and, only too glad to escape, Jessie fled by way of the garden.

A little after came the housekeeper with a china bowl and a bundle of linen for Mr. Winthrop's hand. Jack wrote a hasty line and sent it back to Jessie, wrapped about the box.

"I will use the latter remedy than the one already applied: If that fails, the hand deserves neither," said the note, that Jessie made a feint of throwing away, and, when no one was looking, slipped into her bosom.

There she saw it in the morning. "Saucy thing!" she said, pouting her lips at it; and then kissed it in a hurry, as if she had injured it, and blushed at herself for so doing in the glass, as she stood before it rolling back her hair. For some reason her mood was gracious as the morning: she gave her maid the lawn long desired by that young person. She behaved herself well at breakfast to Mr. Rempson.

"I was not civil to the good old gentleman. He spoke of business, and I did not even ask him what it was;" and she went down stairs humming "Il Bacio," and making virtuous resolutions.

There were people below already. Mr. Rempson, pacing up and down; Miss Lennox, in a braided Figaro jacket, and wearing a detestable air of having had a tête-à-tête with somebody; Jack, sitting near the window, holding Nell, Jessie's little sister, on his knee, and telling a story that progressed after this fashion:

"There came a locust and took out a grain of corn, and another locust came and took out another grain of corn, and another locust came and—"

Here Nell grew restive.

"Oh, that is nothing," said Jack, composedly. "This story lasts a year: you wanted a long one, you know. There came another locust and took out another grain—"

The words were cut short by two little perfumed hands clasped over his mouth—Sallie Lennox this time, crying, "Field yourself prisoner, rescue or no rescue."

He looked toward Jessie.

"Help me!" but she turned coldly away.

"You can defend yourself."

"What?" he asked, following her, and speaking low—"wounded as I am?"

As he spoke he held up his hand. Jessie glanced at it shyly, but did not look up in his face; indeed she had carefully avoided his eyes that morning.

"Look at me," he urged.

"Why?"

"It is civil to look at people with whom you are talking."

"I am not talking with you. You are talking at me."

"Admirable distinction!"

At that moment Mr. Rempson took a turn near them. Jessie ran to him and fastened on his arm.

"Mr. Rempson, you have half an hour before breakfast. Will you come and talk business now?"

They went out into the rose-walk together.

"On meeting the first, I will say," said Jessie, when looking up at her old friend. She saw his eyes glisten as through tears.

Men love to talk over their projects. Men ride their hobbies, but projects treat boys as the Old Man of the Sea did Sinbad; so Harry awoke on this eventful morning to find himself mounted, and fairly off into the breakfast-room, where the people were assembled, and Jessie should have been, but was not. Mr. Rempson was seated after a fashion of her own, and made her guests at Olympus do as Olympians do. Coffee and muffins were served on her sideboard, but on the table were only baskets of violets, great dishes of fruit, and cream pitchers, and sugar bowls filled with rose-leaves. Mercifully for that, the glass doors opened directly on the rose-walk, lined with roses, twining about trees, dropping from festoons, creeping through the grass, and exhaling sweetness.

So three senses were gratified at a time, and so it happened that Mr. Rempson was seen to Jessie coming back with Mr. Rempson, walking slowly and strangely pale; all but Harry. He saw his project, and the white sweep of Jessie's skirt, and sprang at her.

"I say, Sis, hurry with your breakfast. I want you to come and look at a horse that Dan— Halle! What's the matter now?"

"Don't bother," said Nell, with dignity. "Can't you see that she is faint?"

"No, only I should have eaten before walking," murmured Jessie, growing paler yet.

"Oh, that is all! Won't you hurry then, like a good girl? That horse is jolly, and Dick Farleigh thinks, Hi—"

"Harry, do choose your subject for the breakfast-table," remonstrated Nell.

Miss Lennox put up her eyebrows.

"Oh, Nellie! I thought that it was her grandmother."

"With those?" asked Jack, stroking her brown curls.

The child drew back.

"Excuse me, Winthrop, but it takes my maid so long to arrange them."

"Problem," quoth Miss Lennox. "One maid of ten years' how many curls required a twenty?"

"Certainly it is unusual," returned Nellie, solemnly; "but I am so nervous, Miss Lennox, I can't even bear to have them pulled."

Jessie's pale face crimsoned.

"Don't laugh at her. The child has no mother, and I am so young, that I have not mamma-aged."

"An Anchester confessing to any thing but the family pedigree," whispered Miss Lennox in Winthrop's ear. "What next?"

Jack looked grave. He was regretting certain opportunities which had slipped through his fingers, and trying to make one for himself, bungled in the attempt. Destiny knows how to arrange the circumstances—we don't; and let what might depend on ten minutes' speech with Jessie it was denied him, for Harry, from the breakfast-table straight to her room, and came down in a traveling dress. Pierre met her at the door.

"Are you ready?" he said. "The coach is ready. Shall I have the pleasure of driving you to the depôt?"

Nothing was left Mr. Winthrop but to look dismally after them. Seeing that, Miss Lennox danced up to him saucily, quoting,

"Why so pale and wan, fond lover,
Prythee why so pale?
Will when looking will can't move her,
Looking ill prevail?
Prythee why so pale?"

Jack made some absurd answer, and rushed off after Mr. Rempson, and Miss Lennox went and pouted over her crochet work in the drawing-room.

Meanwhile Pierre and Jessie drove out in utter silence through the great iron gates that clanged sullenly after them, and then, as though it were not shadow to sunshine and back again, till, on a sudden, Jessie felt her hand softly pressed.

"I am very sorry for you, child," he said, with a gentleness strange in him.

"You know then?"

"I knew months ago that Romaine was going to the devil. I was sure that his visit to Washington was a flight, and I had seen Mr. Rempson before he went to Europe. To tell the truth, that is what brought me here."

"I do not understand."

"I will explain. I promised last night. Hitherto I have preferred à 'No' in anticipation to the cruel mockery that is its positive recollection; but now that Fortune has turned her wheel so sharply, our fortunes, thrown together in her kaleidoscope, will be made one."

"I see. You think that poverty will make me practical. That I shall remember your millions when I am blame! That is not like a M'Clane."

"Jessie, you would not sell yourself; but it is not yourself of whom we are talking. You are to think of Hiland Nellie—to decide their fate. You can not now marry Winthrop."

"Mr. M'Clane?"

"I know, but this is a crisis, and in crises people call things by their names. Jack thinks as I do, that sans fortune, and with two incumbrances, the best man is but half worthy of you. But you have kept him at least in doubt hitherto; now in the winter of your fortune you can hardly accept him with self-respect."

"I do not think of marriage as a resource," answered Jessie, sharply, "and I will support myself."

"And Nellie's maid, and Hal's horse?"

"Poverty will discipline them as I should have done."

"Your pardon; poverty will discipline you, not Nellie. She is a true Anchester; pride and frivolity go equally well with her. Hal, the child of adversity is a fine expression bowling easily over this sunny road, but the discipline of being thrown over by one's friends, and losing last year's clothes through back streets, is hardly ennobling."

Jessie sighed heavily.

"Pardon me, Jessie, but do you think me brutal? I could have said to you, only that I know that your pride would not let you hear it, that Rosehill is yours by right, and that can not be sold; but, let me help you in the only way you leave me. I have no need of saying how I love you, or of describing my life, for I have myself learned to be fortunate as your husband. You and you only can make my home, and you would love me, Jessie; sooner or later you would, you are so precious to me. For Nellie's sake, for Harry's, consent."

"I can not do evil that good may come," she answered, sadly.

"That is high-flown nonsense. 'I am talking common sense to a common girl.' Now is the time for cool thought. Where are you going first?"

"To see Mrs. Hollister."

"Your aunt's friend. She is a woman of sense. Advise with her, and remember I do not think myself answered."

He took her unwilling hand to his lips and kissed it before he drove away. Jessie endured it, scarcely thinking of it. She could not marry Jack, as he had said, for she knew positively that she shown him what was in her heart, and he might think that she knew even then of the downfall of her fortune. It was too late now.

Mrs. Hollister was taking her coffee in bed, and sent for her niece to come to her room. Jessie obeyed, looking pale as face so pale and wan that even in the half light the keen old eyes descried the change and demanded the cause. Then out came the whole story. Romaine fled, the estate swamped with its debts, Rosehill to be sold, Jessie, Hal, Nellie, all left beggars. Mrs. Hollister from sipping coffee came to stirring, from stirring to indignant speech.

"Romaine deserves hanging," she said, sharply.

"But that is not all. And then—" Jessie stopped and blushed.

"Well?"

Jessie recounted the talk with Pierre, omitting only the part that was her own. Mrs. Hollister put down her coffee-cup.

"My dear child, I congratulate you," she said, energetically. "Rosehill for Elm Grove is an excellent exchange, and, of course, he will buy it in. He will like to keep the old house in the family."

"But, aunt, I do not love him."

"What then? Not that you hesitate! You are possessed, I think, of the ordinary amount of sense, and what you have to consider is your millions. I should like to know what there is left you to do but to bestow them on your knees for the chance. Why they keep up almost a state among themselves. The M'Clane girls go to bed like the princesses in the fairy tale, with gold crowns on their heads."

"I prefer a night-cap, and to support myself."

"Harry, at least, will take you as governess for pupils or employment to drop from fairy-land! Think of those poor children left in your charge by their mother. Why, acceptance is a plain and positive duty."

Lenten comfort that, but Jessie found none other in her interview. She was in the dusty, crowded car. It was twilight, close on the dark; no one knew her, no one cared for her. She could cry here quietly, and so long as she pleased. Some one took the seat beside her, but she did not even raise her head till a hand touched her shoulder. Then she turned and met Mr. Winthrop.

"Oh, Jack! I am so glad," she burst out, and stopped short. In the course of consistency how was her gladness to be explained?

"I am glad also," he answered. "I have waited and watched here for you all day, my poor stray lamb!"

Here his voice trembled a little, and he drew her toward him, and held her in his strong arm as in a sure haven.

"I am selfish enough to be glad that Rosehill is to pass, for a time, into your hands. I am also unmeasurably above my deserts as it is, and I fear that the Anchester pride and place would have weighed on me like a nightmare. It is better too for the children."

"But Jack—"

"Well?"

"I was afraid that you would think—"

"Well?"

"That I didn't love you before this misfortune."

"Why, you silly child! I have known all winter that you loved me."

"Oh!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN AFFECTING DEFINITION.

PERCOCCES CHILD. "Papa, what is humbug?"

PARENT (with a deep-drawn sigh). "It is, my dear, when your mamma happens to be very fond of me and puts no buttons on my shirt."

"We were all children once, my dears." "Ls, ma! then who took care of the babies?"

"Maumua," said a little girl, pointing to the telegraph wires, "how do they send messages by those bits of wire, without touching them to places?" "They send them in a fluid state, my dear," was the reply.

Somebody says that the oddest husbandry he knows of is the marrying of a widower in clover with a widow in debt.

John Kemble had the honor of giving the Prince of Wales some lessons in elocution. According to the vitiated pronunciation of the day, the Prince, instead of saying "oblige," would say "oblege," upon which Kemble, with a magnificent bow, began his counsels—"Sir, may I beseech your Royal Highness to open your Royal jaws, and say oblige?"

ORDINARY PRECAUTIONS.

Never on a journey be without something in your pocket-book for your hands.

Before you inspect your intended cowhider—

At if a family man, what your wife would say? This would almost determine taking it, and then going home at once to see her upon the subject.

2d. Whether the cowhider you enforce may not result in personal inconvenience to yourself; as for instance, being taken from you and the cane called in as a witness.

3d. That your motives might be misconstrued by any passers-by, and your pleasure to be sacred.

4th. The influence of natural modesty. Consider that there are much better people much better qualified to be of service in such an accident than yourself.

5th. That you are not a medical person: or if you are, that there are a great number of the same profession for your choice in the city of New York.

6th. That if the subject of the incident to be a stranger to you, he might look upon your interference as in the light of a "confounded liberty." Never push yourself forward.

7th. If the person is insensible and can not speak, how do you know but that he is in a fit, and the patient?

8th. That it's just dinner-time and you must go home, and you don't want to have been most happy, etc., etc.

9th. That it's no business of yours.

Of course many more precautions, but these are certainly among the chief. Avoid sentimentalism.

Never allow your thoughts to run upon a club and bet an umbrella.

Never do at all to-morrow what can be done to-day, except in the case of a hole in your coat. If you tell your tailor that he must be done to-day, he will be satisfied that you'll have to put it off till to-morrow.

Always have a good dinner and plenty of money.

"You are a go: I see to go first," as the bristle said to the cobbler's awl.

What medicine are we reminded of by a man bruising his wife? Holder the ache here.

A contemporary finds fault with the practice of putting Latin inscriptions on tombstones. But what more appropriate place than a grave-yard can there be for a dead language?

A comedian, in Bath, by way of puff for his benefit, publishes these lines:

Dear public, you and I, of late
Have dealt so much in lies,
I'll crush you here you more arrant,
Quadrupleated pie!
I have a pie full of eels I'll give
A great full house to see;
And if you don't eat plentiful, too,
A great fool I must be.

A wag, upon visiting a medical museum, was shown some deaths, and under specimen of mortality, it preserved in alcohol. "Well," said he, "I never thought the dead could be in such spirits."

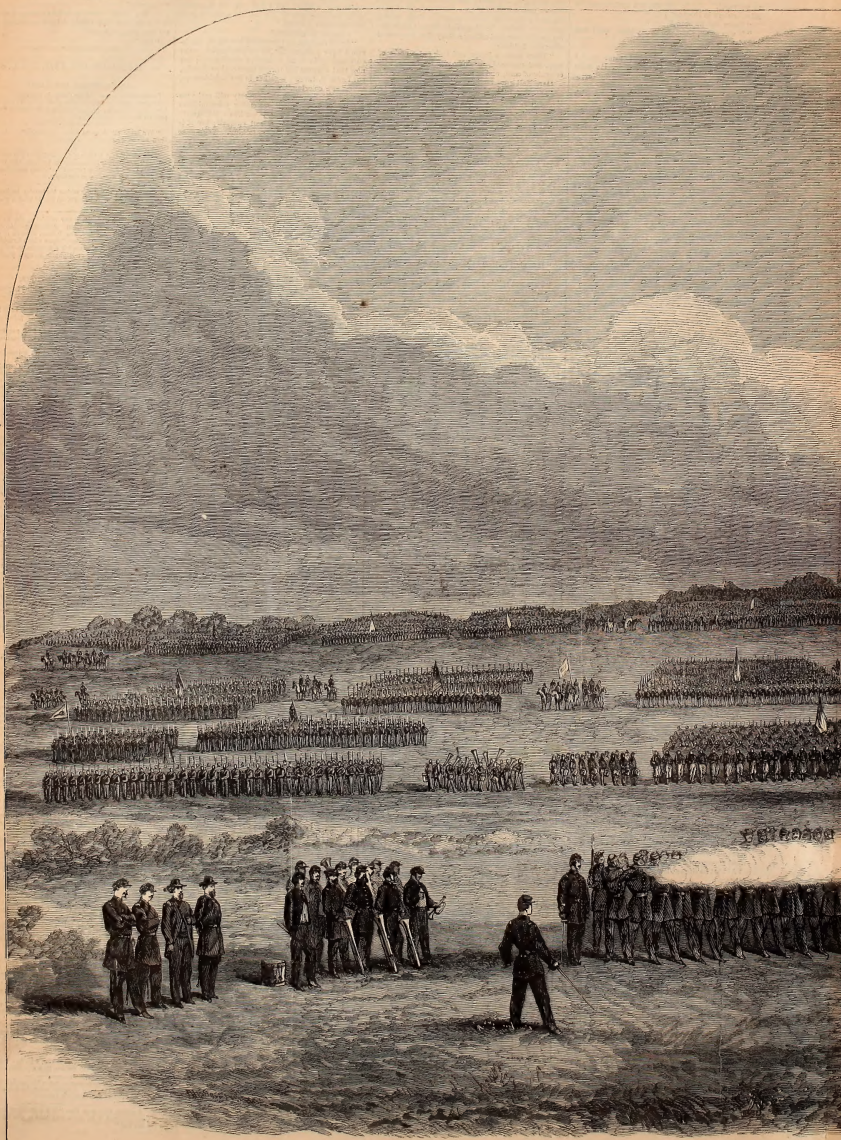
"The experience of many a life—" What a fool I have been!" "I expected to marry a wife—" What a fool I've got!"

"Where are you?" asked a father, remonstrating with his boy upon his lying in bed, said the boy, "you had been up three hours. "That's no great wonder, father," replied the son, "if I had as many tasks to travel today as the sun has, I would have risen as soon as he."

The following certificate of a marriage was found among an old lady's papers, exclusive: "So, Sir," said Lord Mansfield, in very concern, that Arthur Waters and Anny Yorkier were lawfully married by me, John Higgins, curate, on the first day of August, anno 1663.

I, Arthur, on Monday,
Take thee, Anny, till Tuesday,
To have and to hold till Wednesday,
For better for worse till Thursday,
And kiss thee Friday;
If we don't agree on Saturday,
I'll wish thee gone Sunday.

A stranger, on taking his seat lately in the pit of a theatre, accosted a gentleman who sat near him, "Pray, Sir, can you tell me," said he, "the name of that tall, thin gentleman, starting from the reverie in which he had been apparently enchanted." "No, Sir," but I shall have two next week, and both ungoverned for."



"Hallo, Jack! I thought you were off in the train this morning?" "Well, I did, tell you, Jim; there was two or three reasons why I didn't go. In the first place, Cyrene, I got left—" "Oh never mind! That'll do. You needn't give the other reasons."

"Class in the middle of Geography, stand up," said a schoolmaster. "What is a pyramid?" he asked. "A pyramid is a stone," was the reply of a little boy. "Where's Egypt?" "Where it always was." "Where's Wales?" "All over the sea." "Never the sea," said the schoolmaster, "stay there till I show you a cipeles of birch that grows all over this country."

Mrs. Partington says, that Dr. who has just returned from France, "speaks French like a Parisheaner."

A retired schoolmaster evinces his passion for angling by saying that, from constant habit, he never feels quite himself unless he's handling the rod.

A young lady says that "if a curl-wheel has nine follows attached to it, it's a pity that a girl like her can't have one."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—EXECUTION OF FIVE DESERT

STEAM IN THE FIFTH CORPS.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 622.]

TWO SEAS.

A MARINER by tempest crost
Lay struggling with the wave;
His one sole hope—all else was lost—
His hoarded gold to save.

Slung from his neck—a weary weight—
His precious charge he bore;
His failing strength, at war with fate,
Could bear no feather more.

But not against his life alone
Uprose the breakers wild;
A woman, on the billows thrown,
Held up her drowning child.

"Save her!" she cried; "in mercy save!"
As through the surf she rolled:
He saw, and cast beneath the wave
His prize of Indian gold.

Fearless he breasts the tropic storm
With limbs by love new strung,
While round his neck, all soft and warm,
Two infant arms are flung.

He hails the land—the blessèd land!
He drinks its spicy air;
He strains to reach its coral strand,
He greets it with a prayer.

Vainly the angry tempest raved,
His foot have touched the goal;
And, with living burden saved,
He stands—a rescued soul!

II.

The child has lived, bloomed, loved, and died.
Alone the old man lies:
Another sea, of stiller tide,
Steals o'er his closing eyes.

Glows now for him no tropic light,
But, where life's waters freeze,
The glory of the Polar night—
The Arctic seas!

His hard-earned gold beneath the deep
Lies hid; but where is she,
His God-gift, whom the star-worlds keep,
His daughter of the sea?

Where cloud-waves foam the rippled skies,
Touched by the golden day,
An angel form in angel guise
Floats up the liquid way.

He follows, hushed in rapt delight,
Of dread and death beguiled,
She, swimming slow with pinions bright,
He, clinging like a child.

The dross of earth is cast away;
She leads him by the hand.
Through heaven's blue sea her white wings play:
He nears the happy land.

She parts the wave that beats him back;
He breasts life's surge no more:
His fo.'s, upon an angel's track,
Have touched the immortal shore.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proofs now purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE note Alfred Hardie received on the 10th of April was from Peggy Black. The letters were well formed, for she had been educated at the national school; but the style was not upon a par.

"Mr. Alfred, Sir,—Margaret Black sends her respects, and if you want to know the truth about the money, I can tell you all, and where it is at this present time. Sir, I am now in situation at Silverton Grove House, about a furlong from the station; and, if you will be so good to call there and ask for Margaret, I will tell you where it is, which I mean the £14,000; for it is a sin the young lady should be beguiled of her own. Only you must please come this evening, or else to-morrow before ten o'clock, by reason my mistress and me we are going up to London that day early, and she talk of taking me abroad along with her.

"I remain, Sir,
"YOURS respectfully to command,
"MARGARET BLACK.

"If you please, Sir, not to show this letter on no account."

Alfred read this twice over, and felt a contemptuous repugnance toward the writer, a cashiered servant, who offered to tell the truth out of spite, having easily resisted every worthy motive. Indeed, I think he would have perhaps dismissed the subject into the fire, but for a strange circumstance that had occurred to him this very afternoon; but I had no opportunity to relate it till now. Well, just as he was goin' to dress for dinner, he received a visit from Wycherley, a gentleman he already knew by name. Mr. Wycherley inquired after his kephalagia: Alfred stared and told him it was much the same; treated both occasionally.

"And your insomnia."

"I don't know the word: have you any anodynyfor it?"

Dr. Wycherley smiled with a sort of benevolent superiority, that galled his patient, and proceeded to inquire after his nightly visions and voices. But at this Alfred looked grave as well as surprised and vexed. He was on his guard now, and asked himself seriously what was the meaning of all this, and could his father have been so mad as to talk over his own shame with this stranger? he made reply with reserve.

Dr. Wycherley's curiosity was not of a very ardent kind: for he was one of those who first form an opinion, and then collect the materials of one: and a very little fact goes a long way with such minds. So, when he got no answer about the nocturnal visions and voices, he glided calmly on to another matter. "By-the-by, that £14,000!"

Alfred started; and then eyed him keenly: "What £14,000?"

"The fabulous sum you labor under the impression of your father having been guilty of clandestinely appropriating."

This was too much for Alfred's patience: "I don't know who you are, Sir," said he; "I never exchanged but three words in my life with you, and do you suppose I will talk to a stranger, or family matters of so delicate a kind as this? I begin to think you have intruded yourself on me simply to gratify an impertinent curiosity."

"The hypothesis is at variance with my established character," replied the clesginous one. "Do me the justice to believe it was necessity of this investigation, and that it is one of a most friendly character."

"Then I decline the double nuisance: your curiosity and your friendship! take them both out of my room, Sir, or I shall turn them both out by my pair of shoulders."

"You shall smart for this," said the doctor, driven to plain English by anger, that great sobrent of circumlocution with which Providence has mercifully supplied us; he made to the door, opened it, and said, in considerable excitement to one outside, "Excited!—Very!"

Now Dr. Piconsat had no sooner been converted to the persuasion, that Wycherley and another stranger entered the room: he had evidently been lurking in the passage: it was a man of stalwart stature, singularly gentle, regular, and haggard, but dressed in a spruce suit of black, tight, new, and glossy. In short, he looked like Roman's apothecary gone to bed with the money. He fluttered in with pale cheek and apprehensive body, saying hurriedly, "Now, my dear Sir, let me calm you before Dr. Wycherley come down to see you." And he handed Alfred a card on which his name and profession were written.

"Well, Mr. Speers," said Alfred, "I have only a moment to give you, for I must dress for dinner. What do you want?"

"I come, Sir, in hopes of convincing your friends you are not the author of this calumny. Why your eye is steady, your complexion good; a little high with the excitement of this conversation: but, if we can only get over this little delusion, all will be well."

"What little delusion?"

"About the £14,000, you know."

"What £14,000? I have not mentioned £14,000 to you, have I?"

"Why, Sir; you seem to shun it like poison; that is the worst of it; you talk about it to others fast enough; but to Dr. Wycherley and myself, who could cure you of it, you would hide all about it, if you could."

At this Alfred rose and put his hands in his pockets, and looked down with pity on his instructor. "Mr. Speers," said he, "you had better go. There is no credit to be gained by throwing on small a superfluity of wit on a case in this window; and you won't find it pleasant either; for, if you provoke me to it, I shall kick you out accordingly. I don't open the window first, as I should for Dr. What's his confounded name."

At these words Wycherley looked more suppressed ire and flashing eyes, Speers scuttled to the door crabwise, holding the young lion in front, and looked round for help; but the lion was valiant as a sheep's; and a joyful apothecary was he when he found himself safe outside the door and beside Dr. Wycherley, who was waiting for him.

Alfred soon cooled, and began to laugh at his own anger and the unbecoming violence of his visitors; but, on the other hand, it struck him as a grave circumstance that so able a man as his father should stir muddy water; should go and talk to these strangers about the money he had misappropriated. He puzzled himself all the time he was dressing: and not to trouble the reader with all the conjectures that passed through his mind, he arrived at last at the fact, Hardie must feel very strong, very sure there was no evidence against him but his son's, or he would not take the eighth commandment by the horns like this.

"Injustice carries it with a high hand," ... ed, with a sigh. He was not the ... to imitate his father's shamelessness: so he locked this last incident in his own breast; did not even mention it to Julia.

But now, on reading Peggy's note, his warlike instincts awoke, and, though he despised his correspondent and her motives, he could not let such a chance pass of defeating brazen injustice. He was determined at once forward to have to go to Silverton on his wedding morning; but, after all, there was plenty of time. He packed up his things a day before the wedding tour, and in the morning took them with him in the fly to Silverton: his plan was to come back direct to Albion Villa; as, if he went to Silverton Grove dressed, all ready for the wedding.

As it happened he overtook his friend Peterson, just outside the town, called to him gayly, and invited him to church and breakfast.

To his surprise the young gentleman replied sullenly that he should certainly not come.

"Not come, old fellow?" said Alfred, hurt. "Have a good cheek to ask me," retorted the other.

This led to an explanation. Peterson's complaint was that Miss Alfred he was in love with Julia, and Alfred had gone directly and fallen in love with her, just to cut him out.

"What are you talking about?" said Alfred; "so this is the reason you have kept away from me of late: why, I was engaged to her at the very time; only my father was keeping us apart."

"Then why didn't you say so?"

"Because you gave me no time for prattling sort."

"Oh, nonsense; I don't believe a word of it."

"You don't believe my word! Did you ever know me tell a lie? And that rate think what you please, Sir: drive on, Strabo."

And so ended that little friendship.

On the road Alfred soberly youth arranged in his head a noble scheme. He would bring Peggy Black home with him, compensating her liberally for the loss of place, and thereby lose: notify confront her privately with his father, and convince him it was his interest to restore the Dodds and Hardies with a good grace, take the £6000 he had already offered, and countenance the wedding by letting Jane be present at it. It was hard to ask all this in the time, but well worth trying for, and not impossible: a twopenny bit, and a little perseverance, and he offered the man a guinea to drive fast; so that it was not nine o'clock when they reached Silverton. Here, however, all he had pulled a porter along with the bell; and a gray-haired servant out of livery stood on the steps to receive him. He announced the object of the visit, which was trimmed as neatly as a college green, and asked the servant if he could see Margaret Black.

"Margaret Black!" said the man, doubtfully: "I'll inquire, Sir. Please to follow me."

They entered a handsome hall, with antlers and armor: from this a double staircase led up to a landing with folking-doors in the centre of it: one of these doors was wide open, like the iron gate outside. The servant showed Alfred up the left-hand staircase, through the open door, into a spacious drawing-room, handsome, though not gayly furnished and decorated; but a little darkened by Venetian blinds.

The old servant paused gravely on, and on, till Alfred began to think he would butt the wall; but he put his hand out and opened a door, that was nearly close, escape a stranger's notice; for it was covered with looking-glass, and matched another narrow mirror in shape that was on the other side of a very long room, as plain and even sordid as the drawing-room was inviting; the unpapered walls were a cold drab, and a narrow bed there was at each end, cobweb up in one corner, and from the ceiling hung the tail of another, which the housemaid's broom had omitted to sweep down: that side of the room they entered by was all books. The servant said, "Stay here a moment, Sir, and I'll call her to you." With this he retired into the drawing-room, closing the door softly after him; once closed, it became invisible: it fitted like wax, and left nothing to be seen but books; not even a knob. It shut so with that gentle but close click which, to the sensitive ear, betrays well oiled and gently closed, will emit. Altogether it was enough to give some people a turn. But Alfred's nerves were not to be affected by trifles; he put his hands in his pockets and walked up and down the room, quietly enough for him, but rather nervously. "Confound her for wasting my time," thought he; "why doesn't she come?"

Then, as he had learned to pick up the fragments of time, and hated dawdling, he went to take a book from the shelves.

Then, as he had learned to pick up the fragments of time, and hated dawdling, he went to take a book from the shelves.

"Well," thought he, "this is the first dummy ever took me in. I wish I could see the man most he! Why, he could have bought books with ideas in them for the price of these impostors."

Still Peggy did not come. So he went to a door opposite and at right angles to the farthest window, meaning to open it and inquire after her: lo and behold he found this was a knob without a door. There had been a door, but it was blocked up. The only available door on this side had a key-hole, but no latch nor handle.

Alfred was a prisoner.

He no sooner found this out than he began to hammer on the door with his fists and call out.

This had a good effect, for he heard a woman's dress come rustling: a key was inserted in the door opened. But, instead of Peggy, it was a tall well-formed woman of thirty, with dark eyes, and straight hair, handsome massive and black as jet. She was dressed quietly, but like a lady. Mrs. Archbold, for that was her name, cast an Argus eye of one swift all-observing glances, with which her sex contrive to take in the features, character, and dress of a person from head to foot, and smiled most graciously on him, revealing a fine white set of teeth. She begged him to take a seat, and sat down herself. She had left the door ajar.

"I came to see Margaret Black," said Alfred.

"Margaret Black? There is no such person here," was the quiet reply.

"What, has she gone away so early as this?"

Mrs. Archbold only smiled, and said, soothingly, "Are you sure she ever existed, except in your imagination?"

Alfred laughed at this, and showed her Peggy's letter. she ran her eye over it, and returned it him with a smile of a different kind, half-pitying, half-cynical. But presently resuming her former manner, "I remember now," said she, in dulcet tones: "the anxiety you are laboring under is making you dream of money: it is not it?"

"What, can you give me any information about it?" said he, surprised.

"I think we can render you great service in the matter, infinite service, Mr. Hardie," was the reply in a voice of very honey.

He looked amazed at this. "You say you don't know Peggy! And yet you seem to know me. I never saw you in my life before, madam; what on earth is the meaning of all this?"

"Calm yourself," said Mrs. Archbold, laying a white and finely-moulded hand upon his arm, "there is no occasion whatever for you in the matter: you were expected."

The last rushed into Alfred's face, and he started to his feet: some vague instinct told him to be gone from this place.

The lady fixed her eyes on him, put her hand to a gold chain that was round her neck, and drew out of her white bosom, not a locket, nor yet a bag, but a small white whistle; before he was steadily fixed on Alfred, she breathed softly into the whistle. Then two men stepped quietly in at the door: one was a slim stout young man, with great red whiskers, the other a wiry gentleman with iron-gray hair. The latter spoke to Alfred, and began to call him Mr. Hardie. "Be good; and that you may be cured, and so restored to society, and to your anxious and affectionate relations."

"What are you talking about? what do you mean?" cried Alfred; "are you mad?"

"No, we are not," said the short snob, with a coarse laugh.

"Have done with this fooling, then," said Alfred, sternly; "the person I came to see is not here; good-morning."

The short man instantly stepped to the door, and put his back to it. "Not so fast," said, calmly, "Mr. Hardie, you can not leave the house at present."

"Can't I? Why not, pray?" said Alfred, drawing his breath hard: and his eyes began to flutter dangerously.

"We are responsible for your safety; we have force at hand if necessary; pray do not compel us to use force."

"Why where, in God's name, am I?" said Alfred, panting now: "is this a prison?"

"No, no," said Mrs. Archbold, soothingly; "it is a place where you will be cured of your headaches and your delusions, and subjected to no unnecessary pain nor restraint."

"Oh, bother!" said the short snob, brutally. "Why make two bites of a cherry? You are in a madhouse, a private gentleman, and a devilish nicky thing for you."

At this fatal word "asylum," Alfred uttered a cry of horror and despair, and his mind acted wildly round the room in search of escape. But the windows of the room, though outside the house they appeared to come as low as those of the drawing-room, were barely bricked up within, and made just too high to be reached without a chair. And his captors read that wild glance directly, and the doctor whipped one chair away, and Mrs. Archbold another, and sat quietly down on the other. They all three blew their whistles shrilly.

Alfred stood an oath and rushed at the door: but heard heavy feet running on stone passages toward the whistles, and felt he had no chance and that way: so he turned to the door on the handle of the old defunct door: he made a high leap, came down with his feet foot on its knob for a base, and his hands on the panels could not stand on it, contrived to spring from it ship at the window—Mrs. Archbold screamed—he broke the glass with his shoulder, and tore and kicked the wood-work, and squeezed through on to a stone ledge outside, and stood there bleeding and panting, just as a bull dog escapes burst into the room at his back. He was more than twenty feet from the ground: to leap down was death or mutilation; he saw the Brman driving away. He yelled to him, "Hy! hy! stop! stop!" The German stopped and looked round. But soon as he saw who it was, he just grinned: Alfred could see his hideous grin; and there was the rattle of chairs being brought to the window, and men were mounting softly to secure him; a coarse hand stole toward his ankle; he took a swift step and sprang desperately on to the next ledge:—it was an old manor-house, and these ledges were nearly a foot broad:—From this one he bounded to the next, and then to a third, the last but one on this side the building; the corner ledge was but half the size, and offered no safe footing: but close to it he saw the outside leaves of a fig-tree; then rose them must grow close to the corner; could he but get ground to it he might yet reach the ground whole. Urged by that terror, and as loose which is natural to a sane man, and in England is fed by occasional disclosures, and the general suspicion they excite, he leaped to a piece of stone higher than one's hat, and thus whirled himself round into the tree, all eyes to see and claws to grasp.

It was a weeping ash: he could get hold of nothing but soft yielding slivers, that went through his fingers, and so down with him like a bathing suit, except he went with his hands full of green leaves over head and ears into the water of an enormous iron tank that fed the baths.

The heavy plunge, the sudden cold water, the instant darkness, were appalling; yet, like the fox among the hounds, the gallant young gentleman did not lose heart nor give tongue. He came up gurgling and gasping, and swam round for his life in mensly silence: he swam round and round the edge of the huge tank trying in vain to get a hold upon its cold pure sides. He heard whistles and voices about; they came faint to him where he was, but he knew they could not be very far off.

Life is sweet. It flashed across him how, a few years before, a university man of great promise had died miserably in a tank on some Swiss mountain, a tank placed for the comfort of travelers. He lifted his eyes to Heaven in despair, and gave one great cry.

Then he turned upon his back and floated: but he was obliged to paddle with his hands a little to keep up.

A window opened a few feet above him, and a face peered out between the bars.

Then he could sit up for lost, and looked to hear a voice denounce him; but no, the livid face and staring eyes at the window took no notice of him; it was a maniac, whose sense, short of reason, conveyed no images to the sentient brain: only to some half vegetable instinct this darkened man was turning toward the morning sun, and staring it full in the face; Alfred saw the rest then, if possible, steal away. Every faculty of mind and body was strung up to defend himself against the wretches who had entrapped him.

He had not been long in this position when voices approached and next the shadow of a ladder moved across the wall toward him. The keepers were going to search his pitiable hidingplace. They knew what he did not, that there was no outlet from the premises: so now, having hunted every other corner and cranny, they came by what he called the exhausting process of reasoning to this tank; and, when they got near it, something in the appearance of the tree caught the gardener's quick eye. Alfred quaking heard him say, "Look here! He is not far from this."

Another keeper said, "Then the Lord have mercy on him; why there's seven foot of water; I measured it last night."

At this Alfred was conscious of a movement and a murmur, that proved humanity was not extinct; and the ladder was fixed close to the tank, and fast down hastily up it.

Alfred despaired.

But, as usual with spirits so quick-witted and resolute, it was but for a moment. "One man in his time plays many animals" he caught at now would be bad board, and played with the jackal desperate plays in India, the fox in England, the elephant in Ceylon; he feigned death: lifted his mouth with water, and turned on his back paddling imperceptibly, and half closed his eyes.

He was rewarded by a loud shout of dismay just above his head, and very soon another ladder was placed on the other side, and with ropes and hooks he was drawn out and carried down the ladder; he took this opportunity to discharge the water from his mouth; on which a coarse voice said, "Look there! His troubles are at an end."

However, they laid him on grass, and sent for the doctor: then took off his coat, and one of them began to feel his heart to see whether there was any pulsation left: he found a thumping. "Look out," he cried, in some alarm, "he's shaming Abraham."

But before the words were well uttered, Alfred, who was a practiced gymnast, bounded off the ground without touching it with his hands, and fled like a deer toward the front of the house; for he remembered the open iron gate: attendants followed shouting, and whistle answered whistle all over the grounds. Alfred got safe to the iron gate: alas! it had been closed at the first whistle twenty minutes ago. He turned in rage and desperation, and the head-keeper, a powerful man, was rushing incautiously upon him. Alfred instantly steadied himself, and with his long arm caught the man in full career a left-handed blow like the kick of a pony, that laid his cheek open and knocked him stupid and staggering: it followed it up like lightning with his right, and, throwing his whole weight into this second blow, sent the staggering man to grass; slipped past another, and skirting the south side of the house got to the tank and was down well out of his pursuers, seized the ladder, carried it to the garden wall, and was actually half-way up it, and saw the coast comparatively clear, when the ladder was dragged away and he fell heavily to the ground, and a keeper threw himself bodily on him. All feud half expended on the first man fell to foot in time, dashed it furiously in the coming face, actually knocking the man backward: another wrenched on his shoulders, caught him by the throat so fully that he lost all power, and they rolled over and over together, and Alfred got clear and ran for it again, and got up the middle of the lawn, and hallooed to the house: "Hy! hy! Are there any more sane men imprisoned there? come out, and fight for your lives!" Instantly the open windows were filled with white faces, some grinning, some exulting, all greatly excited; and a hideous uproar shook the whole place—for the poor souls were all sane in their own opinion—and the keepers and attendants, two of them bleeding profusely from his blows, made a cordon and approached him; but he was too cunning to wait fairly surrounded; he made his rush at an under-keeper, feinted at his head, caught him a heavy blow in the pit of the stomach, doubled him up, and bounded, and off again, leaving the man on his knees vomiting and groaning. Several mild maniacs ran out in a neat agitation and were easily collared to help catch him. Vast was their zeal. But, when it came to the point they only danced wildly about and cried, "Stop him! stop him! stop him! he's ill, dreadfully ill; poor wretch! knock out his brains!" And, whenever he came near them, away they ran, leaving like hares cares.

Mrs. Archbold, looking out at a window, advised them all to let him alone, and the would come out and surrender. "He'll find he'll have to be advised; they chased him about the lawn: but so swift of foot was he, so long of wind and reach, that no one of them could stop him, nor indeed come near him, without getting a face that came back to the doctor.

At last, however, they got so well round him, he saw his chance was gone: he took off his hat to Mrs. Archbold, and said quietly, "I surrender to you, madam."

At the words they rushed on him rashly; on this he plunged through them, and, as well as a cat attacked by dogs; administered two fearful black eyes, and instantly folded his arms, saying haughtily, "I was to the lady I yielded, not to you fellows."

They seized him, shook their fists in his face, turned him, and pushed him by his own private sieve: they handcuffed him, and drove him before them, shoving him every now and then roughly by the shoulders. And on this retinue, spoke no word. They took him to the strong-room, and manacled his ankles together with an iron bar, and left him there; but from the bedposts, and fastened his body down by broad bands of tinking with leathern straps at the ends; and so left him helpless than a swaddled infant. The hurry and excitement of the capture over, and the prisoner secure, misery came down and sat like lead on him. He lay mute as death in his gloomy cell, a tomb within a living tomb, and felt it. The darkness horror grew and grew in his dilating eyes; gusts of rage swept over him, shook him, and passed; then gusts of despair to wake sullenly remained and went, but his bonds. What would his Julia think? He could only let her know! At this thought he called, and, when he begged for a messenger: there was no reply. The cry of a dangerous lunatic from the strong-room was less heeded here than a bark from a watch-dog kennel in Christendom. "This is my father's doing," he said. "Curse him! Curse him! Curse him!" and his brain seemed to burst. Then his unbridled he vowed to God to be revenged on his father.

Then he writhed at his own meanness in coming to it's worst—revenge—he begged for a messenger: there was no reply. The cry of a dangerous lunatic from the strong-room was less heeded here than a bark from a watch-dog kennel in Christendom. "This is my father's doing," he said. "Curse him! Curse him! Curse him!" and his brain seemed to burst. Then his unbridled he vowed to God to be revenged on his father.

Then he writhed at his own meanness in coming to it's worst—revenge—he begged for a messenger: there was no reply. He groaned aloud. The cheek in the hall struck ten. There was just time to get back if they would lend him a conveyance. He shouted, he screamed, he prayed. He offered bribes, he implored them to would forgive his father, forgive them all; he would say no more about the money; would do any thing, consent to any thing, if they would only let him keep faith with his Julia: they had better consent, and not provoke his vengeance. "Have mercy on me!" he cried. "Don't make me insult her I love. They will all be waiting for me. It is my wedding-day. Oh pray send the lady to me; she can't be all stone, and my misery might melt a stone." He listened for an answer, he prayed for an answer. There was none. Once in a mad-house, the sanest man is mad, however innocent and defaced the character of the relative who has brought two of them to wait their pleasure. Alfred's coat was thrown behind his back; and, once hobbled and strapped, he is a dangerous maniac, for just so many days, weeks, or years as the landlord's purse and jacket happen to be left upon him by inhumanity, economy, or simple carelessness. Poor Alfred's cries and prayers were heard, but no more noticed than the night howl of a wolf on some distant mountain. All was silken silence, but the grating tongue of the lock, which told the victim of a legislature's shallowness and a father's avarice that Time, deaf to his woe, as were the walls the men the women and the cattending bands, was stealing away with iron finger his last chance of meeting his beloved at the altar.

He closed his eyes, and saw her lovelier than ever, dressed all in white, waiting for him with sweet concern in that peerless face. "Julia! Julia!" he cried, with a loud heart-broken cry. The bell hour struck. At that he struggled, writhed, he bounded; he made the very room shake, and lacerated his flesh; but that was all. No answer. "Julia, you have left me!" he sighed.

The perspiration rolled down his steaming body. The tears burst from his young eyes and ran down his cheeks. He sobbed, and sobbing almost choked, so tight were his linen bands upon his bursting bosom.

He lay a long time thus.

The clock ticked harshly on: the rest was silence. With this miserable exception; ever and more and more the victim's jammed body shuddered terribly it shook and rattled the iron bedstead, and told of the storm within, the agony of the racked and all foreboding soul.

For then rolled over that young head hours of mortal anguish that no tongue of man can utter, nor pen can unbook. Chained sane among the mad; on his wedding-day; expecting with tied hands the sinister acts of the soul-murderers who had the power to make their lie a truth! We can paint the body writhing vainly against its unjust bonds; he who can paint the loathing, agonized soul in a mental situation so ghastly? For my part I feel it in my heart of hearts, but am impotent to convey it to others; impotent, impotent.

Pray think of it for yourselves, " and when, if you can, write a more terrible tale than ever a novel. Think of it, for your sons sakes; Alfred's turn to-day, is my yours to-morrow.

A GIFT BY THE WAY-SIDE.

THE old farm-house clock had just struck seven, and over all the hills the purple vapors of twilight were creeping, wafted by the breezy odors among the sweet-fern in the pastures and the blue wild-grapes ripening in the woods, while the whip-poor-will began to call on the many sides of the luxuriant fence that skirted the ravine, and the katydids chirped shrilly through the morning-glory leaves above the open window.

"Seven o'clock!" echoed Silas Miller, just as though he had not been watching that slow-creeping minute-hand for the last half hour. "I'll tell you he bere now—my boy will soon be here!"

What a strange softening of the rugged features, what an unwonted light of the harsh voice there was, when he uttered the two simple words "My boy!" Yes, Silas had a boy, who was coming back from the smoke of half a score of battle-fields; no wonder that the thought sent a thrill through his stern heart. "I'll tell you what—"

"Surely I ought to hear the stage-horn," he said, feverishly pacing up and down the narrow path, where the sunflowers lay like a carpet of pale gold. "Listen, Sybil! don't you hear it?"

"It's too early yet, father."

The light figure was standing out to his side, and both together leaned over the garden-gate, gazing into the opal gloom of twilight with wistful, searching eyes.

She was not prettier than many another New England girl, yet there was a delicate type of beauty in her face that could belong to much in the "frozen North" as its pine forests and cliffs of eternal snow. Pale brown hair, with auretic lights crossing its rich masses, eyes like the blue larkspur, and lips that had stolen the dewy crimson of the wild rose; in pearls and blue crape Sybil Miller would have been a beauty; in her dress of gray gingham, she was something far better and nobler.

Suddenly the old man started and uttered an indistinct, glad cry.

"It's he, Sybil; don't you see, beyond the elder bushes! Child, don't hold me back; let me go and meet my boy!"

"No, father, you are mistaken; it is not Lawrence; Laurence is shorter by half a head, and that is not his quick, buoyant step!"

"Your eyes are failing, Sybil," Silas Miller, almost petulantly. "Why do these vagrant soldiers go wandering by, giving honest folks such a start?"

"I speak only what I see, and am watching for Laurence," said Sybil, half smiling in the dusk.

"It was only this morning that a beggar, disguised as a soldier, came here—So United States uniform, came by, and had the audacity to ask me for money!"

"Did not you give him something?"

"Give him something?" repeated Silas, angrily. "I'd have given him a starving lynx! I have no patience with these strolling beggars. Here's another specimen of the kind, I suppose. No, my boy, you needn't trouble yourself to recite your pitiful story!"

For the tall figure, with halting step and cast blackly upon the ground, had paused in front of the gate, and Sybil could just discern dark, piercing eyes, and a forehead curiously traversed by a crescent-shaped scar, apparently newly healed.

"I have nothing for you," said Silas, stanchly. "Yes, yes, I know what you would say, but it's no use. I have been warning the proper authorities will take care of you, and if you're not, the county jail is the place for you. Don't tell me about want; what have you done with your bounty money and your pay, if you're really what you pretend to be—a soldier?"

Even through the twilight Sybil could see the scarlet flush rising to the scarred forehead.

"Sir, you are mistaken. I did not beg!"

"No, you'd prefer to play the bully, I've no doubt. But I'm not a proper subject for you, so be about your business, sirrah!"

The soldier turned silently away, with a step more halting perhaps and a head more depressed, and passed slowly into the gathering dusk.

"Father," whispered Sybil, reproachfully, "had you forgotten that our Laurence too is a soldier?"

"No," returned Silas, abruptly, "I remembered it, and it convinced me all the more that a man, paid and pensioned like our Laurence, has no need to beg on the public highways."

"But, father, he did not beg."

"Because I would not allow it, child. I pay taxes for the support of such as he, and I swear I will do no more!"

He spoke in the sharp, high-pitched accents of passion, and when he looked round again Sybil was gone.

Footsore and weary, the travel-worn pedestrian had sat himself down on a mossy boulder by the road-side, when a quick, light footstep came up a little beyond him, leading from the back door of the farm-house, through blackberry pastures and mown fields, and a slight figure bent above him.

"I could not bear my father's words: he was angry and unreasonable," she said, hurriedly. "I have little to give, but I want you to take it for the sake of my soldier-brother."

Before he could speak she had unfastened from her neck a blue ribbon with a tiny gold piece suspended from it, placed it in his hand, and was gliding away across the fields like some little gray nun, in her sober-hued dress. He rose up, as if to follow and overtake her, but it was too late, and as he bent his head over the gleaming token something grew like a tear dropped upon its circlet of tiny stars.

"And now tell us every thing that has happened to you, Laurence? Oh, Laurence, when I walked this morning it seemed all a dream that you had come back to me again in very truth!"

The bronzed, handsome young soldier looked smilingly down into the radiant face that nestled against his shoulder, and a serious shadow stole into his eyes.

"I can tell you, Sybil, it came very near being nothing more than a dream to me. Three times have had more hair-breadth 'scapes than you know of, little sister. But not tell you, did I, of that skirmish along the Potomac where I seemed to see face with death, an ugly death, too, at the point of rebel bayonets, when some brave fellow charged down on me and saved my life with his sword right hand."

"Who was it, Laurence?" said old Silas, with trembling lip and dilated eyes. "I would give my best wheat field for a chance to grasp that right hand!"

"I don't know—I never came across him again. Probably he was in some other regiment. All I know is that he had curly black hair and a scar over his forehead, shaped exactly like a Moorish crescent."

Such a straight nose, and a heavy black mustache!" interrupted his sister.

"Exactly."

"Father," said Sybil, turning with sparkling eyes and crimson cheek to where Silas Miller sat, "the wandering soldier whom you turned from your door this night was the man who saved our Laurence's life."

Silas rose up from his chair and took an uneasy turn across the room and back, his iron features working strangely.

"I can't be helped now. He said, in a tremulous voice; "but it's the last soldier I'll ever send with empty hands from this door. The man who saved our Laurence's life! Oh, Sybil! if I had only listened to your counsel!"

But she never spoke of the little lucky-piece of gold. Such a trifle might seem like ostentation, this shy, fastidious little wild-flower of the forest.

"My Sybil going to be married among the fine folks down in Boston! Well, I s'pose I might have expected it, and yet it does seem kind o' hard," soliloquized Silas Miller, one cloudless autumn night in her white evening dress, with scarlet geraniums lighting up her brown hair and glowing on her bosom. No wonder Captain Lindsay's face brightened with grave, quiet pride as he looked down on his fair betrothed.

"Sir, she is worthy dearest, in this quiet little music-room," he said, with earnest authority. "I can't share your sweet eyes and sweeter words with all the world, and say loudly that you are all to myself for a while."

She looked up with a blushing smile, then down again.

"Well?" he asked, as if she had spoken.

"I was wondering, Allen—that scar on your forehead!"

"What of it?"

"Why, it is such a singular shape—almost a half circle. I never saw but one like it before."

"Did not you?" And where was that?"

"In a picture-book, crossed our gaze once with just such a scar on his forehead, and—"

She paused, for Allen Leslie had quietly taken from some inner receptacle in his coat a tiny piece of gold with a narrow blue ribbon passed through it. He held it smilingly up.

"Do you know where was this to me?"

"Gave it to you, Allen?"

"Yes, in one of those weary wanderer, who had missed his way among your tangled roads. You fancied me a beggar—it was not so. I had money, broken pieces; yet I stood sorely in need of a kind word just then, for my brain was threbbing, my limbs weary, my wounds scarce healed. That foot-march cost me a weary fever. Yet I do not regret it; for—"

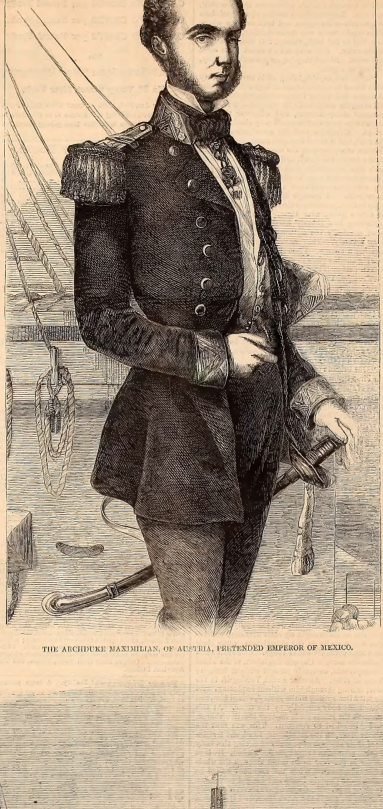
He took her hand tenderly into his, and added, "For although I might have known, from my Sybil was beautiful, yet had it not been for that blue-ribbone piece of gold I never should have known how good and true she was."

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—BOMBARDMENT OF FORT MOULTRIE BY THE IRON-CLADS, SEPTEMBER 8, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 621.]

THE ARCHDUKE MAXIMILIAN, OF AUSTRIA.

We publish herewith a portrait of the ARCHDUKE MAXIMILIAN, OF AUSTRIA, who has been named by the French officers in Mexico Emperor of that country. The Archduke is a man of middle age, and a sailor by trade. He enjoys a fair reputation in his own country, and has been well spoken of by foreigners who have known him. Some years ago he married the daughter of King Leopold of Belgium, one of the most sensible and upright of sovereigns. Whether or no he will fall into the trap laid for him by the Emperor of the French remains to be seen. The first intelligence was that he would unhesitatingly accept. But since then his views appear to have undergone some modification, possibly under good advice from his father-in-law. Mr. Motley's excellent opinions, expressed to Count Rechberg, may not have been without their weight upon the mind of the Archduke.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.



We continue in this number our illustrations of the siege of Charleston, from sketches by our correspondent, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. On page 609 we give a picture of the CHARGE OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT ON REBEL RIFLE-PITS.

Mr. Davis writes: "A sand-hill had been taken advantage of by the rebels as a cover for a number of sharp-shooters, who constantly annoyed our sappers with their pinging Minié's. This was not to be overlooked for a moment, and the rebels left the place not to return."

The New York Times correspondent says:

One of the most brilliant events that has been witnessed on the island since the inauguration of the siege movements, occurred last Wednesday night—an event in which the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts regiment bore a worthy and conspicuous part, and which resulted most advantageously for the Union side. Prior to the event of Wednesday night, four parallels, with the usually accompanying approaches, had been built. Beyond the fourth parallel a rifle-pit had been commenced which was being extended toward Wagner as fast as the circumstances would allow. At night our pickets were thrown out fifty yards to the front, which brought them to within about fifty yards of the rebel pickets. Between the opposing pickets was a ridge of sand which it was very essential we should occupy in order to facilitate engineering movements. The rebels also understood the importance of the position, and every night had vast two or three regiments to hold it. As will be seen, however, they were behind time on this occasion, and so lost the ground. The Twenty-fourth Massachusetts, Colonel F. A. Osborne, was on duty in the trenches at the time. Just before dark, in accordance with orders issued, the batteries on the right, that is, in the parallels, commanded by Captains Jno. J. Comstock, Charles G. Strahn, Albert Green, and Lieutenants George Green, of the Third Rhode Island Artillery, also, Captain Skinner, of the Seventh Connecticut, who commands a battery of mortars, were opened simultaneously on Wagner and the rifle-pits between the fort and the ridge and on the ridge itself. After fifteen minutes of deafening cannonading, our guns having been replied to by the enemy from Wagner, Gregg, and Simpkins, the firing on our side was directed particularly to points beyond the ridge, and the Twenty-fourth, who were near at hand, was ordered to dash forward and seize that ground. In a moment the men leaped over the parallels, and in another moment were pouring up the ridge. One company of the Sixty-first North Carolina were in the rifle-pits, but before they knew their own enemy were surrounded and taken prisoners. Our men then placed themselves in a state of defense by throwing up an earth-work which had increased before morning to the dimensions of a parallel, making a number of five in the series. It can not be said the company of North Carolinians fought obstinately in the defense of the ridge, for they, in the first place, were too few in numbers, and in the second place, were too quickly surrounded. What our men had most to fear was the canister and grape from Wagner. The range was short—only 150 yards, and it required a lively handling of spades to put up a protection. From the time the guns were opened to the moment the Twenty-fourth were on the summit of the ridge, thirty minutes had elapsed.

THE ARCHDUKE MAXIMILIAN, OF AUSTRIA, PRETENDED EMPEROR OF MEXICO.

The regiment lost two killed, eight wounded, and one missing. The rebel loss was four killed, eight wounded, and sixty-eight prisoners, including two lieutenants. In fact, the entire rebel company, with the exception of the Captain and two or three privates, were either killed, wounded, or captured.

We gained a portion of ground, the possession of which enabled the engineers to go on with the operations toward Wagner. We now have the fifth parallel and a sap extending therefrom, the head of which is but one hundred yards from the rebel fort. Numerous rifle-pits of the enemy, which were filled with sharp-shooters, have been traveled, and he has been forced to contract his boundary limits. In a word, we have manifestly added to the chances of a speedy capture of Wagner.

On pages 612 and 613 we illustrate

FORT WAGNER.

Mr. Davis writes:

"MORRIS ISLAND, September 8.

"The fact that our approaches had reached the ditch of Wagner had scarcely time to be known when it was noised about that we were to storm the place the coming dawn. Ere this could be done the wily foe had left us the possessors of Morris Island.

"That spades are again trumps seems unquestioned; and it may not be out of place to mention the fact that all engaged in the work of the reduction of the rebel works performed their respective duties admirably.

"Who was the very first to enter Wagner is a much-mooted question. Certain it is, however, that Sergeant Vermillion and five men of the Thirty-ninth Illinois regiment were in the fort as soon as any one. Almost simultaneous with their entrance was that of Captains Walker and Pratt, of the Engineers, and Lieutenant Michie, of General Gillmore's staff.

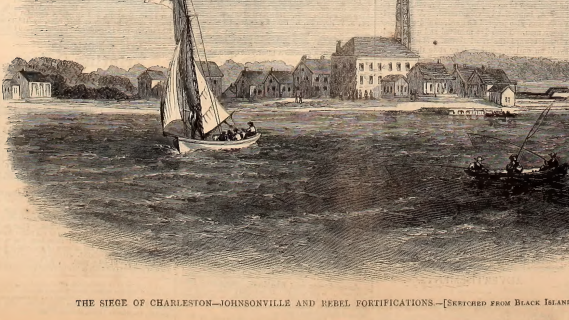
"My sketches give views of the fort—one showing the dismantled condition as well as the natural strength of the work; the other the scene of the charge made on the 18th of July, our men having got into this portion of the work at that time. In the fore-ground of this sketch is shown an incident of hourly occurrence.

"The attack upon Gregg, though well planned, was discovered, and proved unsuccessful.

"After having sketched Fort Wagner I started for Battery Gregg, and had nearly reached that place, after a most unpleasant tramp under a constant fire, when old Sol sent an unusually hot beam, and the next known I found myself much nearer Wagner than Gregg, and a copious drenching of the salt-water of the ocean going on. Asking where I was hit, I was told 'twas sun-stroke; and a remark shortly afterward made by one of our brave defenders, that 'the artist man was hungry,' suggested to my mind that a speedy leave-taking of my soldier friends might be advisable. This is the reason why no sketch of Battery Gregg is presented with this package of sketches.

"The picture of

THE IRON-CLADS ENGAGING THE WORKS UPON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND,



sketched from the beach of Morris Island, gives, I think, the most comprehensive view of the scene.

"How reckless men become after a period of constant exposure to shell fire can be seen by the entire indifference exhibited by the soldiers upon the beach, who take their usual tramps under the constantly-bursting shells with a nonchalance almost wonderful."

On this page we give

FORT JOHNSON AND JOHNSONVILLE, SKETCHED FROM BLACK ISLAND.

Mr. Davis writes: "During a little jaunt with Colonel Serrell, a few days since, being in quest of sketches, I found the scenes that I send to you—the Colonel's very excellent glass rendering it practicable to sketch many places that must certainly have gone unpictured had one been forced to rely upon unaided eyesight.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—JOHNSONVILLE AND REBEL FORTIFICATIONS.—[SKETCHED FROM BLACK ISLAND BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

"This view of Fort Johnson and its surroundings is not only interesting but picturesque, and since it is known that the rebels rely almost entirely for the defense of Charleston upon sand-works of this kind, these views assume an interest that they have been hitherto devoid of."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We devote two pages this week to an illustration of the Army of the Potomac, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. On pages 616 and 617 we give

THE EXECUTION OF DESERTERS.

Mr. Waud writes: "The crime of desertion has been one of the greatest drawbacks to our army. If the men who have deserted their flag had been present on more than one occasion defeat would have been victory, and victory the destruction of the enemy. It may be therefore fairly asserted that desertion is the greatest crime of the soldier, and no punishment too severe for the offense. But the dislike to kill in cold blood—a Northern characteristic—the undue exercise of executive clemency, and in fact the very regulations themselves, as at present framed for the defense, has prevented the proper punishment being applied. That is past; now the very necessity of the case will call upon the severest penalties to be rigorously exacted. The picture represents the men who were sentenced to death in the Fifth Corps for desertion at the moment of their execution. Some of these had enlisted, pocketed the bounty, and deserted again and again. The remembrance of death being so seldom enforced they considered it a safe game. They all suffered terribly mentally, and as they marched to the spot seemed like they staggered in their total agony like a drunken man. Through the corps, ranged in hushed masses on the hill-side, the procession moved to a funeral march, the orchestra walking each behind his own coffin. On reaching the grave they were, as usual, seated on their coffins: the prisoner made short prayer; their eyes were bandaged; and with a precision worthy of praise for its humanity, the orders were given and the volleys of death launched them into eternity. They died instantly, although one sat up nearly a minute after being shot and I have no doubt that their death has had a very salutary influence on discipline."

WIND-MUSIC AND THE CHILD.

A TUNE that keeps no earthly time or measure,
Rising and falling at the wind's wild pleasure;
Now quick and high, now slow in languid leisure,

But always very musically sweet,
And always sad. No little childish feet
To its soft cadence dance along the street;

No little childish voice breaks into singing,
By a glad impulse, like a wild bird dinging
An echo to the sound the wind is bringing:

Rather the child, although scarce knowing why,
Hearing this music, pauses slowly by,
And breathes its fear and wonder in a sigh.

THE WAY JOE ALLEN BURIED VANDEGRIFT.

"I PROMISED to tell you something about Allie and Upton's fight with the Adjutant of the First Kentucky. "We did not go into the fights themselves, being for the first time kept in reserve; but after we had finished driving the enemy, and began to move back to the army, our brigade had the honor of covering the rear, when we had some tolerably sharp work.

"You were with us last year when we had that set-to with Stuart at Aldie, and remember the position pretty well. The rebels came up the Snickersville Road in just the same way they attacked last December; but Kilpatrick met them different-ly. Our regiment found outside of the town, and charged into the road by the first wood. The Tenth New York charged, and drove them to the dip of the road where it bends in both directions. Here they were met and forced back. Kilpatrick sent in the Second New York as support. Their Major, instead of leading, gave his orders from the rear, which produced some confusion, and consequently the rebels were getting the better of our men. They say that Kilpatrick was half mad. He had brought on the fight, and now if his men failed him he was done. Just then Colonel Gamble with his First Maine came up in perfect order. Kilpatrick rode up to them, and they dashed forward with a style that was irresistible. Right before them they swept the rebels, past the woods and ... hop, and up to the last hill, where the... were some old hay-stacks grouped together. Here the rebels were protecting themselves under their cover, and gave a heavy fire; but it was no use. Eleven horses went down right around his colors, but even that did not check the Maine fellows. Closing in, they broke the enemy's way, and, fighting hand to hand, forced them down the steep into the hollow beyond. It was terribly close work. Kilpatrick himself was, they say, once unhorsed and a prisoner, but was cut out before he could be fairly taken. That fine old soldier Colonel Doughty got in to deep. The rebels ordered him to yield, but he refused. If he had had his own horse, which was so perfectly trained that he could do any thing, the old man would have succeeded in keeping a clear place around him, and would have cut his way through; but the animal on which he was mounted was inferior in strength and activity to the emergency. The rebels pressed in upon him, and the horse fell and rose, fighting to get them down. There was no holding the Maine boys after that. The rebels were driven well down the hill, our artillery got into position and raked them fearfully, and for a mile or two it was a perfect rout.

"The rebels ran across into the Middlebury Road, which, through Dulle's misfortune that morning, was free. Reinforcements coming up enabled them to get into order again, and held us for a while. Once again there was fierce fighting, and again they had to fall back, though this time in a little better order. Still each attack shook them more and more. At last they began retreating rapidly, leaving us a gun.

"After two days' fighting, all in our favor, they were forced to make a stand at Upperville, in order to secure their line of retreat through Ashby's Gap. All along the stone-wall fence they had their dismounted sharp-shooters, and wherever they deployed they protected themselves by similar breastworks. Kilpatrick took the same precaution on the road, and it saved him from some trouble. His column, charging past the sharp-shooters, caught them in a heavy fire that it had to fall back, and Stuart's men charged in their turn. Then our carbineers let them have it with terrible effect, wheeling out their guns by fours. Over the stone-walls and through the inclosures our men went at them, sometimes throwing down the fences, at others going over them. Every inch was something like Brandy Station, though we had been decidedly the aggressors. The rebels lost very severely. They never succeeded in fairly meeting a charge. From hill to hill they went, leaving position after position and gun after gun driven pell-mell into the Gap. It was not until they reached the other side, and were covered by their infantry and artillery, that they were able to make a stand.

"Kilpatrick's brigade had the work that day all to itself; and they did it in splendid style as well as the reserve had nothing to do but to follow up. The next morning Pleasanton, having found out all he wanted to find out until we had a new start, gave orders to fall back to our position, covering the march of the army.

"I ought to have said the rear of the column; the First Pennsylvania and First New Jersey, with some of the Third Pennsylvania, being deployed as skirmishers. It was while thus engaged that we were actually retiring they came swarming out of the Gap. They had received such a lesson, however, that it was not until dark, and after much through Upperville that they attempted to close. Here they came on with a howling fierceness behind a hill, and charged. It was a very distinguished fellow. They rode in toward our skirmishers, and I, fully determined to bring him down, but Lucas opened such a scathing fire upon them that they reeled back in dismay.

"Among our losses that day Private Vandegrift, of Company D, particularly distinguished himself. All our men were cool and daring, keeping their positions steadily, but he fought with marked judgment, never throwing away his fire, and always the nearest man to the enemy. Close to his side fought Joseph Riggleberger, of Company A, reckless, warm-hearted, light-headed boy. I do not know that they fought really better than others, but they struck me more, and in the subsequent events impressed their names on my memory. Curiously enough, the storm of bullets fired by the rebels did not injure either of the two. Their skirmishers were nervous and fired wild, while the aim of our men was unusually fatal. At last the rebels charged, and Vandegrift and Riggleberg firing shells at our skirmishers, while their men kept carefully out of range. One shell burst under the feet of Captain Riggleberf, of the Third Pennsylvania, curiously enough without harming any one but his horse, which was killed under him. A mile, tearing through him without exploding. As he fell Allen sprung to the ground, seized him, and raised his body against the fence. At this moment the rebels made another abortive charge, and Allen had to remount. This was near the Snicker Mills, on the Middlebury Road, and terminated their attempt at pursuit. Leaving this body behind seemed to weigh upon Joe's mind. He kept as far in the rear as he could, and rode back after-movement. When the regiment halted he came up to Captain Lucas and begged permission to bring it in. The Captain refused, as the body did not lie inside the rebel lines, and if he could find any men to accompany him. Craven, of Company A, immediately volunteered, and Sergeant Nania man also pressed forward, as did two other Jersey men. These five mounted and quietly advanced toward the rebel forces, Managing to avoid an outlying picket, they stole through the enemy's skirmishers, and rode up in the spot where lay Vandegrift's body, partially hidden by the fence. There, within one hundred yards, stretched the enemy's skirmishers, and the conversation intervening between them and the body. 'No matter,' said one man to each other; 'it lies without the lines, and we can't be expected to respect orders.' So suddenly they rode out of the woods and spread themselves before the body. As they did so, the skirmishers opened upon them a heavy fire. The movement so paralyzed the rebels that they were unable to fire until after he had done this. Then, as he anticipated, they delivered a hasty and ineffectual fire. Without returning it our men wheeled and dashed back into cover with the burden for which they had risked so much. Half sadly, half triumphantly, they bore it back to their camp and gave it such a decent grave as a soldier's satisfaction that their comrade obtained a proper resting-place from their hands, instead of being tumbled into a ditch, by the enemy, or left unburied, a prey to unclean beasts and the foul birds of prey."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"THE PRINTER'S DEVIL," a handsome, illustrated, literary, and humorous paper, for boys, will be issued on the first of each month, free of postage, for twenty-five cents. Address "Printer's Devil," 119 Fulton St, N. Y. Sold by newsboys.

TEAS.

Only TWO CENTS per Pound Profit.
Only TWO CENTS per Pound Profit.
Only TWO CENTS per Pound Profit.

The Great American Tea Company,
No. 51 Vesey Street, New York, are selling ALL their TEAS at ONLY TWO CENTS per POUND PROFIT, believing this feature to be attractive to the many who have heretofore been paying ENORMOUS PROFITS.

Standard Military Books.

Roemer's History and Uses of Cavalry, 8vo..... $5 00
Gibbon's Artillerist's Manual, 8vo, new edition..... 6 00
Robert' Handbook of Artillery, 12mo..... 1 00
Casey Artillery Tactics, 3 volumes..... 2 00
Casey's Infantry Tactics, 3 volumes..... 2 00
Military Art and History, by BARBE DU PARQ, 8vo..... 1 00
Scott's Military Dictionary, octavo..... 5 00
Benet's Military Law and Courts-Martial, 8vo..... 1 00
Army Officers' Pocket Companion, 18mo..... 1 00
Manual for Engineer Troops, 12mo..... 1 00
Cullum's Military Bridges, 8vo..... 2 00
Instructions for Field Artillery, 18mo..... 1 00
Together with a full assortment of French, English, and American Military and Civil Engineering works.
Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
No. 192 Broadway, New York.

S. M. WARD, Co. E 48th N.Y.Vols.

C. E. PACE Co. I 29 N.J.Vol.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

One Agent wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, with a Circular containing full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or a Fine Gilt Watch Guard, or Gentleman's Cuff, or Engraved Spring Locket, or a Seal Stone, Cut, Ferrule Diamond, or Chessel Ring, or a Gent's Gold Scarf-pin, Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Shield, or other Army Corps Pin, with your Name, Co., and Reg., handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, and for 50 cents, I will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.
Address, R. F. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4976. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

LACE CURTAINS,
Nottingham Curtains,
Brussels Curtains,
Rep Curtains,
Terry Curtains,
Satin Delaine Curtains,
Wholesale and retail,
at
KEITH'S, 359 Broadway.

SAVAGE & CO.'S No Chimney Burner burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Office 302 Fulton Street, N. Y. Agents wanted. Send for circular. Sample sent by mail, pre-paid, for 50 cents.

Fountain's INDIAN AND AMERICAN INDIAN SOUPS, 25c. Indian Curiosities, Wonderful Tobacconist and Portrait Store, 89 Nassau, is filled with scarce, useful, and novel goods from China, Japan, Cuba, Mexico, and the American Indians, which are not to be found elsewhere; wholesale and retail. Catalogues sent per mail. Visitors are welcome to examine our extensive stock without purchasing. Unique Fans from India, France, and the American Indians.

Fancy Pigeons and Poultry. A large private stock for sale. Satisfaction guaranteed, as the owner is going to Europe. Box 2600, P. O., Boston.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—No simple capital required. Business new, light, honorable; adapted to any part com; demand staple as flour. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address C. MUNRO, 21 DOWN ST. (Box 3,386), NEW YORK.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR $1
PORTABLE COPYING PRESS.
Is acknowledged by all who have used it, to be in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents. VAN ANDEN & CO., 80 NASSAU ST., Box 31, N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 8 ct. stamp for circular.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Colonel of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 50 emanciel cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars and Flags for Aces. Any one can play all the usual games. Two backs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. Address CHARLES MAGNUS, 12 Frankfort St., New York. Agents AMERICAN CARD COMPANY, 455 BROADWAY, CORNER OF MERCER STREET, N. Y.

LACE CURTAINS,
Nottingham Curtains,
at KEITH'S,
No. 359 Broadway.

WANTED—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can best get a pension by employing CLAGGETT & CO., of Box No. 46, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 28x36. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

FOWLER'S ARDENT MAGNOLIA should be used by all business men. A perfect substitute for ink that the thing cannot. Will be found very useful in taking account of stock, &c., for all tallying purposes. Price $5 00. Stats and County rights for sale. Descriptive circular sent on receipt of stamp. Address FOWLER & CO., 61 Park Row, Room 21, N. Y., or Box 2513, Chicago, Ills.

Accordeons and Flutinas.—Best quality, Rosewood, 8 keys, 2 bands, 20 reeds, $5; 11 keys, $6; 13 keys (double), $8; 10½ key (double), $7. 20 key, Flutina, $8 to $12. Sent by express to any part country. Musical Instruments repaired.
FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S
SPORTSMEN'S DEPOT
OF NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market! They are the sole complete in this country for celebrated

Magic Time Observers.

The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Fusee Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and reliable for best and cheapest timepiece and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering it entirely independent of the cause of this Watch. They are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action levor escapement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, generally speaking, per case of half dozen, $200. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the package is 16 cents; registering, 20 cents. Address

Railway Timekeepers,

With Heavy Sterling Silver Cases,
Especially adapted for Army Sales.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has heavy solid sterling silver cases, handsomely white engraved, the hardened gold hands, with superior regulated movements, warranted for one and two years, and equal to any case of half dozen, $60: by mail, $1 05 for postage. At register, add 20 cents additional. A sale discount to parties purchased. Sold only by the case.

The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER is also furnished in handsome silver plated cases, and in all other respects the same as the silver ones, while its appearance they are fully equal. Price $48 per case of six. Postage, $1 05. Registering, 20 cents. Sold only by the case.

Our importations are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy with elegance, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other sources.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. The accompanying are emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers. — Portland Letter, Me.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered." — N. Y. Tribune and Evening Mail.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance." — Evening and Mail.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men." — N. Y. Evening Mail and Express.

"Elaborately and artistically finished." — N. Y. Scottish American, July 30.

"Combine accuracy as timekeepers." — Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very perfect reliable watches for the army."— N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ, Aug. 29.)

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."— Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

HUBBARD BRO'S WATCHES are unique. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail, it is at our risk. If goods is at our risk! Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, New York.

MALE AND FEMALE AGENTS AND SALESMEN wanted to canvass everywhere—for most useful, and wonderful inventions, in which they can make from $100 to $500 per month. On sending $5 we will forward by express a case of samples which will sell for three times the sum. Send stamp for circular. GOODWIN & CO., 329 Broadway, offices 11 and 12.

Attention, Officers!—Being desirous of collecting material for a History of the Rebellion, I will send a company of the different regiments be correctly represented, to with a commissioned officer or the orderly of each Colonel us their address for free circular, or 25 cts. and receive copy of "SOLDIER'S COMPANION," with instructions. M. E. COLE & CO., 141 Main St., Cincinnati, O. P.O. Box 1063

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above rate represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to the dress

I. A. MILLER
C.B.
5TH N.Y.V.

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, Providence, New York.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by the Union Army, forwarded free of charge on half rates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Portable
Printing Offices.

For the use of the Army and Navy, Merchants, Druggists, and Business Men generally. These Printing Offices are now extensively and profitably used throughout the States and Canada, and are highly recommended by those who have given them a trial. The printing press is simple and durable, and the printing material is of the best manufacture. Full instructions for use accompany each office.

Press No. 1, 8x 4 in. $10 03—Complete Outfit, $20 00
Press No. 2, 8x 6 in. 16 00—Complete Outfit, 30 00
Press No. 3, 9x11 in., 30 00—Complete Outfit, 60 00
Press No. 4, 12x18 in., 60 00—Complete Outfit, 120 00
Press No. 5, 13x19 in., 90 00—Complete Outfit, 180 00

Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cards, &c., cheap.

Adams Press Co., 24 Park Row, N.Y.
AND ALSO FOR SALE BY
CHASE & LEAVITT, 25 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

PHYSIOGNOMY,

OR SIGNS OF CHARACTER, and "How to Read Them." Physiology, the functions of the body; Phrenology, the organs of the brain; Ethnology, the races of man; and Psychology, the science of the soul, are given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Vol. 39 commenced with the July number. Specimen number, 20 cents, by first post. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Five quires (120 sheets) nice commercial note paper for 25 cents. Envelopes, for a sample, 10 cents. Five thousand envelopes, 50 cents. 100 buff do., 40 cents. All the above articles sent by mail, postage paid. KNOW & HAY-GOOD, Faithdeer Office, Boston, Mass.

J. H. Winslow & Co., 100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	3 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 "	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Jet and Gold Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
1000 Coral, Ena., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 00 to 3 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 4 00 each.
2000 Sets of Room Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gold Lockets	3 00 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
4000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
8000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mtd Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

Agents to whom setting an Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will allow 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
99 Broadway, New York.

J. W. EVERETT & CO., METROPOLITAN PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will attend to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUISITE, at the LOWEST PRICES: Photographs, Albums, Leather Fancies, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Corps Badges, or any other articles procurable in the City.

We will forward, on receipt of 20 cents stuff, Photographs of GENERAL MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GEN. THOMAS, BURNSIDE, SIGEL, BANKS, SHERMAN, HALLECK, SLOCUM, HOOKER, AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE, FOOTE, FARRAGUT, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PA TENT DOMINOES—The excellent article, being neat, durable, and perfect substitute for the ivory. Ivory Jokes, will receive the highest award of the Camp and Parlor, at the Hospital. Single sets, 25 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

Volunteers, Read this.—For the derangement of the system, change of Diet, Wounds, Sores, Diseases and Eruptions, to which every Volunteer is liable, there are no remedies so safe, convenient, and sure as HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT, thoroughly tested in the Crimea and Indian Campaigns. Only 25 cents per box or pot.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expense paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Universal Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

$2 positively made from 20 Cents.—Something magnificently useful by every person. Sent free by mail for 20 cents that retails for $2. Sy KIL. WALCUTT, 191 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Soldiers' COMPANY PINS.

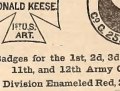
Constantly on hand and Engraved to order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1. Solid Silver, $1.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $3 50 each.
Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD relief, $1 50.

The above are fac-simile cuts, handsomely engraved with name and regiment—with the letter representing the Co. in BOLD RELIEF.

Corps Badges
Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.



Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Prices of Corps Badges.

1st Division, either Corps, Sterling Silver, enameled Red,		$1 50
1st	" " 16 karat Gold	" 3 00
2d	" " Sterling Silver	" 3 00
2d	" " 16 karat Gold	" 4 00
3d	" " Sterling Silver, enameled blue	1 50
3d	" " 16 karat Gold	" 4 00

Terms Cash in advance.
Send for a Catalogue.
Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,
208 Broadway, N. Y.

THE STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLE.—Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1858. The best and only reliable billiard table manufactured. Balls, Cues, and every article relating to Billiards, for sale by PHELAN & COLLENDER, corner of Crosby and Spring Streets, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, SOLDIERS, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested, as a FAVOR, to send us their address, and we will send in return, FREE, information for which they will receive $5 per day. We offer no humbug. We pay from $6 to $15 per day ABOVE EXPENSES. We want addresses from every locality in the U. S. and from every REGIMENT in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Box 2131, N. Y.

Deafness.—Sound Magnifying Tubes. Can be concealed, and enables deaf persons to hear at public assemblies. Send for a description to
E. HASLAM, 23 John St., New York.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS AND PRINTERS.

The subscribers manufacture TYPE REVOLVING Double and Single Cylinder Machines, Hot and Cold Pressure.

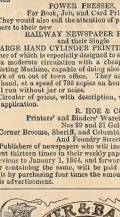
POWER PRESSES,

For Book, Job, and Card Printing.

They would also call the attention of publishers of newspapers to their new

RAILWAY NEWSPAPER PRESS

and their Single



LARGE HAND CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE,

either of which is especially designed to supply newspapers of a moderate circulation with a cheap and serviceable Printing Machine, capable of doing also the ordinary job-work of an out of town office. They are designed to run by hand, at a speed of 700 copies an hour, and at this rate will run without jar or noise.

Circular of prices, with description, will be forwarded on application.

R. HOE & CO.,
Printers' and Blocks' Wholesale,
Nos 29 and 31 Gold Street,
Corner Bronne, Sheriff, and Colombia Sts., New York,
And Foundry Street, Boston, Mass.

Publishers of newspapers who will insert this advertisement thirteen times in their weekly papers, with this notice, printed in Nonpareil Type, and forward us a copy of paper containing the same, will be paid in printing materials by purchasing four times the amount of their bill for this advertisement.

495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Grover & Baker Machines have taken the First Premium at the late State Fairs held in

NEW YORK,	MAINE,	KENTUCKY,
NEW JERSEY,	MICHIGAN,	TENNESSEE,
PENNSYLVANIA,	IOWA,	MISSOURI,
OHIO,	MISSOURI,	SOUTH CAROLINA,
INDIANA,	ALABAMA,	CALIFORNIA.

$15 Per Day Easy $15 And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, successful, and saleable extra large size PARIS STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTIONS PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Gentlemen's Etiquette, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Prescriptions, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Guides for 1863, YANKEE Notions of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Designs, Games, Army Articles, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages are sent over, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our NEW CIRCULARS, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

MEEKS' CABINET
FURNITURE
WAREROOMS,
No. 699 BROADWAY,
AND
333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established several years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Grononi will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, free of U. S. taxes, on receipt of order.
R. G. GHAHAM, No. 189 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Broker's Sale

Of rich and valuable goods, comprising a great variety of unredeemed pledges, valued from 76 cents to $300, for sale at One Dollar each, to be delivered in rotation as received at the office. For list of goods send 3 cents postage for circular. Address ANDREWS & CO., Brokers, No. 103 Bullroy Street, Boston, Mass.

Something New.

Patent Fountain Marking Brush and Pencil, for marking Boxes, Packages, &c. 1000 Agents guaranteed 75 Dollars per month. Send stamp for circular, or One Dollar for sample, free by mail. L. F. CLARK & CO., Manufacturers, Box 28, Northampton, Mass.

WEDDING CARDS

These Celebrated Engraved Cards sold only at J. EVERDELL'S 18TH Established 1841. 127 Fulton Street, New York.
☞ For Specimens by Mail, send two stamps.

BOOK AGENTS' HEAD-QUARTERS.—The ARMIES THEMSELVES. Our work experienced agents in all parts of the country for the latest, largest, and best-selling HISTORY OF THE REBELLION, and other popular Books. Apply to or address J. B. STODDARD, Auburn, N. Y.

Printing Office for $12.
Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and most durable Portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Also, Cards, Circulars, and others, engraving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Circulars, Checkers, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses, $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $24, 35, 42, and $45. Send for a circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Bonds, CORDAGE, and YARNS, Steam Packing, Wicks, CARPET Chain, Cotton Warp, Hemp Lines, Blocking Twine, Card and Sharpening Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

National Union League.

Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,
208 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power, in the Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general use. Equal to any double sea-glass and made on the most approved principles. Sent on receipt of price. Send for circular, containing names of numerous testimonials, which improve the sight, without straining needs of frame. Glasses sent by exclusive agency.

SEMMONS, Oculists-Optician,
681 Broadway, New York.

Mt. Kisco Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 8th, 1863. For circulars address A. B. WIGGIN, A.M., Mount Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

A LONZO PLACE, A.M., Principal of Hudson River Institute, Claverack, Columbia County, N. Y., offers 14 weeks board and tuition for $37. Term opens Sept. 9th. (Both sexes). 17 Instructors, who board in the Institution with the pupils. Write for catalogues.

The Cheapest Magazine Extant!
THE GEM, PEARL!
No. 1, for October, now ready.
Price 10 cents. Send for 3 cents.

This charming and new monthly contains 24 quarto pages of the choicest of American Productions, adapted to the "home circle." The Pearl is unrivaled in neither merit or price. Terms, $1 per annum. Send for it.
Address, WM. PERRY & CO.,
Lewes, Delaware.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envy extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By JOSEPH KAY, Esq., M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

LIVE IT DOWN. "A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. JEAFFRESON, Author of "Open Sesame! Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For October, 1863.

CONTENTS:

THE FIRST CRUISE OF THE "MONITOR" PASSAIC.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Parade at Sea.—The Ship's on Fire.—In Tow.—Montauk's coming to.—Under Engine.—The Leak.—Bailing all Night.—Men Exhausted.—Off Hatteras.—Inhabitants of Beaufort.—Coming round Frying-Pan Shoals.—Light-Ship off Fort-Royal Harbor.—In a Fog. Head on to Sea.—Off Charleston.—Ironsides.—Arrival at the Light.—Lost in a Swamp.—The cool Gunner.—Workmen at Fort Royal.—Step of Charleston Harbor.—Work-Ship at Port Royal.

ABIDE IN FAITH.

SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.—IV. THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Interior of Fort Niagara.—Map of Niagara Frontier.—Sergeant Van Rensselaer.—John Ross Wood.—Entrance to Fort Niagara.—William H. Merritt.—Battle-Ground at Stony Creek.—Old German Church, Bishopp's Mountain.

THE PIERY COLLIERY OF PIENNES.

THE ARMY CORRESPONDENT.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.

CHAPTER LXVII. The Combat.
CHAPTER LXVI. Vis Vitæ.
CHAPTER LXIX. "So, the Conquering Hero comes."

ILLUSTRATIONS.—At the Office.—"And you went in at him on the Station?"

ROMOLA. By the Author of "ADAM BEDE." (Concluded.)

CHAPTER LXVIII. Romola's Waking.
CHAPTER LXIX. Homeward.
CHAPTER LXX. Meeting again.
CHAPTER LXXI. The Confession.
CHAPTER LXXII. The last Silence.

EDITOR'S UNDRAWER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Pantheon.—At the Well.

ANTI-HEROBOLISM.

THE LITTLE HEIRESS.

EDITOR'S CHAIR.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF THE NEGRO SLAVE. (Second Paper.)

AGATHA AND THE EXILE.

THE BATTLE OF HERRINGTON.

AROOSTOOK AND THE MADAWASKA.

TABLEAUX VIVANS.

ALICE IN HAVEN.—IN MEMORIAM.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Promenade Costume.—Boy's Dress.—Velvet Cloak.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30.

The Postage on HARPER'S WEEKLY is 26 cents per year for Quarterly in advance, at the office of delivery. Two cents per time for outside Advertisements.

Single Numbers of Harper's Weekly can be had of all Newsmen.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

PRESENTATION TO JEFF DAVIS.

DIXAR. "Hi! Massa! De SWAMP ANGEL send his compelmunts wid dis here fine punkin, smokin' hot, and hope to visit you hisself in Richmond, by 'm by!"

MASON & HAMLIN'S CABINET ORGANS, now in twelve style each, price $70 to $600 each. A visit improvement on everything of the Melodeon or Harmonium kind. See written testimony of more than one hundred of the most eminent artists and organists of leading cities to the great excellence of these instruments, and their superiority to all others of their class for private and public use. Also Melodeons, from $40 to $170 each. Illustrated Catalogues sent free. Warerooms Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer St., New York. Address MASON BROTHERS.

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,
AND
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,
No. 38 Wall Street.
Orders received for Five-Twenty Bonds at Par, interest to commence with date of payment.
7-30 Treasury Notes.
U. S. Gold Certificates.
Six per Cent Bonds of 1851.
And all other Government Securities bought, sold, and constantly on hand.
Accounts of Banks, Bankers, and others received on favorable terms.
Special attention given to the Collection of Government Vouchers, Quartermasters' Checks, and matured Certificates of Indebtedness.
FISK & HATCH, 38 Wall Street.

SOLID SILVER, $1.00. ARMY PINS and CORPS BADGES.
[SEE INSIDE PAGE.]
Address
J. G. PACKARD & Co.,
289 Broadway,
SOLID GOLD, $3.50. New York.

10 for One Dollar sent free. Single copies 15 cts. New Cuts de Visites of President Lincoln and each of his Cabinet, Generals Washington, Scott, Halleck, Banks, Grant, Rosecrans, Meade, Burnside, McClellan, Hooker, Butler, Gilmore, Fremont, Reynolds, and Sickles; Admirals Dupont, Foxhugt, Foote, Porter, and other prominent Union Officers. Catalogues of Books, Photographs, and Albums sent on receipt of a red stamp. Send your order to the Original Gift Book Store, 433 Chestnut St., Philad. Established in 1854, by G. G. EVANS.

To all Wanting Farms.
Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil, Good crops of Wheat, Peaches, &c. Live in a town—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—39 acre tracts of from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good Schools and society. Good crops can be seen growing. Hundreds are settling. On account of extreme mildness of climate, it is highly beneficial to pulmonary complaints. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, Esq., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts in an advanced level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

MONEY AND TIMPER SAVED!
BROWN'S NEW Metal Top Lamp Chimney:—does not break by heat; does not get dim; is easily and quickly cleaned without wetting; one chimney can answer almost; never; saves your temper, time, and money. Try it, and you will see no other.
N. L. C. MFG CO., 45 Fulton Street, N. Y.

The American Parlor Or Piece Skate,
Hard Rubber Rollers,
Anti-friction Axics.
Frederick Stevens,
215 Pearl Street, New York.
88 Kilby Street, Boston.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is afflicted with. How many times has a genial—how many friends fewer parted. The subject is a delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists. H. T. HELMBOLD & CO., 21 and 23 Day Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

50,000 Agents Wanted.
For $1, I will send a Solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps Pin, with your Name, Reg., and Co., handsomely engraved upon it, or a fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a California Diamond Ring or Pin; and for 30 cents I will send the New Style Union League Pin, together with my wholesale Circular to Agents. B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

Fish's Patent Lamp Heating APPARATUS.
Every Family should have One.
For descriptive Pamphlet and Price List, address W. D. RUSSELL, Agent, 202 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

COMPOSITE SILVER WATCHES!
FIRST CLASS HUNTING THIRTEEN. FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL and, above all, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, these watches must insure the most experienced judges. As a special being able at present, it can not be recognized by calling or leaving a postal.
In accordance with the seeming spirit of the times, watches are now manufactured from a beautiful silver-like composition, the constituents of the valuable ore, and not only is appearance and durability, the best resemblance of solid sterling silver in existence!
AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In large buying cases, here, to fully organized, whole enamel dials, and fancy set hands, in good running order, by the half dozen, $60 postage, $1 50; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case, to be safely sent by mail.
The sale of these watches in the army is a source of much gratification, as they very readily to, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact. TERMS CASH IN ADVANCE. Money by express or mail, in registered letter at our risk.
HUBBARD BROS., Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, N. Y.

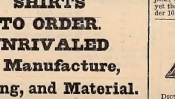
Shults' Ongent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post paid, for 30 cents. Address C. E. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

$40 a Month and Expenses. For particulars address (with stamp) HARRIS BROS., Boston, Mass.

$22 WATCHES. $22
Genuine American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver, heavy Hunting Case, warranted, for $22. Retail price $35.
Genuine Full Jewelled American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver Hunting Case, gold joint, for $35. Also every variety of good watches, at equally low rates. All orders from the army must be prepaid, as the express companies will not take Bills for Collection on delivery.
J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches.
209 Broadway, New York.

Photograph Albums!
SUPERB STYLES, in ARABESQUE and GOLD, at ANY PRICE from $1 00 to $25 00 each. Very Elegant Albums, French Styles, for $2 50 each, sent for $3 00.
Catalogue and Price List sent on receipt of Five Cents.
J. W. LUCAS & CO., 172 Broadway, N. Y.



DR. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy.
Exterminates Catarrh, Root and Branch, forever. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot 613 Broadway.

WATCHES FREE.
Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $10 per day selling our NEW and WONDERFUL LIST OF NOVELTIES AND STAPLE PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNIQUE ALL and unlike all the old styles; containing 40 New Articles, and of the quality Writing Material, Games, Cutlery, Jewelry, Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companies (for the Army), fish gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., together worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friends in the army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety sent to all parts. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW CIRCULAR containing FULL EXTRA inducements. Sent free to any one sending us their name. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

STERLING SILVER HUNTING CASE WATCHES presented to all who sell our Great New Illustrated Prize Packages. Profits 100 per cent. Sells rapid. Agents wanted everywhere. Send for Circulars. W. H. CATTELL & CO., 34 Ann Street, N. Y.

Soldiers, send 10 cts. for Wm. Potter's wonderful discovery, worth $100. Address Box 1943, Philadelphia, Pa.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. AT UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway. Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.
Address
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

STEEL COLLARS AND CUFFS, ENAMELED
LILY WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.
Price $1 each, sent by mail to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 25.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 397 B'way, N.Y.
ALSO
FRENCH FLANNEL OVERSHIRTS,
the largest assortment in New York, $9 75, $8, $8 75 each; all cut on one pattern.
A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be added—43 cents for each Shirt.
Send the size of your neck.
ALSO
ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2 50.
A LARGE STOCK OF
SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS.
ALSO
FINE WHITE SHIRTS
to order, $2, $2 50, and $3.
Send for Price List and Rules for Measurement, to WARD, FRED. LONDOS,
No. 837 Broadway, N. Y.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
There is no Gift, or Present, which surpasses with the Grand Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.
Address, HENRY CRAIG,
202 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

$7. WATCHES. $7.
A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Stealth Movements, perfect time-keeper; sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., 24 & 46 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have contributed two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

RETURNED TO THE CITY.
DR. B. C. THEVY, the Dermatologist, having filled his Boston engagement, can be consulted at his office, 49 Bond Street, New York, for all diseases of the Hair and Scalp, Premature Blanching, Moth, and Freckles, and all Cutaneous Diseases. For full particulars, send stamp for a Circular.

American Enameled
STEEL COLLAR CO.,
C. H. WELLING, 194 Price Street, New York.

Get the Best—Get the Best.
Colorine colors but beautiful brown or black, without wash or preparation. Warranted best and cheapest. Try it, you will use no other. Sold by Druggists. General Depot, 69 John Street, New York.

Barnum's American Museum.
THE GREAT SPECTRAL ILLUSION.

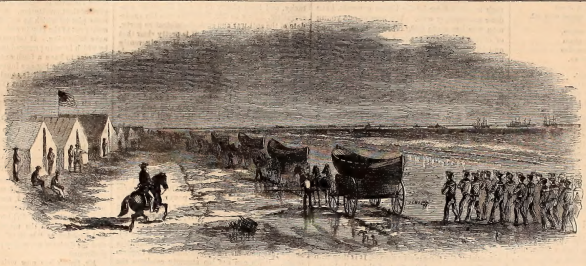
THE GHOST,
EVERY AFTERNOON and EVENING, introduced in an appropriate and thrilling drama.
The Seven and Wonderful Indian Chiefs, Warriors, and Squaws. The Monster Python, Living Sea Serpent, Colossal Trained Fish, &c. &c. all for 25 cents, and yet the price of admission is only 25 cts. Children under 10, 15 cts.

DICTIONARIES IN ENGLAND.—There are at the room of the agent for Webster's Dictionaries, at Mason & Hamlin's, 274 Washington Street, Boston, specimen sheets of six different editions of Webster's Dictionary, published in England, and also specimens of "Webster's Pictorial and American Spelling Book," and "The Illustrated Webster Reader," also from the English press. No person can examine these volumes without realizing how very great a popularity the name of Noah Webster has attained in Great Britain.—Boston Journal, July 23, 1863.

GREAT TRIUMPH.
STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 69 and 84 Walker Street, N. Y., were awarded a first prize medal at the late Great International Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and sixty-nine pianos from all parts of the world selected for competition.
The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

S—T 1860 X.
Drake's Plantation Bitters.
They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.
They stimulate the nervous system and relieve the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Headache, Sickness, and Nervous Morbus.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.
They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak strong, the nervous quiet, and exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are recommended in the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or health, as a delightful invigorator, and the delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, Saloons, and Saloons.
P. H. DRAKE & CO.,
202 Broadway, New York.

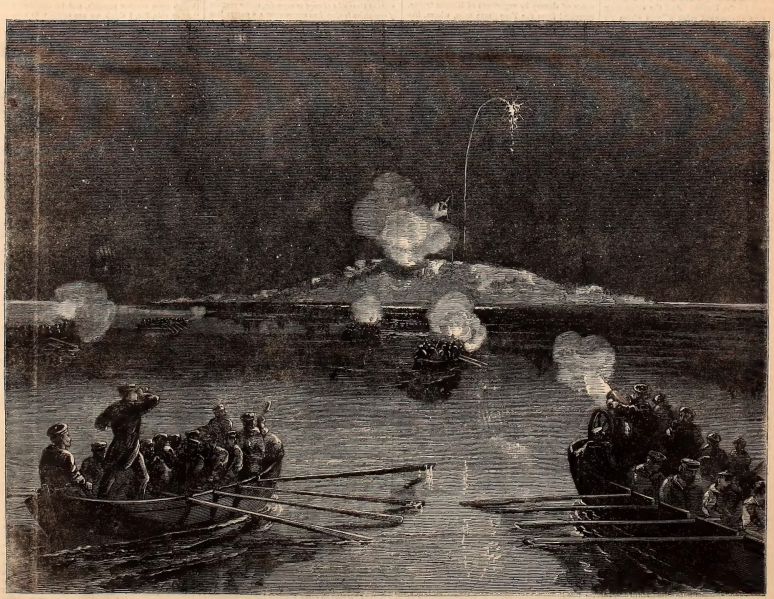
Gold Pens and Cases,
Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Ladies' Size $ 75 Engraving Pen $2 00
Med. " 75 Union " 2 50
Large " 1 00 Mammoth " 3 00
Commercial Pens 1 50 Commercial Extra 2 25
Large Extra " 1 50 Mammoth Extra " 3 00
The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last 30 Pen years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pens in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, before purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact sizes and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.
Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.
E. S. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 18 Maiden Lane,
New York City.



All kinds Sewing Machine Needles
AT J. W. BACHELDER'S,
The only General Needle Depot, 442 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.



VOL. VII.—No. 353.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE BOATS FOR THE ATTACK OF GREGG ON THEIR WAY.

FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 629.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—ATTACK ON BATTERY GREGG, SEPTEMBER 5, 1863.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 629.]

THE GHOSTLY FIGHT.

By the Rappahannock's moonlit water
Thousands are lying in quiet graves
But under its ever-shifting breast
Are two that never shall taste of death.

They stood at night on the river's banks,
Deathly foes in the hostile army,
And challenged each by the moon's wan light
To meet in the stream in mortal fight.

Naked they swam through the water cold,
That slumbered with horror as it rolled;
And the glittering blade never shone more bright
Struck the faces grim that watched beside.

They met where the stream is still and deep,
Where the river-pirate's boat skimp
With fear to and fro, the moon's cold beams,
And the corpse rocking through their dreams.

A cry went up through the shuddering air
As they softly closed in the death-fight there,
And the flashing water shrunk with dread
From the scabbard from that was tinged with red.

Then stillness fell on the air and stream,
While under the waters a spectral gleam
Each with their white forms shining slow
In a knotted clash to the depths below.

And now and ever, night after night,
They close again in a ghostly fight:
Two white wraiths gleam through the throbbing flood,
And the foam around has the hue of blood.

Forever they close in the death-fight grim,
Though their cry is faint and their forms are dim;
And the current knows from the river's breast
Are two that never shall taste of rest.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1863.

WILL THE SOUTH SUBMIT?

OUR foreign friends, unable any longer to make peace in the general assertion that, when them as we may, the rebels will not submit. The cry is re-echoed by the Copperhead organs North; they are satisfied that the more we beat the enemy the stronger will grow his aversion for us and for the Union. And the same song is sung by the captured rebel officers whom we are lodging at Fort Delaware, Johnson's Island, and other places of detention for prisoners of war. They have stopped bellowing about the last ditch. But the last man who is to die is to be before the stars and bars sink into oblivion. They may be beaten, decimated, driven from house and home, but they will never submit.

It would be easy to show that this is the irrevisible talk of angry belligerents. The British were never going to submit to the independence of the colonies; so said the King and a dozen of his ministers. The French were never going to submit to be ruled by a Bourbon again; yet Louis XVIII. was crowned quite quietly, and ate himself to death in peace. Austria was never going to submit to the loss of Lombardy; yet she got on very well now with the regime francese. Hungary never going to submit to the loss of Schastopol; still she bore the event with fortitude when the time came. The "last ditch and last man" talk is almost always indulged in by the leaders of a belligerent army up to a certain point, mainly for the sake of keeping up the spirits of their followers. But it is never carried into practice. The most ardent and the most obstinate combatant will surrender when he can't do any thing else. There are no more obdurate men in the South than George the Third was, and certainly no more bitter pill can well be offered to any one than the one Mr. Lincoln's gudgeon when he received Mr. Adams as United States Minister Plenipotentiary: yet he swallowed it with a grimace.

To careful observers there are not a few indications already, both of the preparations of the South for submission, and of the manner in which they intend to submit. These are especially noticeable along the Mississippi River. When the war broke out the rebels held the river from within twenty miles of Cairo to the mouth, and it is for no pleasure that, with a few isolated exceptions here and there, the inhabitants of the Valley sympathized with the rebel cause. Now that we conquered the Valley, and driven off or scattered the insurgent army. The rebels have resorted to their only remaining resource—guerrilla warfare. But it is obvious at a glance that the victims of this warfare are not the Northern people or the Northern armies, but the few remaining Southern planters and their families. As a guerrilla band, when wherever purposes it may originally be organized, becomes of necessity a mere band of robbers. To live, it must plunder. To plunder safely, it must attack, not military posts or regiments, but isolated houses and defenseless non-combatants. Plunder leads naturally to murder, rape, and arson, and thus the establishment of a system of guerrilla warfare, such as the rebel chiefs have authorized in the Mississippi Valley, simply inflicts upon their own people, in their own country, the most horrible sufferings, without injuring us in the least. What is the result? We have seen within a week a letter from the largest slaveholder in the State of Mississippi, stating that the ravages of the guerrillas are intolerable, and that "if President Lincoln would only recall the decree of emancipation, and annul the Confiscation Act," the people of that region would return to their allegiance en masse. Newspaper correspondents all tell the same story. The country is devastated, the people frantic; only let them have their slaves, they say, and they will become our best friends. It is pretty clear that after a few months or weeks more discipline among the regular rebel troops will say no more about conditions, but will beg for protection.

Further south, in Louisiana, the same result is being reached by a different process. In that State the guerrillas have not gained much headway. But several enterprising Northern men have "squatted" on abandoned plantations, hired negro labor, and, though exposed to repeated attacks from the rebels, and drafts upon their laborers' forces by the Union generals, have done exceedingly well. We hear of one young man who has made $50,000 in a single season; of others who have realized $20,000, $25,000, and $30,000. The soil will yield a hundred fold harvests of cotton or sugar to a squatter as to the owner of the fee. This sort of thing naturally extends itself. There are plenty of Southerners who will become Union men for the sake of a fat plantation, even if the original owner will not. And to us of the North it matters very little who owns the land, so long as he behaves himself loyally.

The best guide, however, to the change of sentiment which is destroyed, and which may be found in Missouri and Kentucky. In those States, though they never actually seceded, the Pro-slavery sentiment was as dominant at the outbreak of the war as in Georgia and Alabama; and the difference between pro-slaveryism and rebellion is only one of degree. In those days an abolitionist was driven out at Richmond or Charleston as in Kentucky or Missouri. Now mark the difference. The Missouri papers are full of appeals for mercy from the remnant of the party which, if the rebels had their arms down now, and the foot of the anti-slavery men presses pretty heavily on their necks. The Union officers of Missouri have generally protected against the bloody vengeance of the opponents of slavery by regiments of Kansas troops, recruited from the Free State men, whom, five days an abolitionist was driven out at Richmond or Charleston as in Kentucky or Missouri. Now mark the difference. The Missouri papers are full of appeals for mercy from the remnant of the party which, if the rebels had their arms down now, and the foot of the anti-slavery men presses pretty heavily on their necks. The Union officers of Missouri have generally protected against the bloody vengeance of the opponents of slavery by regiments of Kansas troops, recruited from the Free State men, whom, five days ago, the rebel chiefs would have murdered in cold blood. In Kentucky it is becoming quite respectable to be an Abolitionist, and the sentiment is rapidly becoming will afraid of their position, and nervous if our generals do not leave troops near them. A leading Kentuckian assured a gentlemen in this city within a few days that, if the Rebellion were imagined they could elect Brumlette by 50,000 majority, they would have run straight-out pro-slavery opinions, and would have succeeded. At the next election in Kentucky slavery will receive its death-blow. We say that this change of sentiment in Missouri and Kentucky supplies the key to the way in which the rebels of the further South will submit; because it is evident at a glance that if you remove slavery, you abolish the only reason for the hostility existing between us and the rebels, and it then becomes more their interest than ours to restore the Union.

We must not delude ourselves about the end of the war. It has not come yet, and we have hard work before us still—reverses as well as victories, long marches, cruel privations, disappointments, and trials of patience. The rebels have still powerful and veteran armies, which must be beaten and scattered before our work can be pronounced complete. But we have made great, glorious progress since the spring, and, however distant the end may be, it is much more certain than it ever was.

THE BRITISH PIRATES

LAIRD'S Anglo-Rebel rams are not going to sea without a struggle. On 8th September last Earl Russell received a despatch from the Government would take the responsibility of detaining them, and would send the case into the courts. Public opinion, it seems, had at last compelled the Government of Lord Palmerston to make a show, at all events, of enforcing their laws.

We must not be too precipitate, however, in assuming that the rams will not get to sea. The latest Anglo-Rebel pirate—the Georgia—was also arrested by the Government and held for trial. She was, however, suffered to escape, and her armament was supplied her by another British vessel, which met her off the coast of France. In this case, the presumption and the evidence as to the destination of the vessel were as strong as they will probably be in the case of the ironclads. The only apparent reason in the trial was perfectly well what the Japan, alias Georgia, was intended for. Yet she escaped—simply because British officials were unanimous in their wish to see our commerce destroyed for the benefit of that of Great Britain.

The fate of the iron-clad rams will depend, not on the existence and extent of their guilt, but on the probable capacity and readiness of this country to punish England if they are permitted to go to sea. If we seem willing and prepared to make England responsible for these rams, they will be detained, with or without evidence. But if the progress of the war appears to foreshadow rebel success, and a probable unwillingness or incapacity on our part to try conclusions with a foreign power, the rams will be released, after going through the form of a trial. It is impossible to read the English papers without discovering that it was the astonishing capture of the Atlanta by the Weehawken, after "seven minutes' fight, three minutes of which she was aground," to which alone we owe the present detention of Laird's ships.

THE LOUNGER.

BORDER STATE POLICY.

THE Copperhead journals try to plume themselves upon Governor Bramlette's election in Kentucky, and have plenty to say of Kentucky conservatism. Now as Mr. Wickliffe was the candidate of the anti-war and anti-administration party, and was hopelessly defeated, it is pretty clear that Kentucky decides for Mr. Wickliffe. How vigorously she wishes the war waged, Governor Bramlette's message shows—a message which has not been very widely circulated in Copperhead circles. It may be cited as an exposition of the present Border State policy.

Upon the great question of the war itself the Governor says: "We will not sanction acts violative of constitutional right. But we will not allow or neglect the use of every necessary means to protect and defend the Constitution against rebel efforts to destroy it, because somebody does not understand or regard its provisions as we do. . . . Because we furnish the means we do not commit ourselves in favor of the mode of applying them. . . . It is our duty to supply the means; the duty of others to apply them. . . . Our objection (to arming negroes) is not to the power, but to the policy." For this, as well as other evils resulting from the rebellion, we will . . . appeal to the ballot-box as the remedy."

All this is intelligible, and not less as to the following paragraph in which Governor Bramlette shows just how far his sympathies with Copperheads. "We can not too strongly condemn the disposition manifested in some to assail, not to correct, but for the purpose of weakening the loyalty of the citizen, and fettering the movements of the administration. . . . Whatever is treasonable, left in forts of those who attempt to organize, under pretense of opposition to obnoxious war measures, a party whose real purpose is to aid the rebellion, is evils conspicuous, but use them as a pretense for withholding the necessary supplies and aid for our defense, and thus aid the rebellion indirectly."

Two years ago the Border State policy was to be let alone. Now it is an overwhelming support of the Government, and opposition by every means, objecting to the black regiments merely as a matter of expediency not of right. Two years hence, or sooner, it will be emancipation.

A WAR TICKET.

IF the Seymour ticket in the New York election, the ticket for which he spoke, and which his friends nominated, the ticket which every shade of Copperhead opposition to the war success every one chief ardently desires—if this ticket, which Fernando and Benjamin sustain, because, although it is a Democratic ticket, it is the best they could get—is a "war ticket," why is it that its great advocate, Governor Seymour, and his friends have always been and are the friends of the anti-war party?

Last winter the citizen voters of this State who are in arms for their country were deprived of their votes by Governor Seymour and his friends.

On the 4th of July, when it was known that at Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and Gettysburg the soldiers were fighting for victory in the most glorious cause, the friends of the Governor held a meeting at the Academy of Music, and the Governor himself amid high sneers at our military operations and while he defamed the Government and the loyal States, most studiously hinted at a war, had not a single word of sympathy for his fellow-citizens in the field.

A little later, when the rebellion was sorely smitten, and our own forces were returning in such numbers as to make an immediate increase of the army most desirable for us, in order to follow up the blows we had struck, and when, for the same reason, an appearance of hearty unity and resolution at the North would have been of itself a finishing blow, Governor Seymour and his friends were coquetting with a brutal, sanguinary mob, and by their means delaying the advance of enlistments.

The friends of the soldiers smile as Governor Seymour and his "friends" ask their votes for the "Seymour war ticket." A Seymour war, they have learned, is not waged against rebels, but against the Government.

TWO POINTS OF VIEW.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is called a shrewd man. Let us see. He sends an army to Mexico. The General declares that his only object is to protect the people in choosing a Government to please themselves. Having beaten the Mexican armies and bombarded the Mexican cities, he appoints a commission of persons whom he knows distrusts, and this commission names a triumvirate of men whom the Mexicans hate. This authority, appointed and sustained by French arms, charges the government to an empire, and offers the crown to an Austrian Prince, and, if he declines, to Louis Napoleon as a matter of last resort. Suppose Louis Napoleon a Parisian organ inquires what the United States will probably say; and answers its own question by remarking, "Indeed we would deny to the Mexicans the right of managing their own affairs the Washington Secretary of State would be obliged to establish as legitimate the return of Mexico to Monarchy."

Let us now put the boot upon the other foot. If the United States should send an army to Italy, and having defeated the Italians in the field, should install Mazzini as Dictator, and he should decree a Republic, unless the French Emperor would deny to the Italians the right of managing their own affairs, he would be obliged to accept as legitimate the establishment of the Republic in Italy.

If Louis Napoleon is a shrewd man, he is certainly not very shrewdly defended.

FEE, FAW, FUM.

THE most manly, frank, fair, and honorable of N. Y. York newspapers, in the same way that Benedict Arnold was the most patriotic of our Revolutionary heroes, asks whether Andrews, the rioter, was not "not an hero to get up a riot, in order to have a pretext for declaring martial law in New York?" Of course he was; and it was only another instance of "Gorilla Lincoln's" utter disregard of the Constitution. It was part of the nefarious plot by which he called all the militia regiments out of the city in order that Andrews might have full swing. It belongs to the same scheme by which Lincoln procured the escape of Lee's army in order to have a fresh excuse for declaring Virginia and shooting our innocent brethren of "the South." In fact, it is equally notorious with his setting up the ruse that Old Jeff Davis kept us up to rebellion in order to have an excuse for raising an army and navy to exterminate every vestige of Constitutional right and trample upon all the liberties of every citizen; and then to found an Oriental despotism upon our ruin, change his name from Abe to Tamerlane, and grind our bones to make his bread.

A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT.

GOLDWIN SMITH, Professor of History at Oxford, and one of the noblest and most faithful of our friends in England, made a speech last April urging the British Government to prevent the sailing of pirates from British ports. The London Times denounced the meeting and the speeches, and branded as "traitors" those who demanded that the duties of neutrality should be more strictly performed.

Mr. Smith has now written a letter recalling these facts, quoting the spirit of the speeches and the comments of the Times, and giving the exact extracts from the late articles of that paper upon the subject in which his own conclusions are urged, although upon other grounds, with great coolness:

"After this, Sir, I think we are entitles to ask, who are the 'traitors' to the honor of England, those who in the last resource had for its basis to the voice of justice, or those who, having at that time counseled her to be deaf to the voice of justice, now counsel her to face Incite to 'war-fare?'"

Goldwin Smith is one of the English names which will be very precious to us hereafter.

England of Hampden and Milton and Locke and Mill.
You are the England of John Milton still.

WHO IS THE DEMOCRAT?

A COPPERHEAD authority complains that Vice-President Hamlin lately addressed "small political meetings" at the crossroads and in the taverns of the rural districts of Maine. The critic claims, of course, to be peculiarly Democratic, and he has never been that in plain and secret caucus and district school-room, and tavern-parlor meetings the public opinion is educated and formed which governs the country. And it is the glory of our system that no office exalts a man beyond his duties as a citizen, one of the first of which is the instruction and enlightenment of his neighbors. When John Quincy Adams, having been President, goes to Congress as a Representative, he illustrates perfectly the idea of democratic elevation and institutions. And when Mr. Hamlin, being Vice-President, confers with his fellow-citizens upon their public duty in a time of great emergency, it is a signal example which every faithful American will emulate. It is not those who cry "Lord, Lord," who are most religious. Nor is it those who call themselves "Democrats" who are most democratic. It would be hard to find in our history two men more simply, honestly, and entirely democratic than Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin.

LITERARY.

"THE Rivoune and the Battle-Field," by Captain G. F. Noyes (Harpers), is one of the personal memoirs upon which the historian of the war will indeed rely for the picturesque and entertaining passages. It is a record of the personal experience of one of General Dodd-day's first staff in Virginia, and is simply, plainly, and graphically, that the reader who gives up to despair the elaborate and scientific accounts of military life and operations will at once comprehend. It is not narrative of a soldier in active service. It is full of anecdotes, of incident, and of striking descriptions, and in a most delightful and instructive volume.

"Revised United States Army Regulations of 1861," with an appendix containing the changes and laws affecting army regulations and Articles of War to June, 1863. (G. W. Childs, Philadelphia.) This seems to be a complete body of military details. The duties of officers and men, volunteers and drafted soldiers, proceedings in civil courts and instructions in cases of army claims, encampments, marches, guards, military law, subsistance, equipments, are all explained; and every subject is accessible by the most carefully elaborated and comprehensive index. A military servant of the country, the work to be essential "to every officer, every office, and as many of our intelligent citizens as possible," as the old army regulations. And if essential to military men, it is at this time a most interesting book for civilians to consult.

"The Capital of the Tycoon," a narrative of a three years' residence in Japan, by Sir Rutherford Alcock. This is the story of the British Minister in Japan, and it is the most comprehensive survey of Japanese life and institutions that we have had. The detailed descriptions and the copious illustrations, with fac-similes from Japanese drawings, give it a curious interest. Sir Rutherford kept his eyes open constantly, and does not omit the smallest details. He tells us that the Cape jasmine is one of the few flowers in Japan that are fragrant, and that the wheat is never sown broadcast. His descriptions of social life are valuable; and from his account it is clear that there is the same kind of fierce, barbarous hate of foreigners in Japan that there is of men who love liberty in our southern country. As to the vexed question of the treaties between Japan and Great Britain, Sir Rutherford clearly inclines to the opinion that the Japanese should be strictly held to their agreements. The chief difficulty lies in the disposition of the Daimios, a kind of regal aristocracy. But he says that the Government represents and controls elements of strength and order independent of them, and with that Government a firm and friendly policy is inevitable. It is a most timely work. (Harper & Brothers.)

BLOWING HOT AND COLD.

THE most amusing result of the overwhelming Union and Administration victory in Maine is the various shades of excuses urged by the different shades of Copperheads for their disastrous popular defeat. One says it was because the Copperhead platform was not strong enough for peace. Another declares that it was not strong enough for war. But the most ludicrous of all is the position of the paper issued on the 12th of August that the platform of "the Democracy" in New York "will be that of the Kentucky conservatives, that of General Jesse D. Bright, that of Iowa Democrat, that of Maine.... It embraces unconditional loyalty to the Union.... the support of the war by all necessary men and means." On the 15th September, the day before the news from Maine, the same paper remarked in a double-headed paragraph: "There is a very simple solution to the defeat of the Democracy.... Bion Bradbury, the Democratic candidate for Governor, was not up only as a Copperhead, but as a peace pattern of Seymour of Connecticut," etc. etc. And it concludes by saying that, if the party had adopted the platform which on the 12th of August it declared it had adopted, Bradbury would have been elected.

Of all political slop the drivel of what is called "Conservatism" is the poorest.

MUSIC.

OUR winter prospect of music is most excellent. Max Maretzek, the best operatic manager we have had, will direct the Academy with Medori, whose success in Havana and the grandeur of her style are decided. He announces fresh operas and good singers, and the public has learned that he keeps his word. He has established, by long and faithful service, a feeling of interest in the public heart which is a part of his capital; and every frequenter and lover of the opera heartily bids him welcome again and God-speed.

Mr. Arcularius, also, begins a series of concerts in the city immediately. He has no reason for popularity in the concert-room, and his manipulation of them is mysterious. No man can remember such astonishing tours de force as Gottschalk, and yet, in certain impassioned pieces of Chopin, he is as rigorously exact as the most purely classical performer. It is a constant surprise and pleasure to hear him, and he has mastered the secret of success.

Mr. Anschütz, stimulated by his good fortune last year, will produce the German Opera, more carefully organized than last year. But he will research far before he gives us any thing better than Madame Johannsen's Fidelio; and we earnestly beg him to remember that he will disappoint his most faithful friends if he does not let us hear that Opera very often.

AN OLD SAW AND MODERN INSTANCE.

THE excellent Governor Seymour says, in his last speech, "I am not disposed to criticise the President's recent letter unkindly." Probably not. His Excellency's success in criticising and answering the Proclamation letters has not been great. The same remark may be made of his Excellency's similar efforts with the letters of General Dix. It is a wise old saw that says, "A burned child fears the fire."

THE MODEL CONSERVATIVE.

LET every man whose support is claimed for the anti-administration ticket reflect, that the chief authority which declares that the Government will be defeated in this State by fifty or sixty thousand majority should he elected, Fernando Wood should be made next Speaker of the House, because he is the best serve the Conservative cause in that position."

The excellent and hero of the Seven Days' swamp, who regretted that he could not send arms to the rebels, is presented as the model "Conservative." And justly so. Of what is now called "Conservatism"—a policy for the success of which Jeff Davis prays—he is a perfect representative.

REPLY TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE Lounger has received several letters informing him that Mr. Seymour is the purest of patriots and the greatest of statesmen. He has also received several stating that Mr. Lincoln is an ape, a gorilla, and a baboon. The Lounger has the honor to assure these letters from both classes of his correspondents, and to inform them that he is of a different opinion. He does not consider a gentleman who has conducted this war to its present condition an ape or a gorilla; nor does he think a gentleman who says that he prefers slavery to the Union the purest of patriots; nor a Governor who calls bloody rioters his "friends" the greatest of statesmen.

HAWTHORNE'S LETTER TO PIERCE.

THAT Mr. Hawthorne should cling to his college friends is natural. That he should feel kindly toward the man by whose influence he went to Europe, and say "Our Old Home," is simply human. That after that man had shown himself in his office the meanest and most pitiable of knaves he lost of purposes, and in his subsequent retirement the most shameless abettor of bloody war upon the United States, Mr. Hawthorne had no anxious to declare his friendship, is a kind of friendly generosity which is yet intelligible. But that he should gravely say of Franklin Pierce that "his moral quality is more steadfast," can be explained only by the fact that the letter to Pierce is dated after the 4th of July, and that until the 4th of July that Pierce made his Concord speech, and not until September that his letter to Jeff Davis was published, in which the ex-President assures his ex-Secretary that the North would support his rebellion in Jeff Davis.

Mr. Hawthorne owes it to himself—to every friend of his who loves liberty and man—to his country, and to the sense of loyalty which his prefaces by coupling it with so dishonored a name as Franklin Pierce—to explain in a subsequent edition that the letter of Pierce to Davis is dated after it had been spoken or printed, and was unknown to him.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL HALLECK is fast recovering from his late protracted though not serious indisposition, through all of which his wife devoted herself to his comfort with the most incredible industry which is one of his main characteristics. It is at his house that the Cabinet meetings have, and remains at work until four in the afternoon, when he returns to his residence in Georgetown Heights. His hours are again resumed at eight in the evening, and continued through the greater portion of the night. Our work is disposed of—often not ceasing until the "wee sma' hours" ahead.

General Benjamin F. Butler will enter immediately upon the campaign in Louisiana, as soon as the question of Governor Curtin. His first speech will be made at Lynchburg.

Lieutenant-Commander James E. Jouett is detached from the command of the R. R. Cuyler, and ordered to the command of the Sebago.

Among the casualties in the recent battle of Chattanooga are the following:

Colonel Hill and Colonel Bradley, commanding brigades, wounded.

Colonel Jones, of the Thirty-sixth Ohio regiment, and Colonel Gallagher, of the Eighty-eighth Illinois, Major Glenn regiment, wounded.

Lieutenant-Colonel Hewe, of the Fortieth Kentucky regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Maxwell, of the Second Ohio regiment, wounded.

Captain Shaeles, Assistant Adjutant-General of Steadman's brigade, killed.

Fourth-lieutenant Edward Mendo departed last week on the inspection tour through the several military departments. Colonel Thomas, of Philadelphia, is visiting Quincy on the western border. It was reported that General Logan also about to set out upon a mission similar to that of General Meade.

A young officer recently released from the Libby prison in Richmond, furnishes the following information in relation to Captain Sawyer and Flynn, who were condemned to death by Jeff Davis:

Captains Sawyer and Flynn, it will be remembered, have been condemned to death by the rebel authorities in execution by General Rosecrans of two rebel officers caught harassing rebels in East Tennessee. Considerable excitement at the death of these brave and patriotic men, but the authorities were reserved by the President himself. Mrs. Sawyer and Lee, held by us at Fortress Monroe. Captains Sawyer and Flynn were confined in the cells of the jail in pairs, joined off from the cellar of the building. Measured by the 20, it appeared that they were 20 feet below the jail. The only light and air are admitted through a hole near the ceiling about a foot square, through which the food is passed down twice a day. This diet is damp, dark, and most shocking to the senses. The prisoners confined in the rebel hatred are enduring within it a living death from day to day. Their keepers are the most degraded wretches tormenters dared not shoot or hang them, to torture their lives away by this long agony, and thus escape the awful leaving died of sickness.

The cruel authority demanded by Colonel Davis, of the Twelfth Illinois Cavalry, is still in session at Washington. This imposition than a letter from Colonel Davis in response to Colonel Davis's character as a brave and successful officer.

Commander Fred Wombes has been ordered to the Navy-yard at Philadelphia.

Lieutenant-Commander E. V. Scott is detached from the South Atlantic Blockading squadron, sick, and waiting orders.

Lieutenant-Commander Clark Wells is detached from the Navy-yard at Philadelphia, and ordered to the command of the Galena.

Captain Ingram, of Fifth New York Cavalry, was seriously wounded near Kelly's Ford on 17th. There is some reason to believe that the act was fired by a deserting conscript to avoid being captured.

The many friends of Major R. J. Falls will be pleased to learn that he has been promoted to the rank of Colonel. He served in General Stoneman's raid to the rear of Lee's army as far as the south side of the James River. He was ordered on General Heintz's staff, at Philadelphia, where he duties are performing to the entire satisfaction of all.

A letter from Cairo says: Some changes have taken place in the Illinois regiments since last week. They are as follows:

Colonel W. P. Lyon, of the Fifty-eighth Illinois Infantry, is to command the post of Cairo, vice General A. D. Bowen, who is ordered to Memphis.

Captain J. R. Freese, of Pennsylvania, late with General Hovey's command, is also appointed to the responsible position on General Grant's Staff of Provost Marshal of the Department of the Tennessee, and ordered to Vicksburg to assume the duties of the post. He has been on the General's staff since the battle of Shiloh, and is an able, experienced officer and a gentleman. What a fine opportunity for some of the Cairo officers, who are idleships, is to do but not transpired. He will probably have a leave of absence, or be assigned some equally important duty with that he has been relieved from.

The following assignments of medical officers have been made:

Assistant Surgeon S. S. Holman and Enoch Pearce, U. S. Volunteers, recently appointed, to report to Major-General Meade, commanding Army of the Potomac.

Assistant Surgeon Eversland, U. S. Volunteers, to report to Major-General Banks, commanding Department of the Gulf.

Assistant Surgeons W. S. Ely, H. C. Roberts, and C. C. Chaffee, U. S. Volunteers, to report to Major-General Curtis, commanding Army of the North Line.

Assistant Surgeon M. K. Hogan, U. S. Volunteers, to report to the Medical Director, Washington, for duty with Battalion First, D. C. Volunteers, Colonel L. C. Baker.

Assistant Surgeon W. H. Dewey, Lieutenant Alfred Kenny Gowan, U. S. Volunteers, to report in person to Major-General Rosecrans, Chief of Staff, by letter to Assistant Surgeon-General R. C. Wood, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Assistant Surgeon Alexander Ingram, U. S. Volunteers, to report to Major-General Rosecrans, Chief of Staff, by letter to Assistant Surgeon-General R. C. Wood, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Assistant Surgeons James Preston and W. C. Daniels, U. S. Volunteers, to report to Major-General Grant, and by letter to Assistant Surgeon-General Wood, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Assistant Surgeon John D. Woon, U. S. Volunteers, is hereby relieved from duty in the Medical Department, and will report in person, without delay, to Major-General Rosecrans, Department of the Cumberland, and by letter to Assistant Surgeon-General R. C. Wood, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Surgeon Edward Shippen, U. S. Volunteers, now on duty in the Army of the Potomac, will report without delay to Surgeon W. S. King, U. S. Army, Medical Director Department of the Susquehanna, to relieve Surgeon Patterson, U. S. Volunteers, in charge of the South Street General Hospital, Philadelphia.

Commander John C. Howell has been detached from the command of the Mahaska and ordered to the command of the Neosho.

Commander H. K. Cosden has been detached from the Naval Academy and ordered on ordnance duty in the Philadelphia Navy-yard.

Commander Donald M'N. Fairfax has been ordered to the Naval Academy as commandant of midshipmen.

Lieutenant-Commander J. P. Foster has been ordered to the command of the Belmont.

Captain Lawrence Pennington, Provost Marshal for the Third district of Pennsylvania, has been dismissed.

General Burnside, the Washington Republican says, "declared last summer that the interest of any personal or political grievances, but from a desire to attend to his private affairs. Under the pressure of his campaign he found he thought he might be relieved from service. The President thought otherwise, and at his request, General Burnside has patriotically consented to remain at the head of his command.

Four hundred men, belonging to Colonel Trew's cavalry regiment, arrived at Philadelphia on their return from Delaware. They were originally captured rebels, who have enlisted in the Union cause, for the sake of allegiance, and joined the Union service.

Subscriptions for McClellan testimonials are passing through the hands of Adams & Co. One of these, presented to us office, was headed by General Stone with a subscription for $1,000.

Major-General Dix, commanding the Department of the East, is about to start upon a tour of inspection. He will be accompanied by General Totten of the Engineer Corps.

Governor Todd has sent James M. Edwards (Rep.) and General Wickliffe (Union Democrat) to General Grant's army to entreat the votes of the soldiers. He has also arranged to record the votes of the Ohio soldiers in other states.

The rebel ram Atlanta arrived in Philadelphia last week, in tow of the United States steamer Onondaga. The Atlanta will be fitted up for use in such manner as may seem best to the naval authorities.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE BATTLE OF CHATTANOOGA.

A VERY SEVERE BATTLE undoubtedly has been fought near Chattanooga on Saturday, 19th, and Sunday, 20th Sept., between General Rosecrans and General Bragg's army, which had been heavily reinforced. Up to the present time we have no full and connected account of the battle. A Louisville dispatch, received here on 21st, stated that Rosecrans had been "driven back" on the 20th, but apparently speaking of his being obliged to fall back on Chattanooga. The following account is condensed from the Washington Star, and is supposed to be official:

BEGINNING OF THE FIGHT.

On Saturday, 19th, a severe demonstration was made by the rebels in strong force, which appears to have been received by the Union troops with success. This was the advantage on the Union side.

On Sunday the engagement commenced late in the morning. The first gun was fired at nine A.M., but no considerable firing took place until about eleven A.M., when General Rosecrans rode the whole length of our line. Soon after the battle commenced.

General Thomas, who held the left, began to call for reinforcements. Soon after the rebels' work since that it had been forced to retire.

Then came the rebel deformants were then sent to him, and M'Cook's whole corps, which was on the right and as reserve to the left, was ordered to his assistance. General Wood, of Critenden's corps, and Van Cleve, who held the front centre, were also ordered to the left. About this hour of the commander showed that the enemy's force was concentrated.

Their places were filled by Davis and Sheridan, of General M'Cook's corps, who came to give way, but in excellent order; soon after which the line of Sheridan and Davis was in disorder, occasioned by the heavy columns which are said to have consisted of Polk's corps. These two divisions were the only ones which threw into any disorder. Those of Negley and Van Cleve were thrown back, and formed a new line of battle upon the centre. The fires on the left and the second on the right of Thomas's line. This position was held, late in the day, successfully, rallying about eight thousand of their forces, and joined Thomas.

THOMAS CHANGES POSITION.

General Thomas, finding himself cut off from the right, brought back the left in position for independent fighting, his line assuming the form as a horse-shoe along the crest of a wooded hill. Here he was joined by Wood, from Rossville, with a division of General M'Cook and General Brannan's division of Reserve Corps. General Negley maintained the fight until after dark.

Their troops were driven back on the rocks they stood on. The enemy repeatedly hurled against them the dense columns which had driven back the right wing in the morning; but every onset was repulsed with dreadful slaughter. Falling first on one and then on the other point of our lines, the rebels for hours vainly sought to break them. General Thomas seemed to have filled every soldier with his own unconquerable firmness; and General Granger, with his own fiery bullets, rode like a whirlwind wherever the combat was thickest. Every division commander, and every brigade, fought with heroic valor. Steedman, Turchin, Hazen, and Parker especially distinguished themselves. Steedman fought through the night, and with the bayonet, and being surrounded, fired his way out with a revolver. Hazen was in the hottest fight of all on Saturday, forcing his men in one line, made them lie down until the enemy was close upon them, when suddenly they rose and delivered their fire, with such effect that the assailing columns fell back in confusion, leaving the ground covered with killed. When night fell this body of heroes stood on the same ground occupied by them in the morning, their spirits being unbroken. Their losses are not yet estimated.

NET RESULTS.

General Thomas telegraphs (Monday afternoon) that the troops are in high spirits. He brought off all his wounded. Of the sick and wounded at Crawfish Spring, including our main hospital, nearly all had been brought away.

The number of prisoners taken by us during the battle, by corpses two thousand, besides the wounded, of whom not more than two thousand have fallen into their hands. Of rebel prisoners we have sent thirteen hundred to Nashville.

Most of our losses in artillery were occasioned by the falling of a limb.

General Thomas retired to Rossville on Sunday night to the line then held.

General Rosecrans had issued orders for all his troops to be concentrated with the forces at Rossville.

In the last two assaults our troops fought with hypnotism, their ammunition being exhausted.

The latest information that has reached this city to Monday evening is to the effect that on that day General Rosecrans would concentrate on Chattanooga last night.

General Thomas had been engaged with the enemy prior to the fight on Saturday, and it was therefore questionable whether he would be able to reach Chattanooga last night.

There were indications that the enemy were contemplating a demonstration on another part of our line last evening.

THE CAVALRY FIGHT AT CULPEPPER.

We have received from the Rapidan the full account of the cavalry fight with the rebels near to, at, and beyond Culpepper Court-House, on the 13th. Again fierce work by the chief command of General Pleasanton, with Generals Buford, Gregg, and Kilpatrick as division commanders. The gallantry of our troops has again been brought to the test in a fight against odds. The rebels were under the command of General Stuart, and the rebel accounts of the fight acknowledge that the best and bravest of our artillery mentioned in the Union accounts as having been captured from them. In the fight they took trophy in the bones of Culpepper during the contest, and fired from the windows and street-corners, compelling the shelling of the place to drive them out, and thereby causing the death of several non-combatants in the town. Wednesday's fight was but a part of our forces at Raccoon Ford; but General Kilpatrick, commanding the Second division, pressed on, and being assisted by artillery, speedily redrove the rebels back beyond the Rapidan, capturing several pieces of artillery. The head-quarters of the Union cavalry were also shelled without success. The rebels, after a day of attacking and repulsing successfully on the outskirts of the various Union camp lines and crossing the railroads.

REPULSE AT SABINE PASS.

We have particulars of an expedition under General Franklin to the mouth of the Sabine River, Texas, which has proved unsuccessful. On arriving at the place designed for the landing of the troops, it was found that the early reflections, it was found impossible to disembark, owing to the impossibility of the ground and excessive shallow water. Upon the gun-boats Clifton, Sachem, and Arizona, therefore, devolved the duty of attacking the batteries, and they came gallantly up to the work. The disadvantage of the ground soon clear, gradually decreasing in brightness until the vessels got within point-blank range of the forts, when the action became general and of a terrific fire, in which they were aided by a fleet of three cotton-clad steamers and a schooner fitted up for the fight. At first the fire from our gun-boats was more accurate than that of the forts, and was of considerable effect in the gun batteries, and the Clifton was compelled to sweep the task of attacking their fire from the forts. In the action she was struck and on the bottom, and was not long before much as a fine mistake to the Sachem's. Captain Crocker, her commander, made a heroic effort to save his vessel, but seeing the case was hopeless, he landed on the shore with a 9-inch rifled shot, and fired it through the centre of the ship, crushing and destroying her, and thus effectually destroying the vessel. The Arizona was then forced reluctantly to withdraw from the top with the enemy. Besides the vessels' crews, we lost as prisoners 58 soldiers, who were either on sharp-shooters. The numbers killed and wounded are not very large.

OCCUPATION OF LITTLE ROCK.

The following official report has been received at the head-quarters of the army at Washington:

DISPATCH FROM GENERAL STEELE.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., September 10, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

We have occupied Little Rock. The cavalry under General Davidson in pursuing the enemy, who are in full retreat. (Signed) F. STEELE, Major-General.

SURPRISE OF OUR MEN.

A dispatch, dated Knoxville, Tennessee, Wednesday, September 16, says: On Wednesday, the 9th, General Colyer, with 300 men of the One Hundredth Ohio regiment, was ordered to Cumberland Gap, which was taken by 1,800 rebels under General Jackson.

After fighting gallantly for a few hours, our forces, being heavily in killed and wounded, were compelled to surrender to overpowering numbers.

CHARLESTON.

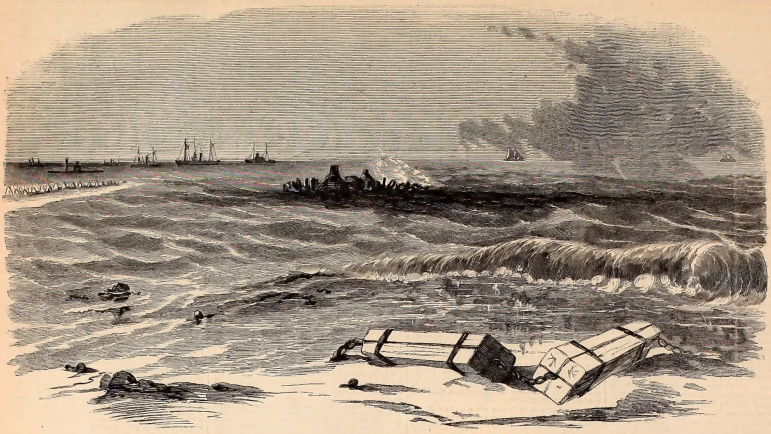
At latest dates General Gillmore was very busy mounting heavy guns on the upper part of Morris Island for the purpose of bombarding Charleston, and, although Fort Sumter was still in the hands of the rebels, he was progressing favorably. General Gillmore has issued an eloquent congratulatory order to his troops, and a copy is to be placed in the hands of every living officer and soldier who has participated in the operations on Morris Island. On the morning of the 15th inst. the magazine of one of the rebel batteries on Sand Point, near Fort Johnson, exploded, with terrific violence, destroying the battery, 80 magazine, and 200 men. One hundred and fifteen, taken on Morris Island, came North in the M'Clellan.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

THE REBEL RAMS TO BE RETAINED.

We have the most important information that the British Government has decided to detain Laird's rebel iron rams. This, of course, is a great blow struck over the rebels and their sympathizers in England.



FRANCE.

THE NEW MEXICAN EMPEROR.

The acceptance of the Mexican throne dispatched to tender the crown to the Archduke Maximilian have arrived in Paris. A dispatch of Juarez to Commodore Pinkstell at sea, it was reported that the offer had been made and accepted. The Prince of Spain, with the Duke of Bejiar, sponsoring of the decision of the Archduke. It was said that he dispatched for two conditions only, viz., "A unanimous appeal to him from the Mexican people, and the moral and material co-operation of the Western Powers in the establishment of a respected and stable Government."

SEWARD'S CIRCULAR.

Secretary Seward's recent circular has caused some illfeeling at the French Court. The Pays publishes it as the official journals of Paris, in publishing the paper, print it with a sneer at the conclusion, in which it is analyzed and condemned, side by side with it.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—PORTION OF THE OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE HARBOR, WASHED ASHORE ON AN ISLAND.
FROM A SKETCH BY SURGEON ROBINSON, ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH PENNSYLVANIA.—[SEE PAGE 630.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE LAST NIGHT BEFORE WAGNER—THE HEAD OF THE SAP.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS

CHARLESTON.

WE continue in this number our series of illustrations of General Gilmore's campaign before Charleston, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. T. R. Davis. Mr. Davis writes:

"REPULSE AT GREGG.

"HEAD-QUARTERS, MORRIS ISLAND, Sept. 15, 1863.

"The attempt to capture Battery Gregg by boat attack, though a failure, hastened, without doubt, the coup d'état taken by the rebels of Morris Island on the night of the 6th ult.

"This I premise, that the real importance of the event may be more perfectly understood, and the daring exhibited in the attempt, though unsuccessful, may be more thoroughly appreciated.

"The scene upon the beach when, just at twilight, the boats that were to bear our gallant men upon their dangerous mission were being transported upon wagons to a point from whence a successful starting could be accomplished was full of suggestion. Would they be successful; or would the same boats be on the morrow shattered wrecks, each splinter stained with blood, telling of the sacrifice freely offered for our country's Union?

"Then waiting with more than eager eye and breathless anxiety stood to their guns the brave men, who watched from the different batteries for the first flash that would tell of a successful landing, or the discovery by an alert foe.

"Could we have captured Battery Gregg a few more of the 'Tchivalrie' would now be at Hilton Head, awaiting their transportation to the land of 'Uncle Psalm.'

"SOUTTHE.

"The sketch of Fort Moultrie and the batteries upon Sullivan's Island gives the scene which was witnessed by the sturdy Jack Tars who manned our ironclads in their last attack upon these works, and which was hailed by them with cheer after cheer.

"The Weehawken had just grounded upon a shoal near Morris Island, and the concentrated fire of the rebel batteries was being hurled against her, when, by a fortunate accident, a shell from one of her monster guns blew up the magazine of Fort Moultrie. Just at this time, too, Moultrieville was in flames, the smoke hanging in grand masses over the angry scene.

"THE HEAD OF THE SAP AGAINST WAGNER.

"Words seem to fail me as I pen the account of this scene. The General had said, 'The head of the sap must be in the ditch of Wagner ere morning, that our men may enter and carry the fort from it.' The desperate labor of long weeks was nearly ended. Foot by foot our flag, advanced by its sturdy bearer, neared the rebel strong-hold. A brilliant glare from the calcium light, flooding Wagner, gave us the advantage of seeing without being seen. Just as the 'sap roller,' a huge 'gabion' (or basket) filled with 'fascines' (bundles of fagots), had reached the ditch, a deserter came to us telling of the rebel flight.

"A word may here be said of the splendid work performed in these sapsby engineer officers. Lieut. M'Guire, after finishing the labor assigned to him upon the Left Batteries, was put upon the work of the sap, and the exceeding ability and gallantry displayed by him will not soon be forgotten by those who took part in the capture of Morris Island. He is now intrusted with the important work of rendering Battery Gregg all that a sand-work can be, and a sore place for the Charlestonians to look upon, as they are soon to discover. Captains Siess and Walker, too, are in every way worthy of the public's commendation.

"REBEL TORPEDOES.

"In traveling through the saps one often enjoys a quiet laugh at the manner in which the soldiers are amusing themselves. A few days since, having nearly reached Battery Wagner, I heard in a sap near some of the boys calling, 'That's going to hit it; look out, boys!' and the next moment an explosion that shook

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—SOLDIERS EXPLODING TORPEDOES BY THROWING PIECES OF SHELL ON THEM FROM THE SAPS. [FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—EXPLOSION OF THE MAGAZINE AT FORT MOULTRIE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

the ground for yards around. Reaching the spot from whence came the noise, I found a number of the 'braves' tossing into the air big pieces of shell—to drop, if possible, upon the rebels—of the half-buried torpedoes.

"Now and then one would strike the mark, and the roars of laughter that greeted the explosion told of the manner in which it was appreciated by the boys."

On page 628 we reproduce a sketch, by Surgeon Robinson, of the One Hundred and Fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, representing a used by the rebels to obstruct the entrance to Charleston Harbor. A few links got broken somehow, the other day, and came ashore on one of the islands, where it was found by our men. It consists of bars of railroad iron, connected by shorter links about eighteen inches in length. Around each bar of iron are fastened heavy pine logs, squared, and bound together with heavy straps of iron. This chain the navy has yet to overcome.

PIECE OF THE CHAIN

A WHISPER.

THERE was never a day so sad and long
But it wore at length to even-song;
There was never a life so full of grief
But death came at last to its relief.

There was never a soul so wholly sad
But it found some moment to be glad;
There was never a heart so full of care
But it had one hope to cheat despair.

There was never a winter dark and drear
But changed to spring in the early year;
There was never a summer, welladay!
But it sloped through autumn to decay.

WAITING FOR THE TIDE.

EVER so many years ago, when the few people who wrote letters were still hardly used to dating their compositions with "18—" instead of "17—," there lived, at the flourishing sea-port town of Filby, in Yorkshire, one Jonathan Gale. Mr. Gale was employed in one of the seven dock-yards that Filby then maintained, or that then maintained Filby, and was eminently well-to-do and respectable. At the time of this narrative Mr. Gale must be supposed to have prospered in this life for some forty years, and to have been married somewhere about half that time. Such a hypothesis is necessary in order that there may be no difficulties in the way of introducing Miss Patience Gale, Jonathan's daughter, as a bright, lovable, English girl of seventeen.

Of the many ships "of Filby" one good brig was the property of Master Henry Harborough, a kindly and prudent seaman. The skipper of the Camilla brig could not have been more than ten years younger than Mr. Jonathan Gale; but for all that he had won the heart, and a promise of the hand, of Patience. Patience was one of those natures who love to cling to something stoutly set. The quiet earnestness and unobtrusive self-reliance of her friend outweighed the more boisterous attractions of a score of younger wooers. Besides, certain whaling adventures in the South Seas had made Harborough somewhat of a hero. A hero with a frank fearless face, strong and tender, and withal steady and sober, is no bad match for any girl, though he be forty instead of thirty. We have high authority for believing that in the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love. It can not be unreasonable to hold that the same phenomenon may be observed in a young woman.

Let none, therefore, deem it an exaggerated impossibility that the afore-mentioned Henry and Patience should be described as meeting in the ruins of the old abbey of Filby, on an evening in the May of 18—, to discuss their matrimonial prospects. Let none, however, imagine, from the mention of a meeting in a ruin, that the alliance under consideration was in the least degree clandestine. Henry and Patience had walked boldly forth from the parlor of Mr. and Mrs. Gale, with the full consent and approbation of that worthy couple. So far from Jonathan's being a too stern parent, he was possibly too lax. Nevertheless in one matter he was stern, or firm, or obstinate. Patience Gale should never be Patience Harborough, with his willing blessing, until Henry, the bridegroom, should be able to show fifteen hundred guineas side by side with the dowry he intended for his daughter.

These fifteen hundred guineas formed one subject of the lovers' talk in the ruined abbey. As yet their existence was only a possibility. Henry did not despair of acquiring them; but he was of opinion that their acquisition would be easier if he were cheered in his work by the smiles of a wife. Patience by no means disagreed with him. But her father was immovable. Harborough must make more than one other voyage en garçon; and this was the eve of his departure. The moon, and the ruin, and the far sea make up a fine set scene for a parting lovers' dialogue. The reader may fill it up at his or her pleasure, only remembering that Henry and Patience really and honestly cared a great deal for one another.

"Patience," said her lover, pointing over the rippling sea, marked with a long tapering stripe of moonshine, "it looks very bright and kind. It will bring me back to you."

At last it was time to part. The suitor led the lady to her father's door.

"Good-by, Henry."

"God bless you, my girl."

A close quick embrace and a smothered sob, and Captain Harborough was off to his boat. The Camilla was bound for the South Seas again. With Patience at home the days and the nights went slowly by. Her thoughts were in the Pacific. When the wind howled over Filby, she trembled for the Camilla. When the sun shone down on a calm sea, she remembered that there were storms elsewhere. Still she did her duties without complaint. And she was not without consolation. Her father fell ill, and grew peevish and fretful. But an old uncle of Harborough's died, and left the captain two thousand pounds. At first old Gale declared that this should make no difference in the sum to be earned; but he was induced at last to say that, as far as he was concerned, the wedding might take place on the day after Harborough's return.

So Patience worked and waited. She was gentle to her cross-grained father. She was the kindly friend of scores of the poor. She prayed at church. And she sat a great many more hours than was necessary with a black profile portrait of her absent friend, which hardly did him justice. Icebergs, French cruisers, whales, South-Sea Islanders, filled her heart with a thousand terrors. So nine months went by. Then came a letter. Harborough had prospered, and was unscathed. So far from the French having been a cause of loss to him, they had been a gain. He had encountered a privateer, and encountered her successfully. He should sail homeward within three months of the date of his letter. "And being sure of your true love, I hope and pray you will be safe when I come to you. The very day after we are home again, Patience, I shall claim you as my wife. Good-by, dearest. Mark Elling, of the City of York, carries this for me. So no more from yours till death. H. HARBOROUGH." These precious lines of great round-hand writing shared the attentions of Miss Gale with the black profile and several other letters from the same writer.

The paper grew worn with perpetual fingering. But Patience had now an occupation immediately connected with her hero. If she was going to be married to him in three months she must be properly supplied with raiment and household linen. So mother and daughter toiled diligently at the fashioning of garments which, were they worn nowadays, would at once mark the owners as candidates for Colney Hatch. And when Patience was busy neither with her outfit nor with her poor pensioners, she would wander forth with the escort of her diminutive maid, and indulge in fond retrospect and anticipation under the suggestive shadow of the abbey ruin. The light that streamed through the narrow openings of the long lancet windows seemed to figure to her the hope that lit her own dull life. And as she gazed over the far sea she thought again and again of her lover's words uttered on that very spot: "It will bring me back to you."

She had perfect faith that these words would be fulfilled.

At last the time arrived when the Camilla might be daily expected home. Every thing was ready for the wedding. Patience was of opinion that it would be unnecessary for her Henry to go to sea again. His little property would go far to maintain them; and he could no doubt obtain occupation in the dock-yards. There was a very charming little house just vacated that she was confident would exactly suit such a couple as that of which she hoped soon to constitute the better half. Of course Captain Harry would agree with her. On that point she never felt any doubt. Of course the statement of that person that he should claim his "wife" on the day of his arrival was an amatory exaggeration. Sundry forms, as well ecclesiastical as civil, must be complied with. But the day was to be postponed for as short a time as possible. So Patience had every hope that before the lapse of a month, at most, she would be a happy bride.

Her visits to her point of observation at the abbey now became more frequent. Every speck that broke the line of the horizon was watched with the intensest interest. At last the long watch was rewarded. On a sunny afternoon in June a brig was descried making for Filby, which knowing ones declared to be the Camilla. Patience watched it—I beg pardon—watched her growing and growing, her white sails scarcely bowed by the gentle summer breeze. Patience did not wish to exhibit before the loungers of the hill-top the excitement which she could not repress. From the roof of her father's house she could see the advancing brig. Thither she repaired in company with an old telescope of her father's, and glued her eyes on the sea. The Camilla sailed on till she was within some mile and a half of the shore. The sheets of canvas suddenly rose in thick folds. The brig hove-to under—but perhaps Patience was not learned in the terminology of rigging; it is her emotions which are being described; there is therefore no obligation that the technical details of the heave-to should be given. But let none think this omission is the result of the author's ignorance. Of course not. Well, the Camilla hove-to. There was great signaling between the brig and the shore. Dates were given. The state of the tide was told. It may be presumed that Harborough should have known that on such a day he could not enter Filby harbor at such an hour. But it may also be presumed that he was anxious to hear news of folks at home as soon as possible. The peace of Patience's mind did not depend only on the signal of "All Well." By the help of the big telescope she could distinctly see her Henry commanding on his deck. His tall stalwart figure was easily distinguished among the rest; and if only Miss Gale had been as severely educated as are many of the young ladies of the present day, she might have quoted:

Ἔξοχος Ἀργείων κεφαλήν τε καὶ εὐρέας ὤμους.

Not that it would have added to her happiness. That was now supreme. There was Henry, safe and sound. The good girl thanked God for this mercy vouchsafed to her, and a joyful tear impeded the use of the glass. But what was this? The canvas curtains were dropping again, and filling with the lazy wind. The tide would not allow of the Camilla's coming into Filby till the next morning. Patience liked her friend all the better because he would not leave his ship and his men, even for her. Still, she had half-expected to see a boat put off from the brig; she had thought that she might hold her treasure in her arms that very day. It would be more tantalizing to wait those eight or ten hours than it had been to wait long months. To see him, and see him sail out of her sight! For the Camilla was moving seaward. It was evident that she was going to stand off for the night. Smaller and smaller grew the moving figures on the deck. Then there was nothing to be seen but hull and sail. The sun set behind the hills. The Camilla was nothing but a darker shadow against the dark bank of eastern clouds.

Patience came down into the house.

"Mother, dear, I think I shall go to bed. I must be up very early, you know. They can be in by six o'clock; and I should like to watch them from the down."

So the happy girl shut herself up with her thoughts—that night the pleasantest possible companions. The profile portrait met with little attention. The image suggested by the telescope was far more satisfactory. The letters were turned over once again, and confided to their resting-place with a happy kiss. Of course Patience could not sleep. She lay in a dreamy reverie, her thoughts wandering backward and forward between that brig at sea and the outlines and the noises of her room and the night. The rumble of each rare vehicle seemed very loud. The cries of reveling sailors seemed shriller than on other nights. The sea surely sounded more harshly than it did an hour ago. The low grating murmur of the calm seemed to have given place to the quicker, angrier noise of taller breakers. And hark! What was that? The shutter, too loosely fastened back to the wall, banged suddenly on the window-post and shook the little panes. The wind was rising. But it was hardly likely to be much. It was so still at sunset. And perhaps it would bring in the Camilla all the more quickly. Patience dozed. She was unconscious for an hour and a half or two hours, and then was roused again. There was more noise now. The wind was shrieking up the street, and the roar of the sea was deep and loud. The girl sprung from her bed and looked from the window. The night was very dark. The roaring of the gale was enough to drown every sound of passers-by. But the street was deserted; more deserted than the streets of a sea-port usually are, even in the dead of night. The men of Filby were all down at the port.

Patience grew very white. A strange terror numbed her limbs. Then she went to the door of her parents' room, and, as she walked gently in, she said:

"Mother, do you hear the wind?"

"Hush! my child; don't wake your father. I hear. We must be still and wait, dear. Let us hope the best. Is it very wild outside?"

"Mother, I am going out; I shall—"

"Out, child? you can not! You must—"

"No, mother, I can not wait. Hark! Peggy can go with me to the port. I must see and hear for myself."

Mrs. Gale rose from her bed and tried her best to move her daughter's will. But a weird resolution had set the lines of that gentle face. It was very white, and very sad, but very firm. The two girls went bravely down to the port; it was dark; a thin rain hissed along with the gale. Fishermen, sailors, dockyardmen, and many less professional inhabitants, were grouped along the quays. Nor were women wanting to the crowd; but their wan and tearful faces told of something more than curiosity as the motive of their coming. What was the latest news? Two fishing-boats had gone to pieces on the rocks; one had just got across the bar; it was about three o'clock; the dawn would soon be breaking. Had any thing been heard of the Camilla? Nothing. The men looked on Patience with a tender and respectful interest. More than one knew why she was out on that angry night. The morning light spread over the east, and the fury of the storm abated. When the sun rose over the horizon, it seemed to struggle to burst the black bank of clouds. Wider and wider grew the clefts of blue. At five o'clock the scene was one of the fairest that is to be beheld any where—a storm dying in sunshine. Great piles of white clouds, thick, massive, and of ever-shifting shape, rolled over the heaven. Nearer the horizon the same mighty mountains of vapor rested in darker groups. The waves that had loomed so threatening in the darkness now seemed the very personification of strong, joyous life. They swelled up tall and bulky before the wind, their green summits gladly housing the sunlight. At the top of their triumphant rise they broke into a thousand columns of foam and spray, tossing their glittering drops high into the clear air. All over their surface great circling lines of floating foam marked the commotions that raged below. And ever and anon it seemed as though the coursing waves lost the order of their flying march; they jostled one another; and then the crash of force and force, and the roar with which each water-mountain strove to overtop his neighbor was glorious to hear and see. On they surged in swift succession to the shore, some soaking the crags for many yards above the beach; some trying hard to rend the plank of the jetty from its huge cramps, and force it upward. All nature seem to shake with boisterous laughter. Of what account in the face of such a scene of life were the half-dozen corpses from the fishing boats broken in the bay? Or the dull, stupefying misery of one young girl?

For where was the Camilla? The Camilla was nowhere to be seen.

Patience had watched the dawn of day and the sinking of the tempest. She stood on the port stiff and cold, and watched for four weary hours. Rough men, who knew her father and herself, stood round her as a little body-guard, kindly and seasonably offering such comfort as they could. There was danger, no doubt; but there was hope. Harborough was a skillful seaman. It was by no means impossible for him to have kept his vessel clear of the shore. The Camilla was perhaps quite safe. Patience looked up with listless, uninterested eyes. Something at her heart told her that the Camilla was lost. She did not know. There was no certainty. But she dared not hope.

The hours wore on, and Patience was induced to go home. It was now eight o'clock. Not a ship was to be seen at sea. The Camilla must be either safe, or lost out of the reach of the Filby seamen.

While Mrs. Gale was lovingly tending her poor child—tending her with comfort both physical and mental—three men passed the parlor window and stopped before the Gales's door.

"Mother, they are come to say he's dead."

"Nay, child, we don't know that. Don't think the worst."

The mother went out to speak to the strangers. One of them was a farmer from a village some four miles from Filby. The other two were Filby men. Patience was not far wrong. The Camilla had gone ashore on the rocks close to this neighboring village. The cottagers were some unwilling and all unable to be of any material service to the crew. The rocks were far spread and dangerous. The brig went to pieces before any communication could be established between her and the shore. The old yeoman's eyes showed two big tears as he narrated the scene of desolation when the morning broke.

"When a knew 't were t' Camilla, a coomed to t' Master Gale. A knew t' lass and skipper i'yon—" But here he fairly broke down; for out of the doorway of the inner room the white face of Patience glared with a fixed gaze of piteous intensity.

"Mother, I am going to Rilcar. Master Kirby, will you take me back with you?"

The old man shook his gray head

"Nowt can coom on't noo."

"But I must go. I must see where he was killed. Perhaps they will find—" She shuddered, and, with little opposition from her parent, set off for the scene of the wreck.

The little cart rolled roughly over the road. Patience sat very still, her eyes fixed straight before her. Her conductor knew better than to trouble her with a word of pity or encouragement. They traveled in silence.

At last the scene of the wreck was reached. The tide was high, and the surf curled over the crags almost at the foot of the steep cliffs. Many yards to seaward the brig had struck and gone to pieces. Riven timbers were still seen floating on the surface. All that remained together of the ill-fated vessel was hidden under the waters of the sea.

Little knots of the country folk and strangers from Filby were gathered here and there on the narrow ledge of rock below the down, that the sea had not yet covered. They pointed every where, and then with strange significance to a fisherman's hut hard by. There were laid the battered remnants of what had once been men. Seven bodies had as yet been washed on shore. Patience did not even ask if that of her betrothed were there. She still gazed wistfully out to sea. For, like the plaintive refrain that runs through some melody in a minor key, one sentence sounded and sounded again in her ears. "It will bring me back to you." "It will bring me back to you."

Presently all heads were turned in one direction. A dark something was seen among the coming surf. The something came nearer and nearer—now rolled high above the waves, now sucked back again into the hissing water; tossed at last on a shelving stone. They met at last, after so many months of separation, those two faithful lovers. The sea had not violated the pledge taken in its name. It brought the bridegroom back to his mistress. Bruised and bloody, the crisp hair dank and matted over the forehead, the frank eyes dimmed forever, that face was once more shown to her who loved it best.

Patience looked upon it very calmly. She followed the men who bore the body reverently out of the reach of the "cruel crawling foam." She looked, and that was all. If only she could have wept! But that was impossible. Old Kirby led her to his cart. He would have conducted her through the village to his kindly wife to be comforted with loving sympathy, but the sorrowful girl pointed so steadfastly toward home that he did not like to offer the smallest opposition.

Patience went home, fell into her mother's arms, and then at last burst into a long passion of tears.

The story is done. The most melancholy part of it is that, in substance, it is but a simple record of facts.

The story is done; or rather, we should say the incident of the story is done. Good orthodox novels always leave their hero and heroine on the point of setting out on their wedding tour. In this sad tale there is no such event with the details of which to weave a peroration. And perhaps the most useful part of this true story is the end come to by the principal character. It is no end invented to point a moral. It is what really happened to the real Patience.

She went home. She wept. She did not die. She did not go mad. She did not become another man's mistress before the end of six months. She never married; but she did not live a peevish and useless old maid.

As long as her parents lived she nursed them patiently and assiduously. When they were laid not far from Henry Harborough in the grave-yard attached to the old abbey, she was not left all alone. Certain cousins of her own, and certain nephews and nieces of the dead sailor, had a tender interest in "Aunt Patience."

Loving and loved by poor and rich alike; never merry, but always cheerful; Patience Gale was Patience Gale to the day of her death.

Strangers who saw a grave elderly woman wandering alone and apparently purposeless and dreaming round the ruins of Filby Abbey, fancied that the poor lady was a little wrong in her head. They who had heard her story knew for otherwise.

Patience was still thinking of the old words written on every wave of the shifting sea. It will bring him back to me. So often did she gaze and think that the great deep seemed an image of a Great Love, deep and infinite, a Love on which she trusted she was being borne up, a Love which in her firm faith she believed would one day bring back—not dead, but alive—all that she had loved and lost.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A LETTER from Gilmore's gallant army contains the following:

We had just captured Morris Island, and I think that never did the feeling of triumph that follows a quickly-successful engagement more thoroughly pervade a mass of men—soldiers shouting, singing, happy. The sturdy Jack Tars, in quest of adventure or abandoned "loot," doing and saying as only they can when thoroughly happy, not in spirit, come upon the subject of my yarn.

A brownish blue jacket had captured a mule, and, not without difficulty, mounted it, perching himself as near the animal's tail as there was a shadow of a chance—the mule objecting in every known way of a mule, and in some ways until then unexhibited.

"Jack, oh mare amabilijee," said Hardy, the first engineer of the Wachusetts, "and you'll ride easier."

"Captain," quoth old Salty, "this is the first craft that I was ever in command of, and it is a pity if I can't stay on the quarter-deck."

A lady, who was very modest and submissive before marriage, was observed by a friend to use her tongue pretty freely afterward. "There was a time when I almost imagined she had none." "Yes," said the husband, with a sigh, "but it's very long since."

Laugh at no man for his pug nose; you can never tell what will run up.

We wonder if any body ever picked up a tear that was dropped.

O'Brien said to Horne Tooke, on the hustings, "So I understand you have all the blackguards in London with you." "I am happy to have it, Sir, on such good authority."

"Mrs Brown, I have been to learn how to tell fortunes," said a young man to a brisk brunette. Just give me your hand." "La, Mr. White, how sudden you are!"

EPITAPH ON A MR. MORE.

Here lies one More, and no more than he;
One More, and no more, how can that be?
Why, one More and no more may well lie here alone:
But here lies one More, and that's more than one.

WHAT DAVID MIGHT HAVE DONE IN ENGLAND.—A Scotch minister, very homely in his address, once for his text a passage from the Psalms—"I said in my haste, All men are liars." "Ay," promised his reverence by way of introduction, "ye said it in your haste, David, did ye? Gin ye had been here ye might have said it at your leisure, mon."

What is every body doing at the same time?—Growing older.

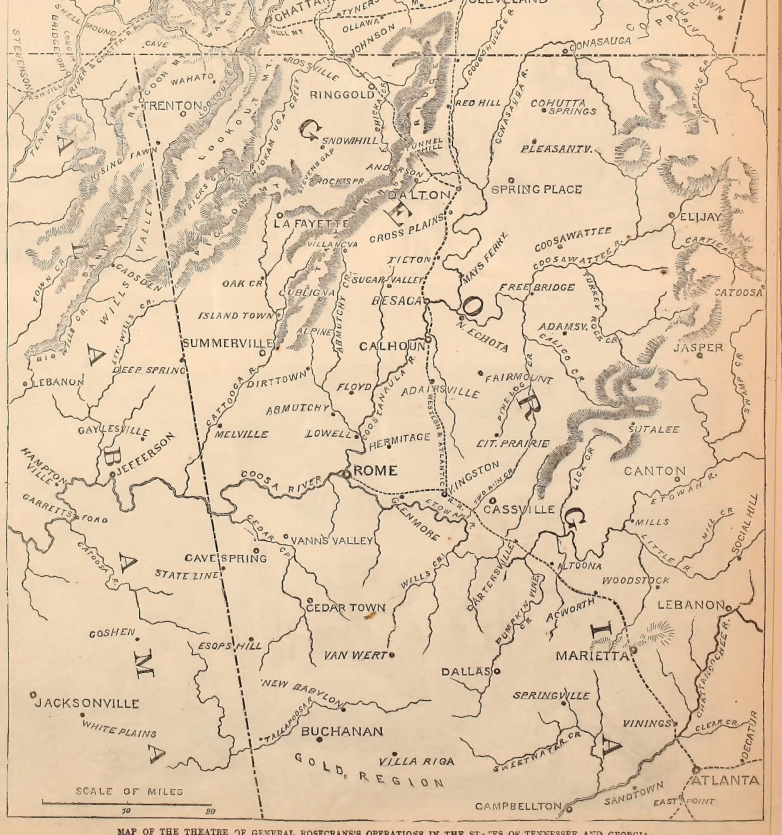
A gentleman replied to a female Irish vagrant who accosted him that he never gave to beggars in the street. "If I knew where your Honor lived," quickly responded the woman, "I'd be after calling at your house, and then I shouldn't interfere with your arrangements."

A country youth, who had returned home from London, was asked by his anxious father if he had been gravitated in his conduct while there. "Oh yes," was the reply, "I was guarded by two policemen part of the time."

A way says that in journeying lately he was put into an omnibus with a dozen persons of whom he did not know a single one. Turning a corner shortly after, however, the omnibus was upset; "and then," said he, "I found them all out."

A Quaker, upon being asked why he did not venture to go to an election, at which the proceedings were very riotously conducted, and give his vote, replied: "Friend, I do not see why I should endanger my own poll to benefit another man's."

"Will you take the life of Pierce or Scott this morning, madam?" said a newspaper boy to good Aunt Betsy. "No, my lad," she replied, "they may live to the end of their days for all of me—I've nothing agin 'em."



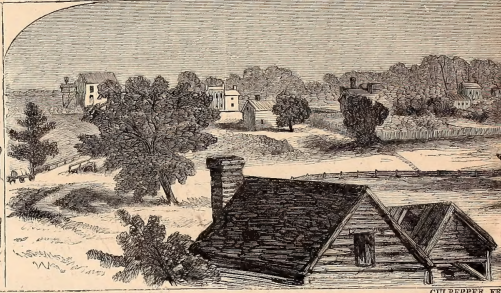
A windy orator once got up and said—"Sir, after much reflection, considerations, and examination, I have calmly, and deliberately, and carefully come to the determined conclusion, that in those cities where the population is very large, there are a greater number of men, women, and children than in cities where the population is less."

"What do you mean, you little rascal?" exclaimed an individual to an impudent youth that had seized him by the nose in the street. "Oh, nothing; only I was going out to suck my fortune, and father told me to be sure to seize hold of the first thing that turned up."

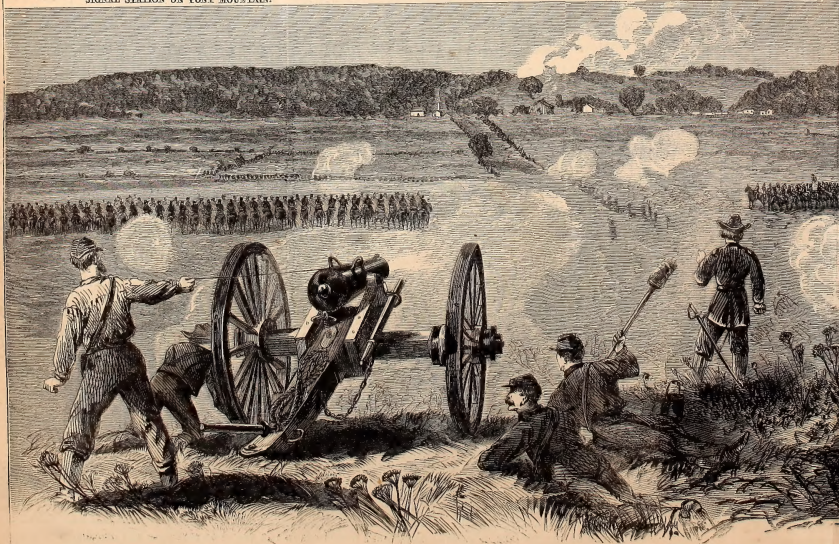
A lady who prided herself upon her extreme sensibility, said one day to her butcher, "How can you follow such a cruel profession? Ah! how can you kill the poor little innocent lambs?" "Madam?" cried the astonished butcher, "would you prefer cooking them alive?"

I remember years a philanthropist the case of an old woman of the back of Bleecker Street, who lived in a house just opposite a gully-hole; and when I questioned her as to the smell, she replied: "No, Sir, there isn't no smell; there has been a deal of sickness about, and I have lost my cat; but I am resigned to it, and don't mind it."

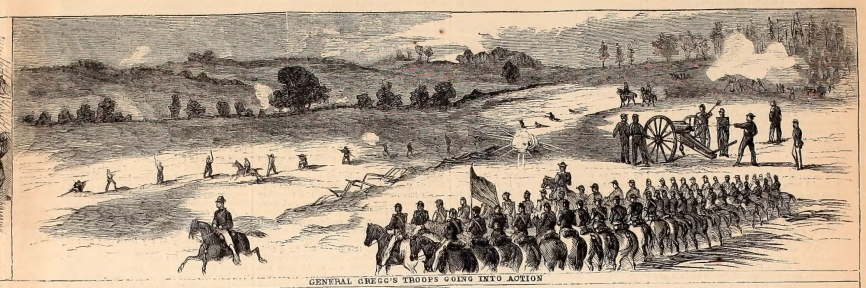
What part of speech is kissing?—It is a conjunction.



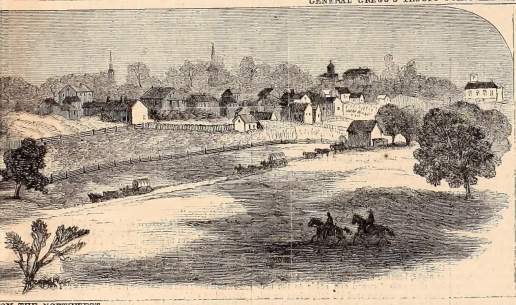
MAP OF THE THEATRE OF GENERAL ROSECRANS'S OPERATIONS IN THE STATES OF TENNESSEE AND GEORGIA.



GENERAL CUSTER CHARGING UP THE HILL UPON THE ENEMY'S GUNS.



SIGNAL STATION ON PONY MOUNTAIN.



CULPEPPER FR

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GENERAL BUFORD ATTACKING THE ENEM

GENERAL GREGG'S TROOPS GOING INTO ACTION

OM THE NORTHWEST.

BUTLER'S BATTERY GOING INTO POSITION.

IY AT RACCOON FORD, SEPTEMBER 14, 1863.—Sketched by A. R. Ward.—[See Page 635.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

At two o'clock an attendant stole on tip-toe to the strong room, unlocked the door and peeped cautiously in. Seeing the dangerous maniac quiet, he entered with a plate of lukewarm beef and potatoes, and told him bluntly to eat. The crushed one said he could not eat. "You must," said the man. "Eat!" said Alfred; "of what do you think I am made? Pray put it down and listen to me. Ill give you a hundred pou nds to let me out of this place; two hundred; three."

A coarse laugh greeted this proposal. "You might as well have made it a thousand when you was about it."

"So I will," said Alfred, eagerly, "and thank you on my knees besides. Ah, I see you don't believe I have money. I give you my honor I have ten thousand pounds: it was settled on me by my grandfather, and I came of age last week."

"Oh that's like enough," said the man, carelessly. "Well you are green. Do you think them as sent you here will let you spend your money? Why, your money is theirs now."

And he sat down with the plate on his knee, and began to eat the meat in small pieces; while his careless words entered Alfred's heart, and gave him such a glimpse of sinister motives and dark acts to come as set him shuddering.

"Come, none of that," said the man, suspecting his manner of thought it was the prologue to some desperate action—for all a chained madman does is read upon this plan; his terror passes for rage, his very sobs for snarls.

"Oh, by your mother's life, my kind Alfred, imploringly: "do you think it is to steal my money the wretch has stolen my liberty?"

"What with?"

"My father."

"I know nothing about it," said the man, sullenly: "I was not in charge when you were locked up; when young gents like you come to be took care of. But you mustn't go thinking of that, or you'll excite yourself again; come, eat your victiles like a Christian, and no more about it."

"Leave it, that is a good fellow; and then I'll try and eat a little by-and-by. But my grief is great—oh Julia! Julia!—what shall I do? And I am not used to eat at this time. Will you, my good fellow?"

"Will I will, now you behave like a gentleman," said the man.

Then Alfred coaxed him to take off the handcuffs. He refused, but eaded by doing it; and so left him.

Four more leaden hours rolled by, and then this same attendant (his name was Brown) brought him tea. It was cold, and seemed to his parched throat; he drank it, and ate a mouthful of the meat to please the man, and even asked for some more tea.

At eight four keepers came into his room, undressed him, compelled him to make his toilet, etc., before them, which put him to a shame —being a gentleman—almost as much as it would a woman: they then hobbled him, and fastened his wrists to his bed, and put his hands into muffles, but did not confine his body; because they had lost a lucrative lodger only a month ago, throttled at night in a strait-waistcoat.

Alfred lay in this plight and compared with anguish unspeakable his joyful anticipations of this night with the strange and cruel reality. "My wedding-night! my wedding-night!" he cried aloud, and burst into a passion of grief.

By-and-by he consoled himself a little with the hope that he could not long be incarcerated as a madman, being sane; and his good wit told him his only chance was calmness. He would go to sleep and compose himself to bear his wrongs with dignity, and quietly baffle his enemies.

Just as he was dropping off he felt something crawl over his face. Instinctively he made a violent motion to put his hands up. Both hands were confined, he could not move them. He bounded, he flung, he writhed. His fiendish persecutors were quick a moment, but the next they began again: in vain he rolled and writhed, and shuddered at the loathing inexpressible, the crawled, they smelt, they bit.

Many a night since little wretches had distracted with the very sleeplessness the mad-house professed to cure, not create. In conjunction with the night attendant, and the night doctor of Silverton House, they had driven many a feeble mind across the line that divides the weak and nervous from the unsound.

When he found there was no help, Alfred clenched his teeth and bore it:—"Bite on, my little wretches," he said: "bite on, and divert my mind from deeper stings than yours—if you can."

And they did; a little.

Thus passed the night in mental agony, and bodily irritation and disgust. At daybreak the fosters on his flesh rested, and utterly worn out and exhausted he sank into a deep sleep.

At half-past eight the head keeper came in more came in, and made him dress before them. They handcuffed him, and took him down to breakfast in the noisy ward; set him down on a little bench by the wall like a naughty boy, and ordered a dangerous maniac to feed him.

The dangerous maniac obeyed, and went and sat beside Alfred with a basin of thick gruel and a great wooden spoon. He shoveled the gruel down his charge's throat mighty superciliously from the very first; and presently, falling into some favorite and absorbing train of thought, he flung his arm on woney and handed him the spoon full over his left shoulder with such rapidity and recklessness that it was more like sowing than feeding. Alfred cried out, "Quarter! I can't eat so fast as that, old fellow."

Something in his tone struck the maniac: he looked at Alfred full; Alfred looked at him in return, and smiled kindly but sadly.

"Hallo!" cried the maniac.

"What's up now?" said a keeper, fiercely.

"Why this man is sane. As sane as I am."

At this there was a hoarse laugh.

"Sane," pursued the maniac; "for I am a little queer at times you know."

"And no mistake, Jemmy. Now what makes you think he is sane?"

"Looked me full in the face, and smiled at me."

"Oh that is your test, is it?"

"Yes it is. You try it on any of those mad beggars there and see what you get for it."

"Who invented gunpowder?" said one of the insulted persons, looking as sly and malicious as a magpie going to steal.

Jemmy exploded directly: "I did, ye rascal, ye liar, ye rogue, ye Baconian!" and going higher, and more incoherent in this strain, was very soon handcuffed with Alfred's handcuffs, and seated on Alfred's bench and tied to two rings in the wall. On this the martial order went down to zero: "Here is treatment, Sir," said he, piteously, to Alfred. "I see you are a gentleman, and you look at this. All spite and jealousy; because I invented that invaluable substance, which has done so much to prolong human life and alleviate human misery."

Alfred was now ordered to feed Jemmy, which he did: so quickly were their parts reinverted.

Directly after breakfast Alfred demanded to see the proprietor of the house.

Answer: doesn't live here.

The Doctor then.

Oh, he has not come.

This monstrosity irritated Alfred. "Well then," said he, "whoever it is that rules this den of iniquity. Send me here one or other of 'em."

"I rule in Mr. Baker's absence," said the head keeper, "and I'll teach you manners, you young blackguard. Send for you!"

In five minutes Alfred was handcuffed and flung into a padded room.

"Now there till you know how to speak to your betters," said the head keeper.

Alfred looked up and down, grinding his teeth with rage for five long hours.

Just before dinner Brown came and took him into a parlor, where Mrs. Archbold was seated writing. Brown retired. The lady finished what she was doing, and kept Alfred standing like a schoolboy going to be whipped. At last she said, "I have sent for you to give you a piece of advice: it is to try and make friends with the attendants."

"Me make friends with the scoundrels I detest for their lives. Oh, madam, I fear I shall ill conceal my hate."

"Foolish boy; they are too strong for you. Your worst enemies could wish nothing worse for you than you have already provided them." In saying these words she was so much more kind and womanly that Alfred conceived hopes and burst out, "O, madam, you are human then: you seem to pity me: pray give me pen and paper, and let me write to my friends to get me out of this terrible place at once, I beg you me."

Mrs. Archbold resumed her distant manner without apparent effort: she said nothing, but she placed writing materials before her. She then left the room and locked him in.

He wrote a few lines of entreaty to Julia, telling her how he had been entrapped, but not a word about his sufferings—he was too generous to give her needless pain—and to Mr. Edward imploring him to come at once with a lawyer and an honest physician, and liberate him.

Mrs. Archbold came down often, and he asked her if she would lend him sealing-wax. "I dare not trust to an envelope in such a place as this," said he, "but I have writing-paper."

"But how am I to post it?" said he.

"Easily; there is a box in the house; I will carry your letter."

She took him and showed him the box: he put his letters into it, and in the ardor of his gratitude kissed her hand: she turned a little and said, "Mind, this is not by my advice; I would never tell you friends I had been in a mad-house of, never. I would be content to live here with the servants—they are the real masters—and never let a soul know where I was rescued from."

"Oh, you don't know my Julia," said Alfred; "she will never desert me, never think the worse of me because I have been entrapped illegally into a mad-house."

"Illegally, Mr. Hardie! you deceive yourself; Mr. Baker has the order, and it was signed by a relation, and the certificates by first-rate lunacy doctors."

"What on earth has that to do with it, madam, when I am as sane as you are?"

"It has every thing to do with it. Mr. Baker could be punished for confining a madman in this house without an order and two certificates; but he couldn't for confining a sane person under an order and the two certificates."

Alfred could not believe this, but she convinced him that it was so.

Then he began to fear he should be imprisoned for years: he turned pale, and looked at her so imploringly, that for the first time she told him sane people were not kept in asylums now; they only used to

"How can they?" said she. "The London asylums are visited four times a year by the commissioners, and the country asylums six times, twice by the commissioners, and four times by the justices. We shall be inspected this week or next; and then you can speak to the justices; they are not like me, mistake; offer testimony; and ask either to be discharged at once or to save a commission of lunacy sit on you; ten to one your friends will not face public proceedings: but you must begin at the foundation, by making the servants friendly—and by—being calm." She then fixed her large gray eye on him and said, "Now, if I let you dine with me and the first-class patients, will you pledge me your honor to 'be calm,' and not attempt to escape?" Alfred hesitated at that. Her eye dissected his character at the time. "I promise," said he at last, with a sigh, "on my honor." Will you? There is something so repugnant in the very idea of mad people.

"Try and remember it is their misfortune, not their crime," said Mrs. Archbold, just like a matronly sister admonishing a brother from school.

She then whistled in a whisper for Brown, who was lurking in the passage all the time. He emerged and walked about with Alfred, and, by-and-by, looking down from a corridor, they saw Mrs. Archbold driving the second-class woman before her to dinner like a flock of animals. Whenever one stopped to look at any thing, or try and get a word with the unfortunate Archbold went at her just like a shepherd's dog at a refractory sheep, caught her by the shoulders, and drove her scrambling forward.

At dinner Alfred was so fortunate as to sit opposite a gentleman who nodded and grinned and talked to him in a horrible leer. His words not, however, enjoy this to the full for a little distraction at his elbow: his right-hand neighbor kept calling him out of his turn, and substituting others from his own; there was even a tendency to grimace in the latter. After tremendous pressure, the gentleman Alfred bore a minute, then recommenced; Alfred laid a hand very gently on his wrist and put it back. Mrs. Archbold's quick eye surprised this gesture: "What is the matter there?" said she.

"Oh, nothing, madam," replied Alfred: "only this gentleman does me the honor to prefer the contents of my plate to his own."

"Mr. Cooper, you are a troublesome man."

Cooper, the head keeper, pounced on the offender, seized him roughly by the collar, dragged him from his chair, bundled his chair under it, and bundled him out of the room with ignominy and fracas, in spite of a remonstrance from Alfred, "Oh, don't be so rough with the poor man."

Then the orderly laid down his knife and fork, and ate no more. "I am grieved at my irritable nature in complaining of such a trifle," said he, when all was quiet.

The company stared considerably at this remark; it seemed to them a most morbid perversion of sentiment. On the deranged, thinskinned beyond conception in their own persons, and alive to the shadow of the shade of a wrong, are stoically indifferent to the woes of others.

Though Alfred was quiet as a lamb all day, the attendants preferred him to the padded room at night, because he had been there last night; but they only fastened one ankle to the bedpost: to his great surprise his Lilliputians on ordinarily fair terms—numbers excepted; they swarmed. Unable to sleep he rose and groped for his clothes. But they were outside the door, according to rule.

He had no resource but to walk about instead of lying down.

Day broke at last: and he took his breakfast quietly with the first-class patients. It consists in all cases of tea, bread and butter, instead of tea and table-spoons instead of tea-spoons; and thick slices of stale bread thinly buttered. A few patients had great bowls of porridge instead of tea. After breakfast Alfred sat in the first-class patients' room for nearly three minutes and the hours till Edward should come. After dinner he counted the hours till tea-time. Nobody came; and he went to bed in such grief and disappointment as some men live to eighty without ever knowing.

But when the o'clock came next day, and no Edward, and no reply, then the distress of his soul deepened. He implored Mrs. Archbold to tell him what was the matter. She shook her head and said, gravely, it was but too common; a man's nearest and dearest were very apt to hold aloof from him the moment he was put into such a prison.

Here an old lady put in her word. "Ah, Sir, you must not expect to hear from any body in this place. Why, I have been two years writing and writing, and can't get a line from my own daughter, and I am sure she is a fine lady now, but it was her poor neglected mother that pinched and pinched to give her a good education, and that brought and bought a good husband. But it's my belief the post in our hall isn't a real post; it's a sham, and I'll tell it to your retrived so as the letters fall down a pipe into that Baker's hands, and so then when the postman comes—"

The Archbold bent her bushy brows on this chatty personage. "Be quiet, Mrs. Dent; you are talking most mischievously and wrongly: you know you are not to speak on that topic. Take care."

The poor old woman was shut up like a knife; for the Archbold had a way of addressing her own sex that crushed them. The change was almost equally sudden to the mellow tones in which she addressed Alfred the very next moment, on the very same subject: "Mr. Baker, I believe, sees the letters: and, where our poor patients (with a glance at Dent) write in such a way as to move and perplex—very those who are in reality their best friends, it is not always sent. But I conclude your letters have gone, you find you can be calm, why not ask Mr. Baker? He is in the house now; for a wonder."

Alfred promised to be calm; and she got him an interview with Mr. Baker.

He was a full-blown pawnbroker of Silverton town, whom the legislature, with that keen knowledge of human nature which marks the British senate, permitted, and still permits, to speculate in Insanity, stipulating however that the upper servant of all in his asylum should be a doctor; but omitting to provide against the instant dismissal of the said doctor should he go and rob his employer of a ledger—by carving a patient.

As you are not the British legislature, I need not tell you that this pawnbroker insanity mattered nothing, nor sanity: his trade lay in catching, and keeping, and stinting, as many lunatics, and as sane, as he could find.

There are certain formulæ in these quiet retreats, which naturally impose upon green-horns such as Alfred certainly was, and many visiting justices and lunacy commissioners would seem to be. Baker had been a lodging-house keeper for certified people many years, and knew all the formulæ: some call them dodges: but these must surely be vulgar minds.

Baker had: "and the see-saw formula:"

"Letters, young gentleman?" said he: "they are not in my department. They go into the surgery, and are passed by the doctor, except those he examines and orders to be detained."

Alfred demanded the doctor.

"He is gone," was the reply. (Formula.)

Alfred found it as hard to be calm, as some people find it easy to say the words over the wrongs of others.

The next day, but not till the afternoon, he caught the doctor. "My letters, Sir!" said he, "you have not been so cruel as to intercept them."

"I intercept no letters," said the doctor, as if astonished at the very idea: "I see who writes them, and hand them to Mr. Baker, with now and then a remark. If any are detained, the responsibility rests with him."

"He says it rests with you."

"Then you have misunderstood him."

"Not at all, Sir. One thing is clear; my letters have been stolen either by him or you; and I will know which."

The doctor parried with a formula.

"You are excited, Mr. Hardie. Be calm, Sir, be calm: or you will be two months the longer."

All Alfred obtained by this interview was a powerful opiate. The head keeper brought it him in bed, and refused to take it. The man whistled, and the room filled with keepers.

"Now," said Cooper, "down with it, or you'll have to be dosed with this cup and horn."

"You had better take it, Sir," said Brown; "the doctor has ordered it, you."

"The doctor? Well, let me see the doctor about it."

"He is gone."

"He never ordered it me," said Alfred. Then fixing his eyes sternly on Cooper, "You miscreants, you want to poison me. No, I will not take it. Stand off, murder!"

Then ensued a struggle, on which I draw a veil: the keepers won the day, with the help of handcuffs and cord-bonds.

Brown went and told Mrs. Archbold, and what Alfred had said about

"Don't be alarmed," said that strong-minded lady: "it is only one of the old fool's composing draughts. It will spoil the night's sleep for one night, that is all. Go to him the first thing in the morning."

Alfred's draught Alfred was seized with a violent headache and fever: toward morning he was light-headed, and Brown found him loud and furious: but only he returned with to an expression Mr. Brown had never heard before—

"Justifiable parricide. Justifiable parricide. Justifiable parricide."

Most people dislike new phrases. Brown ran to consult Mrs. Archbold about this one. After the elderly inquisitor took from her cap to read a morning wrapper; and they found Alfred leaning over the bed and bleeding violently at the nose. They were a good deal alarmed, and tried to stop it; but Alfred was quite sensible now, and would not let them touch him.

"I can manage to see now," he said: "a little while ago I was blind with the poison."

They understood him, and he made him comfortable, and Mrs. Archbold sent Brown for a cup of strong coffee and a glass of brandy. He took them, and then begged for a little rice a deep sleep that lasted till tea-time. This sleep the poor doctor ascribed to the sedative effect of the opiate. But it was the natural consequent on the morbid excitement caused by his cursed opiate.

Brown, said Mrs. Archbold, "if Dr. Bailey prescribes again, let me know. He shan't quaare this patient with his certificate while I am here."

Dr. Bailey was a learned, and more dangerous, animal; he was a fool.

The farrago he had administered would have done no harm to a man in health, but no great harm. It was dangerous to a sane man: and Alfred to the naked eye was a sane man. But Dr. John Bailey had asked and got: he had been twenty years at M.D. The certificates of Wycherley and Spears were produced to him, and the two-seventy green seal—wherever he looked at Alfred Hardie.

Perhaps in time he will forget these certificates, and, like the spiculæ dropping off, he will see Alfred is sane. If he does, he will publish him as one of his most remarkable cures.

Meanwhile the whole treatment of this illstarred young gentleman gravitated toward insanity. The inner mind was exasperated by barefaced injustice, and oppression: above all by his letters being stopped: for that convinced him both Baker and Bailey, with their see-saw evasions, knew he was sane, and dreaded a visit from honest, understanding men: and the mind's external sense, the brain, which an acute professes to soothe, was steadily undermined by artificial sleeplessness. A man can't sleep in irons till he is used to them: and when Alfred was relieved of these, his sleep was still driven away by biting insects and barking dogs, two spaniels provided in many of these placid Retreats, with a view to the permanence, rather than the comfort, of the lodgers.

On the eighth day Alfred succeeded at last in an object he had steadily pursued for some time: he caught the two sea-saw humbugs together.

"Now, gentlemen," he, "you say by your letters, and he says it is you who do it. Which is the truth?"

They were staggered, and he followed up his advantage: "Look me in the face, gentlemen, and say it." And, as they turn their heads away. You can only tell this barefaced lie behind my back. Do you believe in God, and in a hereafter to come? If you can not release me, at least don't be such scoundrels as to stop my letters, and so swindle me out of a fair trial, an open, public trial."

The doctor parried with a formula. "Publicity would be the greatest misfortune could befall you. Pray be calm."

Now, as asylum is a place not entirely exempt from prejudice; and one of them is that any sort of appeal to God Almighty is a sign or else forerunner of maniacal excitement.

These humbugs forged their fact by stopping letters, evading public trials, and, in a word, cutting off all appeals to justice, they could compel the patient to turn his fighting eye and lift his despairing voice to Him, whose eye alone can ever really penetrate these dark shades.

Accordingly the patient who appealed to God above a system in Silverton Grange was deemed to get excited directly. And the tranquilizing influences employed were morphia, croton oil, or a blister.

The keeper came to Alfred in his room "Doctor has ordered a blister."

"What for? Send for him directly."

"He is gone."

This way of ordering torture and then coolly going away dazed Alfred beyond endurance. Though he knew he should soon be powerless, he shoved right: made his mark as usual on a couple of his zealous attendants, got to the landing room to work in, was soon overpowered, hobbled and handcuffed: then they cut off his hair, and put a large blister on the top of his head.

The obstinate brute declined to go mad. They began to respect him for this tenacity of purpose; a decent bedroom was allotted him, his pomatum and bag were brought him, and he was let walk every day on the lawn with a keeper, only there were no ladders left in sight, and the trap-door was locked; i. e. the iron gate.

On one of these occasions he heard the gatekeeper within three times summon one of the attendant followed suit, and hurried Alfred into the house, which soon rang with treble signals.

"What is it?" inquired Alfred.

"The visiting justices are in sight: go into your room, please."

"Yes, I'll go," said Alfred, affecting cheerful compliance, and the man ran off.

The whole house was in a furious bustle. All the hobbles, and chains, and instruments of restraint, were hastily collected and bundled out of sight, and clean sheets were put on the harshest attendants began practicing pleasant looks and kind words on the patients, to get them to try it, so that it ought to appear all too abrupt and startle the patients visibly under the visitors' eyes: something like actors working up a facial sentiment at the top of the bill, ere due display, or like a race-horse's preliminary canter. Alfred's heart beat with joy inexpressible. He had only to keep calm, and this was the last day at Silverton Grove. The first thing he did was to make a powerful toilet.

The stinginess of relations, and the greed of mad-house proprietors, makes many a patient look ten times madder than he is, in point of dress. Clothes wear out in an asylum, and are not always taken off, though Agriculture has long and justly claimed them for her own. In a word it is no longer possible to refuse the Reverend Mad Tom or Mrs. Crazy Jane some new raiment, then colossal enormous munificence that crowns the Poole or Elise, but others to paternal or maternal wardrobes, and even to the ancestral chest, like old oak chests, simply:

"Poor things, they are out of the world: what need for them to be in the fashion!" (Formula.)

This arrangement keeps the bump of self-esteem down, especially in women, and so cooperates with many other little arrangements to perpetuate the lodger.

Silverton Grove in particular was supplied with the grotesque in dress from an inexhaustible source; whenever money was sent Baker to buy a patient a suit, he went from his lunacy shop to his pawnbroker's, dived headlong into unredeemed pledges, dressed his patient as gentlemen are dressed to reside in cherry-trees; and pocketed five hundred per cent. on the double transaction. Now Alfred had already observed that many of the patients looked madder than they were—thanks to short trousers and petticoats, hobby jackets, ear-obstructing and befrilled bosoms, shoes made for, and declined by, the very infantry; coats short in the waist and long in the sleeves, coal-scuttle bonnets, and grandmaternal caps. So he made his toilet with rare, and put his best hat on to hide his shaven crown. He then kept his door ajar, and waited for a chance of speaking to the justices. One soon came; a portly old gentleman, with a rubicund face and honest eye, walked slowly along the corridor, looking as wise as he could, cringed on by Cooper and Dr. Bailey; the latter had arrived post-haste, and Baker had been sent for.

Alfred came out, touched his hat respectfully, and begged a private interview with the magistrate. The old gentleman bowed politely, for Alfred's dress, address, and countenance left no suspicion of insanity possible in an unprejudiced mind.

But the Doctor whispered in his ear, "Take care, Sir. Dangerous!"

Alfred this is one of the most effective of the formulæ in a private asylum. How can an inexperienced stranger know for certain that such a statement is a falsehood? and even the truth not love justice—to others—quite so well as they love their own skins. So Squire Tollett very naturally declined a private interview with Alfred; and even drew back a step, and felt uneasy at being so near him. An honest man does not whisper," said he. "Do not let him poison your mind against me. I am as sane as you are, and he knows it. Pray, pray use your own eyes, and ears, Sir, and give yourself a chance of discovering the truth in this strong-hold of lies."

"Don't excite yourself, Mr. Hardie," put in the Doctor, parentally, "excitement."

"Don't you interrupt me, Doctor; I am as calm as you are. Calmer; for, see, you are pale at this moment with fear that your own wickedness in detaining a sane man here is going to be exposed. Oh, Sir," said he, turning to the justice, "fear not for me, I have not even angry words; my misery is too deep for irritation or excitement. I am the victim of a plot—a piece of diabolical villainy. Mr. Alfred Hardie, a Reform and Ireland scholar. But, unfortunately for me, my mother left me ten thousand pounds, and a house in Dublin, in her own name I will not pollute by mentioning it in this den of thieves. My father is the well-known banker, banking-house, Hardie and Hardie, Dublin. He has wasted his own money, and now covets his neighbor's and his son's. He had me entrapped here on my wedding-day, to get hold of my money, and rob me of her I love. I appeal to you, Sir, to discharge me; or, if you have not so much confidence in me, to take whatever steps is to do that, then I demand a commission of lunacy and a public inquiry."

Dr. Bailey said, "That would be a most unpleasurable exposure, both to yourself and your friends." (Formula.)

"It is only the guilty who fear the light, Sir," was the swift reply.

Mr. Tollett said he thought the patient had a legal right to a commission of lunacy if there was property, and he took note of the application. He then asked Alfred if he had any complaint to make of the way he was being treated.

"Sir," said Alfred, "I leave those complaints to the insane ones: with me the sympathetic wire drives out the petty worries. I can not feel my stings for my deep wound."

"Oh, then, you admit you are not treated unkindly here?"

"I admit nothing of the kind, Sir. I merely decline to institute a correspondence with petty injuries, when you are good enough to inquire into a monstrous one."

"But Mr. Hardie is very sensible and considerate," said Mr. Tollett. "I will see you, Sir, again before we leave."

With this promise Alfred was obliged to be content. He retired respectfully, and the justice said, "He seems as sane as I am." The doctor nodded. The justice observed it, and not aware that this smile was a formula, as much so as a prize-fighter's or a ballet-dancer's, thought it right to differ. "I am not a physician, then added who had signed the certificates.

"Dr. Wycherley for one."

"Dr. Wycherley? that is a great authority."

"One of the greatest in the country, Sir."

"Oh then one would think he must be more or less deranged."

"Dangerously so at times. But in his lucid intervals you never saw a more quiet, gentlemanly creature." (Formula.)

"How sad!"

"Very, Sir: it is my most interesting patient (Formula), though terribly violent at times. Would you like to see the medical journal Dr. Bailey?"

"Yes; by-and-by."

The inspection then continued: the inspector admired the clean appearance of the bed sacks, all of them dirty, some filthy; and asked the more reasonable patients in a special friendly way if they had any complaints to make. This question being with the usual sagacity of public inspectors put in the plural number. Cooper and the Doctor, who stuck to Tollett like wax, the mad people all declared they were very kindly treated; the justice, seeing that no information was this; they knew by experience that, if they told the truth, the justices could not at once remedy their wrongs, and would be off, and then the very moment the justices left the house, would knock them down, beat them, shake them, strait-jacket them, and starve them; and the Doctor, less merciful, would doctor them. So they shook in their shoes, and vowed they were very comfortable in Silverton Grove.

Thus, in later days, certain Commissioners of Lunacy inspecting Accomb House, extracted nothing from Mrs. Turner but that she was happy and comfortable under the benignant sway of Mr. Nicholls the proprietor. Which it was only by a miracle the public learned the truth; and miracles are rare.

Meantime, Alfred had a mitigating. The plausible Doctor had now Squire Tollett's ear, and Tollett was old, and something about him reminded the Octonian of a trait his friend Horace had detected in old age:

Vel quod res omnes timidè gelidè que ministrat.

Dilator, spe longus, iners, etc.

He knew there was another justice in the house, but he knew also he should not be allowed to see speech with him, if by cunning or force it could be prevented. He kept his door ajar. Presently nurse Hannah came bustling along with an apron full of things, and let herself into a vacant room hard by. This Hannah was a young woman with a pretty and rather babyish face, divorced from a thick beery nature in her form that a blacksmith need not have blushed for. And I suspect it was this masculine charm, and not her feminine features, that had won her the confidence of Baker and Co., and the respect of his female patients; big or little, excited or not excited, there was not one of them this bicipital baby-face could not pin by the wrists, and twist her helpless into a strong room.

Alfred crossed her unaided in a moment; and she did it too, on slight provocation. Nurse Hannah seldom came into Alfred's part of the house; but, when she did meet him, she generally gave him a kind look in passing; and he had received leave to speak to her, and try if persuasion, or her conscience, or move her pity. He saw what she was at, but was too politic to detect her spying eye and ear. He drew her into a window, and said, softly, "Nurse Hannah! Are you there?"

"Yes, I am here," said she, sharply, and came out of the room hastily; and shut it. "What do you want, Sir?"

Alfred raised his hands together. "If you are a woman, have pity on me."

She was taken by surprise. "What can I do?" said she, in a softened tone. "I am only a servant."

"At least tell me where I can find the Visiting Justice, before the keepers stop me."

"Hush! Speak lower," said Hannah. "You have compassion on a poor girl, Sir."

"Yes. But he seems a feeble old fogy. Where is the other? Oh, pray tell me."

"I mustn't; I mustn't. In the noisy ward. There, run."

Ahh run he did.

Alfred was lucky enough to get safe into the noisy ward without being intercepted, and then he encountered a sunburnt gentleman, under the influence of a pipe and a morning-whip in his hand: it was Mr. Vane, a Tory squire and huge landowner in the county.

Now, as Alfred looked at one door, Baker himself came in at the other, and they nearly met at Vane. But Alfred saluted him first, and begged audience of Mr. Vane, his countenance changed. But this time Alfred overheard the formula, and said, quietly: "Don't believe him, Sir. I am not dangerous; I am as sane as any man in England. Pray examine me, and judge for yourself."

"Ah, that is his delusion," said Baker. "Come, Mr. Hardie, I allow you great liberties, but you must not make many more, and monopolize his Worship with your fancies. Consider, Sir, you are not the only patient he has to examine."

Alfred's heart sank; he turned a look of silent agony on Mr. Vane.

Mr. Vane, quite touched by that look, or irritated by Baker's pragmatical interference, or perhaps both, looked that person coolly in the face, and said, gravely: "Hold your tongue, Sir, and let the gentleman speak to me."

THE RUSSIAN FRIGATE "OSLIABA."

On page 637 we publish an illustration of the RUSSIAN FRIGATE "OSLIABA," now lying in our port. She is one of the fleet which has been sent to visit the United States, and her advent has created considerable interest. Her officers have been officially invited to accept the hospitalities of the city; and Mrs. Lincoln, General Dix, commanding the Department, and other leading personages have visited her. We condense the following account of the Oslioba from the Herald report:

The Oslioba is a screw propeller frigate, but does not now mount her full complement of guns. She carries at present thirty-two guns (sixty-eight-pounders), and is mounted at a pivot on the forecastle deck. The gun is manufactured with a breech-loading apparatus, on the same caliber, and consequently, in time of action, there is no confusion between the various kinds of cartridges and projectiles.

The rigging and sparring of the Oslioba do not materially differ from vessels of the same class in our own navy, save that there are more ropes and fewer sails in every where displayed. The ship herself is well built, and looks as if she could ride out a hard gale. Among the other various appointments we noticed that she has a beautiful little steam launch, which is a very handy appendage to the ship. It saves time and much hard work on the main.

The Russian navy has been for some time past in process of reorganization and improvement by judicious and naval progress, which are to regild and to different from a former years.

The latest data of the naval forces of Russia say she has in the Baltic, Lesser River, White, Caspian, and Black seas, and Lake Ural, one hundred and twenty-two vessels of the line being eleven-decline, and thirteen frigates. Together they mount 2346 guns, and are manned by 350 officers, 453 sub-officers, and 19,450 seamen. Before the war with the Allies Russia possessed two squadrons, of about equal power, one stationed in the Black Sea and the other in the Baltic. Each carried about 20,000 seamen, and when half the crews were on furlough and artificers' leave the aggregate number of guns was between 8000 and 9000. Since the close of the war Russia has made great improvements in her naval force. Mr. Webb, of this city, has built for her about the largest screw frigate afloat. And they have added largely to their navy by vessels built at their own navy-yards.

The iron-clad excitement in this country aroused Russia, and she is now engaged in building a fleet of ironclads. In March of this year no less than four million pounds sterling had been appropriated for that purpose.

The personnel of the Russian navy includes sixteen admirals, thirty vice-admirals, thirty-nine rear-admirals, one hundred and eleven first-class captains, ninety-five second-class captains, two hundred and fifty-seven lieutenant-captains, six hundred and seven lieutenants, and three hundred and ninety-six midshipmen. The marine corps comprises about three hundred officers. The Emperor has a naval staff consisting of two rear-admirals, one captain, and seven aides-de-camp. The chief engineer is a master of naval artillery, an inspector of naval artillery, and a director of marine chancery and naval affairs. The ministry of marine includes a council of ten admirals, a presbyter, and ten clerks.

But to return to the Oslioba. She is manned by four hundred and fifty men and twelve artillerymen, who look hearty, and as if when called upon they might be able to do good service in the event of battle. They are a pleasant looking set, and no doubt will be the hero of our harbor for ten days to come.

The following is a list of the officers of the ship:

Captain—Boutakoff.

Lieutenants—Stoffel, Arinoff, Ermolieff, Valitzky, De Livron, Furuhelm, Evreinoff, Kroun.

Sub-Lieutenants—Amenoff, Rudnetzkoff, Tenteleff, Chapelkin, Kolomeitzoff, Kolomeitzoff, Boetzin, Zlatkovitch, Tudeer, Stramikoff.

Lieutenant of Artillery—Kondratieff.

Surgeons—Hyrutzevitch, Holst.

Master—Semenoff.

Second Master—Trapeznikoff.

Assistant—Kolomeitzoff.

Engineers—Polocaroff, Tihonoff, Tetenkoff, Ivanoff, Murray.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We devote pages 632, 633, and 636 to the Army of the Potomac. Mr. Waud, the author of the sketches which we reproduce, writes:

"CULPEPPER, Friday, September 18.

"Your artist was the only person connected with newspapers permitted to go upon the recent advance to the Rapidan. An order of General Meade's sent all the reporters back. It was a very small unconducive trip part of the time. I did not get dry for two days; and was shot at into the bargain, at Beacon Ford, where I unwarrantably left the cover and became a target for about twenty of the sharp-shooters. Luckily I was not touched; but I did some tall "scooting" out of the way. We have doubts here whether we shall advance further. Meade keeps his own counsel; but the general idea is against moving further on this line.

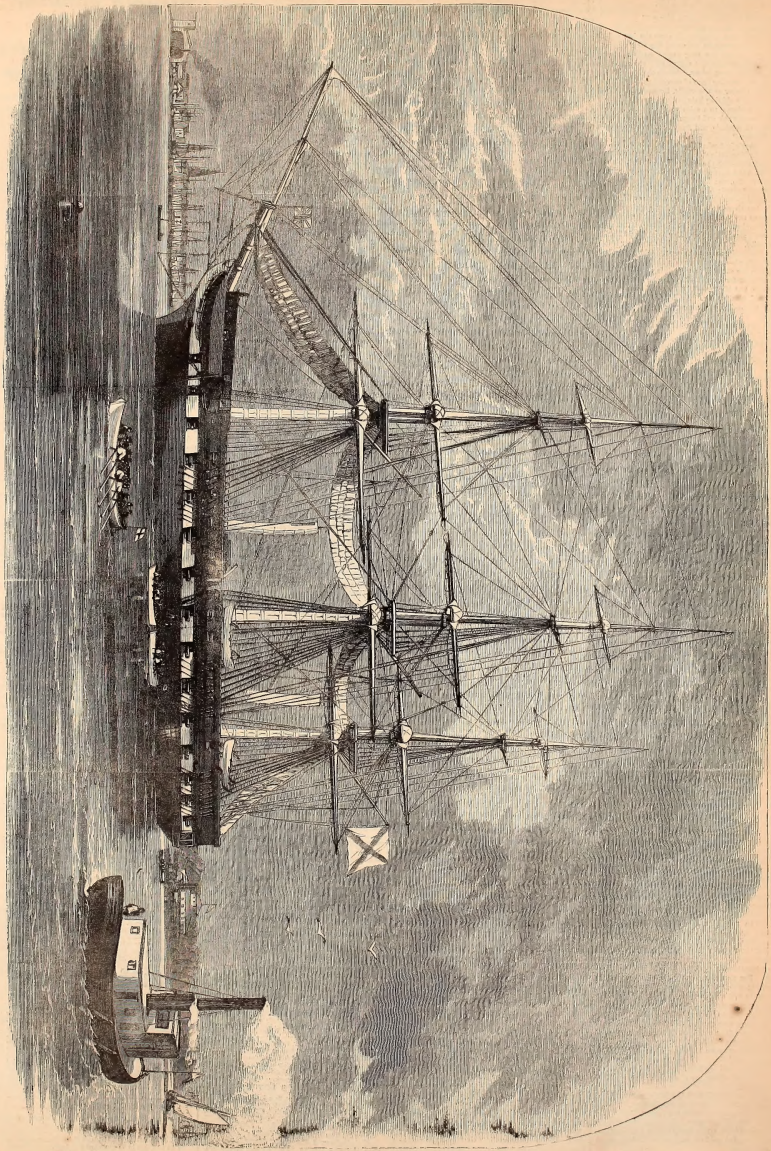
"ADVANCE OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

"On Sunday, September 13, 1863, soon after our troops advanced from the Rappahannock, they became engaged with the enemy. Skirmishing on toward Culpepper, that place was captured after a short engagement. General Meade's first brilliant charge up hill, taking three of the rebels' guns. We came very near capturing a railroad train, which, it is said, General Stuart escaped in. About four miles from Culpepper the fighting ceased for the night, but early in the morning the advance was pushed to the Rapidan. Here we found that the rebels prepared with infantry and guns in earthworks to resist our further progress. Skirmishing was made at both to ascertain their force at Racoon Ford, while another cavalry division was driving the same at Somerville Ford. Both sides shelling and sharp-shooting has been constantly kept up on the river banks. General Custer charged down on a hill to the enemy's battery, taking three guns and a number of artillerymen.

"General Gregg's division was very hotly engaged at the same time shown in the sketch. The rebels threw their shot and shell with great precision, dismounting some of the General's escort, and bodily wounding some of the gunners in Butler's battery of light twelves before they were defeated. Butler's and Woltason's are the only horse batteries of light twelves in the army, and did good service. Wollaston's battery is shown in the view of Racoon Ford.

"The night station on Pony Mountain was built by our officers with Pope last year. It was occupied by the signal officers in advance of our lines in the recent engagement."

On page 636 we illustrate



A SWORD PRESENTATION TO GENERAL MEADE.

Mr. Waud writes: "In presentation, during the occupation of N xico by our troops, were reduced to a system, the present being quite a secondary matter. It is of course a matter of official action and attendant spree for which it afforded an excuse. Field-officers gave swords to their generals, line officers to their field officers, the field, and the rank and file for the line. In the latter case the opening of a barrel of whisky was considered the right thing. It is on record, indeed, that one gentleman did actually invite all his friends—no small assemblage—to the raffle of a sword he owned, in a most speech detailing his manifold virtues and good qualities, he presented himself there and then with a handsome sword and scabbard, did return thanks in a most feeling manner for the same!

"With no desire to draw any comparison between the above and the presentation made to General Meade, which was a well-decreed compliment to one of our best officers, I will state that out of place to ask why so much money—the sum variously stated from fifteen hundred to twenty-six hundred dollars—should be spent upon a sword which it is not likely the General will wear? A neatly-inscribed sword would have done, and the balance of the money in gold eagles, would be a much more sensible present. However, the affair passed off to the satisfaction of all concerned, and General Meade's was a very good and appropriate speech. Colonel Roberts, of the Reserves, also made a speech abounding in rich humor touching the refreshment question. Of the other speakers, it can be said that they had a tendency to reduce the occasion to the complexion of a political caucus. The grounds were nicely decorated with triumphal arches and evergreens between, and lighted with Chinese lanterns, in the evening. The sword is richly carved and embossed, the sheath inlaid with enamel and diamonds, the hilt rich and heavy with gold and garnets, or rubies."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SWORD PRESENTATION BY GENERAL CRAWFORD'S DIVISION TO GENERAL MEADE.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 635.]

THE RUSSIAN FRIGATE "OSLIABA," NOW IN THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 653.]

GOLDEN HAIR.

"You are no better to-night, Harry?"

"No better, Miss Ariel."

Ariel King bent thoughtfully over the low pallet bed, with her slight finger on the sick man's restless pulse, and her long amber curls almost touching the coverlet that stirred with the uneven laboring of the breast below. While the frosty October sunset, drawing lines of moving gold athwart the rough plaster of the walls, lingered lovingly around the soft shining hair and violet eyes, transfiguring her almost to a saint's strange beauty.

"He seems weak and languid," she said, softly. "Wine, and cordials, and fresh fruit, are what he needs, Marian."

"And that's just what the doctor told me," said a dark, bustling little woman, who was concocting some mixture over the sickly fire. "But, bless you, Miss Ariel, how are we poor folks to get wine and fruit? No, no; he must just get well on arrow-root and gruel: they don't cost much."

She tried to speak smilingly, this poor Marian Becker, but there were tears in her dark eyes as she pushed the wet hair back from her husband's hollow temples.

"It isn't altogether that, Miss Ariel," said Harry, unsmiling. "I think I should get stronger if it wasn't for fretting about the rent. Old Keene is a hard landlord—one who wouldn't hesitate to turn a man into the street if he were dying. I don't so much mind it for myself—I shall soon be beyond all trouble, but Marian—"

He stopped abruptly. Ariel lifted her grave, shocked eyes—this was a new revelation of want and woe.

"Do you mean to tell me that you have no money left?"

"None, Miss Ariel."

She bent her head on her hands with a sort of passionate shudder.

"And this is the way our country rewards the soldiers who for her sake have dared the perils of deadly battle-field and fever-breathing swamps! She gives them 'an honorable discharge'—a discharge to creep away into some hole or corner and die as soon as possible! She promises them 'bounty' at the end of the war—as well say at the end of the world! Is this right? is it justice?"

"Nay, Miss Ariel," said the young soldier, "it is pretty much my own fault; if I had chosen to stay in hospital I should have incurred no expenses. Only I fancied that Marian could nurse me better, and—"

"And so you committed the unpardonable sin of preferring home to a hospital barrack, and this great and ungrateful country washes her hands of you accordingly. Oh, Harry, if I had but one tithe of my uncle's wealth!"

"Miss Ariel," said the young man, earnestly, "don't feel so grieved about it. I know you are hurt at your uncle's refusal to help you, but you must remember that he disapproved of my enlistment from the very first—still more of the life fancy, as he termed it, of my coming home. But oh, Miss Ariel, if he could have known the bitterness of the home-sick pangs that come when you are sick in a strange place! He said it himself—that the mere fact of my having once been a clerk in his employ gave me no claims on him. And he was right, Miss Ariel, only—"

He turned his face to the pillow, with a low choking sob. Ariel watched him, with a strange, troubled light in her eyes, to see a human creature drifting slowly out of the world, and have no power to help or rescue him.

"How much is the rent?" she asked, after a brief silence.

"Twenty dollars, Miss Ariel: it is for three months."

Twenty dollars! and she had but ten in her little silk purse. For Ariel King, a portionless orphan, had literally nothing of her own: the very watch at her girdle, the spot of opal fire that fastened her collar, were her uncle's. And to him she well knew how vain would be any application.

She sighed deeply as she rose up to go, and once more cast a wistful wish, the passionate longing, that she were rich!

The gas-lamps were beginning to quiver like lines of fire on the long, tumultuous avenue as she set out on her homeward way, and with instinctive timidity she drew her veil and folded her simple scarlet shawl closer round her shoulders, quickening her steps as she did so.

"Can a stranger help young woman? wait till them carts and carriages has got by!"

Ariel started in affright as the good-humored old policeman came back, and then smiled at her own timidity. But, as she stood waiting on the corner for something like a break in the apparently endless string of carts and omnibuses, her eye fell on a brilliantly-lighted window close at her side, and she mechanically read, emblazoned on the glass,

"HIGHEST PRICE PAID FOR HUMAN HAIR."

She looked down on the long auburn curls that lay on her shoulders with a strange, sudden thrill of joy. For the moment she saw rich—she had something which she might call her very own, to keep or to sell as she pleased. Harry Becker's needs might be partially succored yet.

Without pausing for reflection she laid her hand on the latch, and entered the perfumed realm of Macassar and false curls. A dashing little French-woman stood behind the counter.

"In what may we have the happiness of serving madame?"

"I wish to sell my hair," murmured poor Ariel, her cheeks all aflame, as if she had been doing a guilty thing.

"Ah! certainly," said the little woman, in a tone one or two degrees less conciliatory. "Will madame please to lay aside her bonnet?"

With trembling fingers Ariel untied the strings and removed the straw bonnet: like a cataract of shining, gilded gold the long soft curls fell around her shoulders.

"Ciel!" ejaculated the little woman softly, with upraised eyebrows and clasped hands, "the hair is fine, vraiment, it must be near three feet long! For what price do you wish to part with it, madame?"

"I must have ten dollars," said Ariel, taking courage at the other's evident admiration.

"Ten dollars!—that is too large a sum."

"Then I must try elsewhere," said Ariel, taking up her bonnet.

"Wait—stay!" said the woman, meditatively. "It is long and thick, moreover it is of a good color. Please walk into the back room, madame. Fanchette shall cut it off in half a second!"

Poor Ariel, as she sat flushed and half frightened in the little gas-lighted den at the back of the shop, with "Fanchette's" gleaming scissors flashing through her curls, she would have given almost any thing to have retraced the sudden step. The bright, silken tresses she had brushed, and caressed, and twined with flowers so many, many times—the curls—oh, how could she ever have forgotten!—that Colonel Tybley had admired so much—that Harry had wound in love coils of rainbow! An involuntary sob welled up from her heart.

"Did you speak, Mademoiselle?" said Fanchette, snapping the scissors in mid-air.

Ariel shook her head; she could not answer in words. There they lay, a soft, shining heap, full of golden lights, and tender brown shadows—her curls no longer!

"Please give me one to keep," she pleaded, with wistful eagerness. The Frenchwoman smilingly tossed one across the counter; she was in good-humor with herself; she had made a decided bargain.

And Ariel, not even daring to look in the glass, crept away; the hard-earned money in her pocket, and the curl held to her heart as if it had been a living thing.

"Is he asleep, Marian?"

"Miss Ariel—is it possible that this is you?"

"Myself, Marian! Hush! don't wake him; here are twenty dollars. Don't chide me, pray, it's late."

"But, Miss Ariel, how—where— Oh! I see now—your hair, your beautiful brown curls are gone. Oh, Miss Ariel, how could you?"

"Pooh!" said Ariel, lightly, "hair will grow again. Do you suppose I value my silly curls beyond poor Harry's life and strength?"

And before Mrs. Becker could find words to express her gratitude Ariel was gone.

"Upon my word!" said Miss Priscilla Vinaigre, "this is quite a new freak of some sort in Miss King's part. What will not a girl do to keep up with the fashion?"

Colonel Tybley looked quickly up from the photographic album whose leaves he was slowly turning over. Yes, Miss Vinaigre was quite right, that was Ariel King, with her flushed cheeks shadowed with tiny brown rings, and her eyes bent downward with timid shame.

Colonel Tybley shut the album with considerable emphasis. Fashion! he hated the sound of the word. What were girls dreaming about fashion for, when the nation was groaning with the agony of regeneration? Yet he had fancied Ariel King far superior to these British whims; well was it for him that disenchantment came ere it was too late.

"And she knew how much I admired that lovely golden hair!" was the next thought. "It shows how much she cares for my likes and dislikes. Well, she is just like the rest of her sex, and I shall go back to Washington next week cured of one absurd fancy."

And Ariel sobbed herself to sleep that night because Frank Tybley passed her with such a frigid bow.

Harry Becker had an unexpected visitor the next morning—the Colonel of his regiment, who came in with a bright, encouraging smile, and a kindly grasp of the hand that seemed to throw new life into the invalid's worn frame.

"Why, Becker, where has you been hiding yourself? Why didn't you let us know where you were? It was by the merest chance in the world I stumbled upon you out."

Becker's pale cheek reddened. "I did not like to trouble others with my distress, Colonel."

"Pooh! pooh! that is nothing to you or me a foolish fell-w. What can I do for you?—nay, don't hesitate-l I have not forgotten how you saved my life on the Malvern's Mills."

"Thank you, Colonel. We have been in sore straits, my wife and I; but Miss Ariel King, my former employer's daughter—"

"King—Ariel King—I know her."

"Miss Ariel has been a most excellent young lady in the world. Well, Sir, she has sided us with her little means—my wife used to be a seamstress in the family, and has still a known skill—but what do you suppose she did to help us with the rent that was behind?"

"I am sure I do not know."

"She sold her hair, Sir—her beautiful golden hair, that she was as proud of as my woman could be—all to assist her father's old clerk."

And Harry turned his head aside to hide the big drops on his lashes. He need not have been so careful: there was a clearness in the Colonel's sharp eye too.

"I have been a fool!" he ejaculated, striding out into the middle of the room—"a fool, assuredly!"

And he went straight to the little parlor where Ariel was sitting at her work, crying a little between whiles, and thinking, in the sweet, self-abasement of her saintly beauty,

"And now, Ariel, now that you know what a suspicious, credulous, doubting villain I have been—can you give the priceless treasure of your love into my keeping?"

She answered him, seriously and tenderly, with soft, shy blushes, "Yes."

What more have we to say? Nothing, save that Harry Becker and Marian his wife are doing well, and the latter predicts that by Ariel's wedding-day her curls will have grown out again, long and golden as ever.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

All kinds Sewing Machine Needles, At J. W. BARTLETT'S,
The only GENERAL NEEDLE DEPOT, 842 Broadway, N. Y.

MONEY AND TEMPER SAVED!
Brown's New Metal Top Lamp Chimney.—Does not break by heat; does not get smoky; easily and quickly cleaned without wetting; one outlasts ten common chimneys; saves your temper, time, and money. Try it, and you will use no other. Agents wanted. N. L. C. MFG CO., 45 Fulton Street, N. Y.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 21 Park Row, New York. Circulars and free Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents, and also for sale by CHASE & LYMAN, 25 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

French (Solitaire) Patterns.
These fashionable goods are made of the finest Ivory, and brought to a high polish of all colors, Black, White, Red, Blue, &c., and engraved with Initial Letters. Old English, &c. Complete sets $2 50, free by mail. Trade supplied.
JOHN F. PHELPS, 493 Broadway, New York.

MEEKS' CABINET FURNITURE

WAREROOMS,
No. 699 BROADWAY,
Also,
333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established for twenty years, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

French Note Papers, Satin and Moire Frosses, Silver Plate, etc., at J. RUSSELL'S, 167 Broadway, cor. Duane St.
For Specimens by mail, send 3 cents.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Rope, COURDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Bending Cord, Log Cord and Surgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOVE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and are used by over 3,000 for Cards and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others can work at MAKING MONEY by printing their own Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c. They can be printed at a saving of 75 per cent. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $12, 22, 32, and $48. Send for a Circular.
LOVE PRESS CO., 19 Water Street, Boston.

ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal of Hudson River Institute, Claverack, Columbia County, N. Y., offers 14 weeks board and tuition for $47. Term opens Sept. 15. (Sixth corner.) If furnishing, also board in the Institution with the pupils. Write for catalogues.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 33x51. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

No Dye in the World Worthy of Competition.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Cincinnati vs. Everything. Both for sale everywhere, and supplied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

WINDOW SHADES.

White, Buff, Green and Blue Holland, Gold and Prescoed Shades. Bray's, Putnam's, Bailey's, and Judd's Patent Fixtures, At G. L. & J. B. KELTY'S, Window Shade Manufacturers, No. 357 Broadway, New York.

LACE CURTAINS, Nottingham Curtains, Brocatelle Curtains, Rep Curtains, Terry Curtains, Satin Dolskine Curtains, Wholesale and retail, at KELTY'S, 359 Broadway.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a Gold Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to any garment. Adress

As sold in 2d and 3d Ave. cars, 25c.

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150! $100! $50!

PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than three lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

$5 made from 50 cents. Address
F. COLLINS & CO.,
Cornwall Bridge, Ct.

THE STANDARD AMERICAN BILLIARD TABLE. Awarded a Diploma and Medal at the National Exhibition of 1863. The best and only reliable billiard table manufactured. Rubber, Cues, and every article relating to billiards, for sale by PHELAN & COLLENDER, corner of Crosby and Spring Streets, New York.

S. M. WARD. Co. 2d N.Y.Vols.

C. E. PACE Co. I 29 N.Jvd.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

One Agent wanted in every Regimental, Hospital, and on board every Vessel. For $1, will send you a sample, with a Circular giving full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Pin, or Guard Chain, or an Engraved Spring Locket, or a Beautiful California Diamond Pin, or Carved Ring, or a fine Gold Collerette Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps Pin, with your Name, Co., and Reg., handsomely engraved upon it. Address Crown in Gold Plate: and, for 50 cents, I will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.
H. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4676. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

The "Star" No Chimney Burner for Kerosene Oil Lamps, Patented Aug. 11, 1863.
Gives a large, clear, and steady light without smoke or odor. An perfect portable or 3rd light. It can be carried and handled freely without being extinguished. Superior to any other of the kind. Try it. Simple, and useful, for 25 cents. Circulars free. Agents wanted. PETTIS & DESSING, Manufacturers, No. 3 Pistol Street, N. Y.

TIBBAL'S
Manufacturing Depot for J. A. CRANDALL'S PATENT SPRING ROCKING CHAIRS, BABY ROCKERS, GIG, and PERAMBULATOR, removed to No. 503 Broadway, directly opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular and price list. Also Baby Walkers, Children's Carriages, Velocipedes, &c.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have Just Published:
THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain Usanos F. Norris. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25. Mailed

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH:

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
300 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15 00 each.
$500 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
$500 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
$500 Pins	2 00 to 5 00 each.
$500 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$500 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$500 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$500 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$500 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$500 Coral, Ena., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
$500 Gold Lever Pins	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$500 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
$500 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 4 00 each.
$500 Seal and Key Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$500 Shell Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
$500 Pearl Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$500 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
$500 Lockets	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$500 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	3 00 to 10 00 each.
1000 Gold Pens, Silver Ivory Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
1000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, that giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

Active Village Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and States. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

$15 Sewing Machine Company

Now forsals the Exclusive Right of any County (not taken), and give notice to

1 Use, price complete (12) $75
2 Uses, " " $42
Single Machine for Canvassing $40
FIFTEEN DOLLAR S. M. CO., N. Y., Care Box 3385 P. O.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographic Albums, Engravings, Materials, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Caps, Badges, or any other articles procurable in this city.

We will forward, on receipt of 20 cents each, Photographs of VERDI, GRACE MOORE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, THOMPSON, BOOTH, BURNSIDE, COMO, HAYNE, SHERMAN, HALLECK, BANCROFT, BUCHANAN, ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, THOMAS, or any of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PARLOR DOMINOES. This excellent article, being neat, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive kinds, will recommend itself to every member of the Camp and the Hospital. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail. $2 00 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.

111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,

NEW YORK CITY.

Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Dyspepsia Tablets,

FOR INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c. — Manufactured only by

A. G. SELLING, No. 597 Centre St., New York.

Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.

Agents and Dealers.

SOMETHING NEW. — Patent Apple and Vegetable Parer and Slicer combined, the Patent Sewing Work and Needle Holder, and 99 more Novel Articles. Send stamp for circular. S. W. RICE & CO., 83 Nassau St., N. Y.

Babylon is Fallen, Sequel to "Kingdom Coming." Demand my Boy was Home again, by Composer. Who will Care for Mother now? each 25c. Vocal sheets for her mother, title and blank, each 25c. Medicated Gaiters, 700 tunes for violin, flute, &c., all. FREDERICK BLUME, 289 Bowery, N. Y.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unexcelled, and valuable entire large size THREE STATIONERY, RECIPES, AND YANKEE NOVELTY PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Recipes, Novelties, Curiosities, Cottage Receipts, Household Companions, Camp Companions, Games, Fortune Telling, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Ashbury Brown, Union Badges, Gold Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, and one costly Present, of Fashionable Jewelry, Miniature, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price of Package ONLY 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low. Not less than 100 per cent profit realized. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competition, and hold their own. Agents report the most leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind ever introduced. Package of all descriptions put up by the 100 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the Army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENT, and every Purchaser presented free to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new CIRCULAR, containing FULL PARTICULARS, which is sent free. S. C. KELSARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Revolving Pencils, Pencil Erasers, and 12 other articles. 10 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Soldiers'

COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1. Solid Silver, $1.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $3 50 each.

Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1. Solid Silver, $1. 50.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enamelled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Letters in Monogram. Send for a Catalogue.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,

Jewelers and Silversmiths, Louisville, Ky.

General Gilmore's New Book.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON LIMES, HYDRAULIC CEMENTS, AND MORTARS.

Containing reports of numerous experiments conducted in New York City during the years 1858 to 1861 inclusive. By Q. A. GILMORE, U. S. Engineers, and Brevet Major United States Volunteers, and Major United States Corps of Engineers; with numerous illustrations. One volume, octavo, cloth, $3 50. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Just published by

D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Deafness.—Sewell Manufacturing Twbes. Can be constantly worn, and are the best aid for all public assemblies. Send for a descriptive pamphlet to

E. HALL & CO., 21 Park Row, New York.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS AND PRINTERS.

The subscribers manufacture TYPE REVOLVING Double and Single Cylinder Printing Machines, Bed and Plates

POWER PRESSES,

For Book, Job, and Card Printing.

They would also call the attention of publishers of newspapers to their new

RAILWAY NEWSPAPER PRESS

and their Improved

LARGE HAND CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, either of which is especially designed to supply newspapers of a moderate circulation with a cheap and serviceable Printing Machine, capable of doing the same amount of work of an out of town office. They are designed to run by hand, a speed of 700 copies per hour, and as fast as they will run without jar or noise.

Circular of prices, with description, will be forwarded on application.

R. HOE & CO.

Printers' and Binders' Warehouse,

Nos 29 and 31 Gold Street,

Corner Broome, Sheriff, and Columbia Sts., New York, And Foundry Street, Boston.

Publishers of newspapers who will insert this advertisement three times in their weekly issues, and send a copy previous to January 1, 1864, and forward us a copy of paper containing the same, will be paid in printing materials by purchasing four times the amount of their bill for this advertisement.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Compound will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 189 Nassau Street, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOME.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—Nonresponsible reader in the country found in every household; price $5 by mail; 10 for $40; 20 for $75. Send stamp for circular. Address C. MUNRO, BROWN, No. 74 Bleecker Street, N. Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS of WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a chronometer, or open face watch, for a lady's or gentleman's watch combined, with a Patent self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces ever offered. Equal reliability is also offered, when within it are connected with its machinery its own winding mechanism, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. In case of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer being fine 18 carat gold. It has the improved rare action lever movement, and is warranted as accurate timekeeper. Sent to any address, by express, per case of half dozen, $3 50. Sample watches in 3 oz morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 50 cents; registering, 20 cents.

COMPOSITE

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Piece!

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES ARE THE MOST UNIQUE.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected from the real article by the most experienced judges. The material being alike all through, it can not be recognized by either the file or aquafortis; making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Hunting Gold in existence.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, as the retail price very readily is $15 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day by any one of ordinary business tact.

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In twenty hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dials, and figure or hands, in cost round case and order, by the half dozen, $60; postage, at 80c. extra; $70. Sent only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our prices are now so novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and handsomely finished, and offering at prices chell saying competition from all other hands.

The cover is the best and most reliable protection against the superiority of our watches. Their economizes are emphatic, everywhere, always in use. In a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—French Leader's, Feb. 21.

"Perfect, best, and most reliable time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Our watches have acquired a high point of accuracy and elegance."—Public Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement which makes a good watch invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 8.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Phila. Inquirer, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journal, Government organ, Aug. 1.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 21.

☞ TERMS CASH; INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No goods employed; business strictly confined to the trade. A sample is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is a sure risk. Orders will be executed with dispatch and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

169 Broadway, New York.

FRIENDS OF SO OIERS!

All Articles for soldiers at Baltimo... Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, Beaufort, Fortress Monroe, or Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARDEN'S EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers' regard low rates.

SAVAGE & CO.'S No Chimney Burner burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or smell. Office 702 Broadway, corner of 4th Street, N. Y. Agents wanted. $.nd for circular. Sample set by mail, $1. Trade supplied.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1

Will copy a letter as well as a press that is to be, in its exports, unexcelled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. VAN ANDEN & CO., No. 139 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

PHYSIOGNOMY,

OR SIGNS OF CHARACTER, and "How to Read Them." Physiology, the functions of the body; Pneumatology, the origin of the human soul; Phrenology, the faculties of mind; and Psychology, the science of the soul, are given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for Oct. 1863. 70 engravings. Price 15 cents; $1 50 a year. Single number, 15 cents, by first post. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Five quires (720 sheets) nice commercial note paper for 50 cents. Single quires, for a sample, 12 cents. 100 fine white envelopes, for 50 cents. 100 for 75 cents. 100 for $1 00, post-paid. Address GEO. K. SNOW & HAPGOOD, Fairbroker Office, Boston, Mass.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

McCLELLAN, Burnside, Hancock, Banks, Meade, Gilmore, Sherman, Barlow, Custer, and Sigel. All are the same pattern as the cut, only differing in battle-grounds and date. Perfect photograph likeness in each. Send for best and finest in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. A liberal discount to sell and the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacturing the above, and the manufacturer of the beautiful keepsake and record of gallant acts.

LOUIS FRILLIE, 609 Broadway, N. Y.

Union Playing Cards.

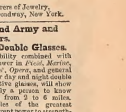
Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 50 connected cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags on the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

458 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, to engage in the manufacture and sale of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box 56, 4th Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

National Union League.

Army Corps and Regimental Badges.



We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,

308 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, manufactured by the largest and most reliable house in this line at from one-quarter to one-fifth the usual price. The most transparent power to strength-en and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Other leagues and lenses of all kinds.

SEMMONS, Oculist—Optician,

609½ Broadway, New York.

MR. KIRCH MILLARY and Collegiate Institute. The Fall term opens Oct. 5th, 1863. For circulars address A. B. WIGGIN, A.M., Mount Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

A Splendid Holiday or Marriage Present.

HARPER'S

Illuminated and Pictorial

BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by the most eminent artists, and printed on paper made expressly of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plates, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a splendid Quarto Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, bevelled and panelled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $29 00; Full Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $16 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard text of the American Bible Society, and contains Historical References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Tables, List of Proper Names, Geographical Tables of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispieces, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters, are printed in Chromo-Lithography, after entirely original designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists, and from Ancient Designs to which a full index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CUSHINGS & BAILEY, Baltimore; DERBY & JACKSON, Washington; JAMES M. ELLIS & CO., Cincinnati; KERR & WOODS, St. Louis; S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; and all Booksellers everywhere.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of Price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Have just Published:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER. Price 25 cts.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the Poor in England. By JOSEPH KAY, Esq., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law, and Late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. JEAFFRESON, Author of "Olive," "Live's Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of Rise and Influence of Opinions of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York: Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

ST. OLAVE'S. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

LIFE ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838–1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 12mo. Vol. 1, just ready. Price, $1 50.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the Author of "The Morals of May Fair," "Cresida," "The World's Verdict," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede." &c. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.

Postage, Three Cents a Number, which must be prepaid, for year, $1 08.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.

Postage to Subscribers.—Seventy-five Cents per line for Insertion, and One Dollar per line for each Advertisement.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

OLD MARM BRITANNIA, as she will catch it, one of these fine days, from her own Rams.

MASON & HAMLIN'S CABINET ORGANS, one to twelve stops each; price $70 to $600 each. A vast improvement on everything of the Melodeon or Harmonium kind. See written testimony of more than one hundred of the most eminent artists and organists of leading cities to the great excellence of these instruments, and their superiority in all others of their class for private and public use. Also Melodeons, from $60 to $170 each. Illustrated Catalogues sent free. Warerooms Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer St., New York. Address MASON BROTHERS.

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street.

Orders received for Five-Twenty Bonds at Par, interest to commence with date of payment.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes.

" Six per Cent. Bonds.

" Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881.

And all other Governmental Securities bought, sold, and convertible on hand.

Also, Gold, Bankn, Bankers, and others received on favorable terms.

Special attention given to the Collection of Government Vouchers, Quarter-masters' Checks, and maturing Certificates of Indebtedness.

FISK & HATCH, 38 Wall Street.

From the N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10, 1863.

"One of the prettiest, most, convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered."

Magic Time OBSERVERS!

The Perfection of Mechanism!

HUBBARD BROS. Importers of WATCHES

Being a Hydrostat, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-Winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty, of which we are the only consignees in this country. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The case of this watch is composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved lever action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate time-piece. Its size is convenient, measuring but two inches across it. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $264. Sample Watches, in any desired style, sent, if sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering 60 cents.

Terms Cash, invariably in Advance.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers,

Branch, Store, Courtlandt Street, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

French and English Fancy Goods.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,

15 Rue d'Enfants, Paris,

47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Sothis' Ointment, warranted to produce a full rest of hair in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 25 cents. Address C. F. SOTHIS, Troy, N. Y.

A Secret Worth Knowing.—How to make Old Chestnuts Worthless.—Linen with-ink spots or other fruit, in 10 hours. The recipe sent everywhere for 25 cents. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 922, Boston, Mass.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "Bloom of a Thousand Flowers." For shading it is unsurpassed. It is composed of pure oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

H. T. FETRIDGE & CO., 19 and 20 Dey Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Furnaces, Ranges, and Stoves.

BOYNTON'S celebrated IMPROVED CAST-IRON SELF-CLEARING BRICK FURNACE; BOYNTON'S PORTABLE CALORIFIC BASE-BURNING MAGAZINE FURNACES; FIRE-PLACE HEATERS; and HALL, SCHOOL, and PARLOR STOVES; AMERICAN KITCHENERS and MORNING STAR RANGES; LITTLEFIELD'S famous MORNING GLORY STOVES; CHURCHES new and beautiful GAS-BURNING PARLOR STOVES; REGISTERS, VENTILATORS, and SHEET MANTELS. For sale by RICHARDSON, BOYNTON & CO.

Send for Circulars. No 189 Canal St., N. Y.

NOW READY.

New Edition Revised.

U. S. ARMY REGULATIONS;

With an Appendix containing the Changes and Laws affecting Army Regulations and a Digest of War to June 25, 1863. Official. One volume octavo, pages 384, price $1 00. For sale by Booksellers and Newsdealers everywhere. Sent free on receipt of price.

Address GEO. W. CHILDS, Publisher,

628 & 630 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

N. B. The old edition is now obsolete.

Have you seen the New Union Playing Cards? National Emblems. The suits are Sceptre, Shields, Stars, and Flags. Colored in place of King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, Major for Sack. They are the prettiest card made, and are rapidly taking the place of cards having foreign Emblems. Every body that uses them wants them. Each pack is put up in an elegant card case, and three in dozen boxes for the trade.

Two sample packs sent in case fee on receipt of $1.

The trade supplied on liberal terms.

Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

165 William St. or 62 Broadway, N. Y.

Gold Pens and Cases,

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' Pens	$ 75	Engraving Pens	$2 00
Med. "	1 00	Gold Pens	2 50
Large "	1 25	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Mammoth Eureka "	3 50
Large Eureka "	1 50	Mammoth Eureka	5 50

Pens are 14 carat fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the metropolitan community for the last (10) Ten years, and the manufacturer believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen now in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, before purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact sizes and prices of the various kinds of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens, and by purchasing at the manufactory secure the genuine article.

Pens repointed on the receipt of 36 Cts.

E. S. JOHNSON,

Manufactory and Office, 16 Maiden Lane,

New York City.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, Soldiers, and all having some time to spare, are profitably employed in selling goods, to send to their address, and we will send in return, FREE, information for which they will be thankful. We offer extra inducements From $5 to $15 per day Above expenses. We want soldiers from every county in the U. S and from every regiment in the Army Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Box 5181, N. Y.

Fish's Patent Lamp Heating APPARATUS.

Every Family should have One.

For description Pamphlet and Price List address W. D. ROSSELL, Agent, 161 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

WATCHES FREE.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRESS AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp need no capital, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in online terms to all. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing FACTS & Documents. See "15 per day Easy" on inside page.

S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 239 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

DR. GODDALE'S

Catarrh Remedy.

Extensive Catarrh, Rose and Branch, forever. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet Depot 619 Broadway.

How to Paint Photographs.

A NEW WORK.

Just published. Price 10 cents. Sold by all principal Booksellers, Artists' supply-men, and Stock Dealers, and sent, post-paid, by the publishers,

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF L.Y.D.S.

Fever and Ague,

Fondness,

Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S

YELLOW DOCK SYRUP.

Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Chemist, Joint, and Limb.

One Dollar per Bottle (Small size, fifty cents).

Depot, 120 CHATHAM ST., N. Y. Sold 500 GRAND St., Ask for LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1848. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil. Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 20 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—20 next tracts of from $15 to $50 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good Schools and society. Good crops can be seen growing. Hundreds are settling. On account of extreme mildness of climate, it is highly beneficial to pulmonary complaints. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, P. M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Seton Robinson and Vineland, and Rural sent free. From Report of Seton Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts in an already most level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion, N. Y.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Superior in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to manufacturer, John B. Ronemus, late Pratt, Ronemus & Co., 130 William St., N. Y.

Patent Fountain Brush, for Marking Boxes, Bundles, &c. Mar'd by E. G. & J. C., Northampton, Mass.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, on receipt of $7. A Silver Watch the same on above. $5; specially adapted to the ARMY. CLUBS, 5 for $25 & 10 for $45. Address C. Y. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch — cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for a person to get an ordinary silver timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mountain Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 00, or with 6 beautiful mounted objects for $3 00, or with 24 mounted for $5. Address, HENRY CRAIG,

352 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

A Splendid New Book for Boys!

"The Drummer Boy

Is a story of camp life, of Expeditions to North Carolina—a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and roged incident. The life and colorations of the scenes here is painted in vivid colors."—New York Evening Post.

Elegantly illustrated. Price $1 60.

Just published by J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all book-stores.

"Get the Best."

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL THISTLE & CO.'S ENTIRELY NEW 10 and 20c. PRIZE STATIONERY PACKAGES. They are the largest, best, and cheapest manufactured. Circular sent free. Greatest inducements to Agents THISTLE & CO., 130 Nassau Street.

The American Parlor Or Floor Seats, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles, Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York. Send for Circular.

American Enamelled Metallic Collar Co.,

C. H. WELLING, 94 Fifth Street, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 20 cts. coin preferred, magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address J. C. BOWLING, Box 2006, Boston, Mass.

$22 WATCHES. $22

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver, heavy Hunting Case, warranted, for $22. Retail price $40.

Genuine Full Jeweled American Lever Watches, in same Coin Silver Hunting Case, gold joint, for $35. Also every variety of good watches, at equally low rates. All orders from the army must be prepaid, as the express companies will not take Bills for Collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,

208 Broadway, New York.

S—T—1860—X.

Drake's Plantation Bitters.

They purify, strengthen, and invigorate.

They create a healthy appetite.

They are an antidote to change of water and diet.

They overcome effects of dissipation and late hours.

They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.

They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.

They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.

They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.

They cure Diarrhœa, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus.

They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.

They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak sure strong, and are admirable nature's gentle restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels, and Saloons.

P. H. DRAKE & CO.,

202 Broadway, New York.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. AT UNION ADAMS No. 637 Broadway.

STEEL COLLARS

AND CUFFS, ENAMELLED LILY WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, and by Post to any part of the U.S. on receipt of $1 10.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 357 Broadway, N. Y.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS

Made to Measure at $24. $30, $36, & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and fashionable colors and styles of linen for current season free everywhere.

FRENCH FLANNEL OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment in New York, $3 75, $5, $5 75 each, all cut on easy and graceful fit.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The sort of pattern must be enclosed.—63 cents for each Shirt.

Send for size of neck.

SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS,

ENGLISH MERINO,

S. W. H. WARD, 357 Broadway, N. Y.

$40 a Month and Expenses. For particulars address (with stamp) HARRIS BROS., Boston, Mass.

Metallic Collars

AND

STEEL COLLARS!

They are more pliable, better enamelled, and more durable than "Steel." There is no danger of their attracting the electric fluid. Samples sent by mail for 75 cts.; $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar (a imported manuscript) to the AMERICAN ENAMELLED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 3173 New York City P.-st Office, and receive it by return mail.

Photograph Albums!

SUPERB STYLES, in ARABESQUE and GOLD, at any price from $1 60 to $250 00 each. Very Elegant Albums, French Styles, in 50 pictures, sent for $6 00.

Catalogues and Price List sent on receipt of Five Cents.

E. W. LUCAS & CO., 181 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 354.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS, U.S.A., THE HERO OF CHICAMAUGA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MAJOR-GENERAL THOMAS.

WE publish on page 641 a portrait, from a photograph by Brady, of GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS, the hero of the Battle of Chicamauga, or Chattanooga.

General Thomas was born in Southampton Co., Virginia, in July, 1816. He was appointed from that State to West Point in 1836, graduated on 1st July, 1840, and was appointed to the Third Artillery. In the following year he distinguished himself in the war against the Florida Indians, and was brevetted First Lieutenant for his gallantry. He accompanied General Taylor to Mexico, and at Monterey won the brevet rank of Captain. At Buena Vista, again, he distinguished himself nobly, and was brevetted Major. On the close of the war he returned home, and in 1850 assumed the responsible post of Instructor of Artillery and Cavalry at West Point. At the outbreak of the war Major Thomas was one of the few Virginians whose honor would not suffer him to rebel against his country's flag, and in May, 1861, he was appointed Colonel of the Fifth Cavalry—the Colonel, Robert E. Lee, and the Lieutenant-Colonel, having joined the rebels. In August of the same year he received the appointment of Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and proceeded to the West, where for some time he had an independent command. It was he who, when all around seemed black and hopeless, restored joy to the hearts of loyal people by the victory of Mill Spring, in Kentucky, the first of that brilliant series of victories which ended with the seven days before Richmond. He was subsequently appointed to the command of a corps in Buell's army. When Buell fell into disgrace and was removed, the President appointed General Thomas in his stead; but was induced, by the representations of General Thomas himself and others, to reconsider the change. Subsequently General Buell was superseded by General Rosecrans, and General Thomas assumed, and still retains, command of a corps in the Army of the Cumberland. At the recent Battle of Chicamauga his skill, and the unfaltering courage of his troops, saved us from an irreparable disaster, and he is justly entitled to be considered the hero of those bloody days.

We make some extracts from the admirable account of this battle written for the Herald by Mr. W. F. G. Shanks—a narrative we may pronounce equal to any thing ever penned by Napier or Russell. After describing the first check sustained by Longstreet, he says:

Their left thus repulsed, by the timely arrival of our reinforcements, the enemy in front of Thomas's four divisions (Brannan, Baird, Johnston, and Reynolds) became less persistent in their efforts, and upon a charge being ordered by Thomas, the élite of Lee broke. "Whenever I charged their flank they broke," said General Thomas, in talking it over afterward. Certainly the idea, as conveyed by the word "broke," does not convey to any mind the reality which I beheld. The General is not given to exaggeration, and I do not think it exaggeration in me to say that their retreat at this time was as complete a rout as this battle, or any battle of the war, has witnessed. For the fourth time they were driven over ground that they had thrice contested, at fearful cost; but their fourth repulse appeared to me to cost them more than all the rest. They fell at every step, mercilessly shot down, as they fled like sheep. The glory and renown of Longstreet had departed. Thomas pursued him for nearly a mile, driving him from every position which he assumed west of the creek, and forcing him beyond it in such great disorder that he was unable to recover from it during the day. The charge of that corps should go down to posterity in language that would insure the immortality of the story. Moving with admirable precision, yet with great rapidity, the line never wavered as the enemy, attempting to make a stand, would for a moment halt and turn upon the terrible line of leaping flame which pursued him. The incidents of that charge can not be told. A thousand are crowding the note-book of my memory; but I dare not stop now to tell how noble Birnaud and Ludlow and Fessenden, with thirty men and fifty horses killed, fell over their captured guns, nor how their battery was retaken, nor how the Sixteenth Infantry threw itself away against the wall of flame that licked it up till only one wounded captain and twenty men remained. I had seen two batteries fall into our hands and turned upon those who abandoned them, helping to strew the plain with their bodies. I can not now detail how volunteers and regulars vied with each other for the honor of the day. God knows they won glory enough to cover all. What else could they be but heroes with such a General as Thomas urging them forward?—he whom nothing could cheer more than the wild onset-cry of "Charge them!" ringing along his enthusiastic line, and flung as a defiance to the foe. On that field he at least had won victory; yet that day fame only sang the prelude to the hymn of praise that was his. On Saturday General Thomas stands forth the hero and the victor of the day: and while defeat stared at the broken right and centre, victory remained with the eagle of his blue battle-flag. On Sunday he is still the greater victor; for, where he had on Saturday routed a single corps, he repulses and checks the entire rebel army, and saves the Army of the Cumberland from irretrievable dishonor, and stands between it and ruin. Had Thomas broke as M'Cook and Crittenden had done, Bragg would have found no enemy between him and Nashville.

After describing the beginning of the second day's fight, he says:

General Thomas, near the centre of the army, was engaged, about one o'clock, sitting on his horse in the hollow of a ridge in an open field behind Harker's brigade, busy watching a heavy cloud of dust in his rear, in such a direction that it might be General Granger with reinforcements, or it might be the enemy. It cast a cloud over his spirits which was plainly visible to one who observed him, as I confess I did that day, with ever-increasing admiration. The truth is, that General Thomas at one o'clock P.M., on the last day of this battle, had no disposition to fight any more, and feared the result of the next rebel attack. And so he watched with natural anxiety the development of the cloud of dust, which was then no more than a mile distant. If it dissolved to reveal friends, then they would be welcome; for at this hour fresh friends were all that was needed. If it disclosed the enemy, then the day was lost, and it became the duty of those who formed the "last square" on this battle-field to throw into the teeth of the victorious enemy a defiance as grandly contemptuous as that of Cambronne, and die. There was no escape if the troops moving were, as it was feared, the cavalry of the enemy.

"Take my glass, some one of you whose horse stands steady. Tell me what you see."

In the dust that emerged, thick as the clouds that precede the storm, nothing could be distinguished but a moving mass of men. But it was seen that they were infantry. This information made Thomas breathe more freely. If infantry, it was much more likely to be Granger than the enemy. At this moment a tall officer, with the yellow straps of a captain of infantry, presented himself to General Thomas.

"General," he said, "I am cut off from General Negley, and can not find him. I beg leave to report to you for duty, Sir, of any character."

"Captain Johnston," said the General to the speaker (Captain Johnston, Second Indiana Cavalry, Inspector-General on General Negley's Staff), "ride over there, and report to me who and what that force is."

In an instant Johnston was gone—gone upon a mission which proved itself to be a more dangerous one than any of us supposed. As he emerged slowly from a dense foliage of willows growing about a narrow stream in the rear we heard the report of several rifles, and saw him halt for a second, and then, dashing spurs to his horse, disappear in a thick wood in the direction of the coming mass of troops still enveloped in clouds of dust. In a few minutes he again emerged from this timber, and following him came the red, white, and blue crescent-shaped battle-flag of Gordon Granger. We had wished for night, and it was Blucher who had come to us. At a quarter past one Steadman first, and Gordon Granger afterward, had wrung the hand of the statue Thomas, who had gone all through the terrible scenes of the last two days' battle to be melted and moved at this hour. As Granger came up I felt that from the face of the heavens a great cloud had passed, and the sun was shining once more upon us as with the same benignant rays of former victories.

Of the close of the day's work he says:

Just behind Harker's brigade, posted in the key of the position, there was a slight hollow in a large open field, in which were still standing about a dozen dead trees. In this deflection of the field, at the time the last fight of Sunday began, there were gathered together Generals Thomas, Gordon Granger, Garfield, Wood, Brannan, Steadman, Whittaker, and Colonel Harker. As the fight opened, Harker and Wood ran up the hill to their brigade and division, both being the one and the same. Steadman, Brannan, and Whittaker, rode off to join their commands. Garfield continued to indite his dispatch. Granger and Thomas remained, the latter on his horse, his arms folded, listening to the awful fire that soon raged along the line with the coolness of assured victory or the calmness of despair. His lips were compressed. His eyes glanced from right to left as the shell and canister exploded about the field, and once I saw him, just as the fight opened, most furiously glance up at a large, beautiful white pigeon or dove which alighted upon a dead tree above him and watched the battle from her dangerous nest. The representative man of that line, in unfaltering courage (Thomas), may be also said to have represented by his thoughts at that moment the thoughts of all. Watching him, we could see his anxiety at the reflection that if that line did not stand all would be lost; and each and every man there knew that the safety of themselves, but more the safety of the whole army, depended upon them. To be defeated there was to be cut to pieces or captured. To be routed was to fall back upon Chattanooga in disgrace, to be ignominiously taken in flight. There was no help to be expected save in the darkness of the slowly approaching night.

Happily Thomas's men did hold out till night, and the army was saved.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1863.

THE BATTLES IN GEORGIA.

WE have at last accounts, oral and written, of the great battles which were fought in Northwestern Georgia on 19th and 20th September. The battle commenced by an attack of the rebels on our advance, on Chicamauga Creek, on the morning of Saturday, 19th; it ended with the repulse of the rebels, at a point near Rossville, by Thomas's corps, about nightfall on Sunday, 20th, and was immediately followed by the retreat of our whole army to Chattanooga. During these two days' fighting we lost all the ground we had occupied between Chattanooga and Chicamauga; some ten thousand men in killed, wounded, and missing; and a number of guns, by some estimated as high as fifty. The rebel loss in guns was considerably less than ours; in men probably considerably more. They gained possession of the battle-field. But they did not gain possession of Chattanooga, and as there is good reason to believe that this was the object of their attack, they must be pronounced to have failed in their purpose.

Chattanooga, besides being a naturally strong place, and suitable for a dépôt of supplies, a negro recruiting station, and a general point d'appui for future operations in Georgia, the Carolinas, and Alabama, is so far the key to Northern Mississippi and Alabama that, so long as we hold it as well as the Mississippi, we actually hold military possession of that section of country, and cut off all communication between the northern portion of the Gulf States and Virginia and North Carolina. It is, moreover, within striking distance, at Atlanta, of the only other railway line between those Gulf States and the rebel States on the Atlantic. So long as the United States hold Chattanooga, the only communication between Mississippi and Alabama on the one hand, and Virginia and the Carolinas on the other, is liable at any moment to be severed as completely as Grant's victories on the Mississippi have divided Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas from the rest of the Slave Confederacy. Why General Bragg evacuated so vital a point as this—a point which we had been repeatedly assured would never be given up, and could be held indefinitely—we shall not know until the history of the war comes to be written. There may be some truth in the newspaper stories of the demoralization of Bragg's army. It may be, as asserted in some quarters, that Rosecrans had succeeded in flanking the place and threatening Bragg's communications. However this be, it is plain that the only thing for the rebels to do after we had got into Chattanooga was to drive us out of it—or perish. They attempted to drive us out in the battles of the 19th and 20th, and they have failed.

At latest accounts Rosecrans was undisturbedly fortifying himself at Chattanooga, and there were no indications of an immediate resumption of the fight. It stands to reason, however, that the struggle will be renewed at a very early day. If the rebels can not retake Chattanooga the Confederacy is gone. We may take for granted that Jeff Davis is sending every available man from Virginia, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Alabama to the scene of conflict, with the intention of crushing out Rosecrans's army, and restoring the communication between the Gulf and the Atlantic States. It is likewise safe to assume that our Government is following the example, and that immense bodies of troops are pouring down toward Chattanooga from every military station at the North. Thus the issue would seem to be one of time. If Rosecrans can not hold out at Chattanooga until his reinforcements arrive, the whole of the Southern army will presently be in Chattanooga, and marching Northward through Tennessee; if he can hold out a few days only he will have force enough to offer Bragg battle with advantage, and can proceed at his leisure to occupy Atlanta, and give the death-blow to the empire which it was proposed to erect upon the corner-stone of slavery.

THE LOUNGER.

JOHN BULL IN DIXIE.

JOHN BULL in the loyal States is an epitome of Great Britain. He sniffs and sneers and scolds; depreciating every national success, and delighting in rebel advantages. That our Government is an absurdity, that the Union is hopelessly gone, that the breeders of babies for sale are the only gentlemen in the land, and that all American things are loose, shiftless, vulgar, and repulsive, is John's profound conviction, which he does not affect to conceal. The war, of course, he regards as fratricidal and foolish. He informs us that we have no right, upon our own confessed principles, to try to preserve our Government; that we have never been any thing but a mob; and that after dragging through every extreme of terror and blood, we shall be crushed into silence and order by a military despotism. That despotism, indeed, in the opinion of John, has already begun. All the safeguards of liberty and civilization have been swept away. Every national fort is a bastile, and every citizen who dares to whisper that he does not like the war is immured in slimy dungeons with toads and bats. Law, freedom of speech and the press, all the guarantees that make civil society tolerable, are utterly overthrown. At least so Charles Mackay, inspired by Copperheads and speaking for the true-blue John Bull, has been constantly insisting.

Meanwhile John Bull continues to live in the abhorred country, and to try to make money out of the vulgar and ignorant devotees of the almighty dollar. But his continued residence is a permanent refutation of his perpetual slander. If all the John Bulls among us really thought what they say they think, they would do exactly as Mr. R. R. Belshaw, a fellow Bull lately of Montgomery, Alabama, did. He tells his story on the 5th of September to Lord Russell.

In 1859 he went to Montgomery and engaged in business. The war came, and his employés went. He immediately began to close up, but found it impossible, "in consequence of non-payment of debts," a chronic difficulty among "the gallant people," who are the only gentlemen, etc. Last February Mr. Belshaw was arrested as a conscript in his own house, conveyed to the guard-house, kept three days, and released. Notwithstanding his subsequent production of a consular certificate of nationality, he was again seized and hurried off to General Bragg's camp at Tullahoma. Several other British subjects were "forwarded under guard, in chains, with heavy iron collars riveted on their necks." They were put into the guard-house, "a filthy den," and invited to volunteer for the great and glorious cause of women-whipping. They naturally declined. After a few more solicitations, which they did not accept, they were put into the camp of the First Louisiana. Mr. Belshaw refused to do duty, "in obedience to the Queen's proclamation," and was thereupon incontinently "bucked" in front of General Bragg's head-quarters. Another refusal brought further "bucking," with pails of water "thrown over some of us." Continued obstinacy caused him to be tied up by the thumbs, while he saw another of the Queen's subjects held head downward in a tank of water three times until almost drowned. "The punishment of slaves has been inflicted upon us, with a full knowledge of our nationality, in broad daylight, and within a few yards of General Bragg's head-quarters, in the presence of at least fifty or a hundred spectators." He appealed to a trial. It cost him four thousand dollars, and he lost his case. He was adjudged liable to serve. Then he paid three thousand more for a substitute, but was presently summoned again. Thereupon the luckless Belshaw left the Confederacy, at a further expense of three thousand dollars; and is more indebted for his escape to his sister than to the money. In conclusion he calls upon M'lud Russell for indemnification for three months' continuous outrage and imminent risk of life, with the loss of ten thousand dollars, and the damage to his business from enforced absence.

Why should not the John Bulls resident in New York invite their brother, late of Montgomery, to justify their constant hatred of our Government by a little expatiation upon the superior civility and respect for personal rights which distinguish a "gallant nation," struggling for independence against a horde of tin peddlers, headed by a Gorilla, who are meanly fighting for dominion? If there is one thing you hate, John, it is cant, isn't it?

THE REBEL ILIAD IN A NUT-SHELL.

THE Richmond Dispatch, commenting upon the late battle in Georgia, puts the rebel Iliad in a nutshell. "Unless, however, he [Rosecrans] be driven across the river, our late victory will have been of no value."

That is the truth concisely told. For what, in that case, will have been gained to the rebel cause by Bragg's advantage? Some guns—nothing more. There has been a battle. The loss on both sides is great. The armies withdraw. If, then, there is no reoccupation of territory, the only question is which of the combatants could best afford to lose men. How many such battles could the rebels safely fight? In the condition to which they have been reduced a barren victory is necessarily a disaster. Consequently, although Bragg claimed a "complete victory" and "a rout" of the enemy, the wiser rebels, who have been disciplined by the dispatches of Beauregard, declared that they waited to see Chattanooga retaken before they gave way to joy.

Should any disaster befall Burnside, or Rosecrans be compelled to abandon Chattanooga and retire northward, the rebels may justly claim a decided advantage. Any thing short of this is a disaster for them. Bunker Hill never ranked high among British victories, although the Americans withdrew. The battle near Ringgold will not save the falling cause of treason and slavery if General Rosecrans should justify his words that he can not be driven from his position.

HEARTS AND FACES.

IT is known that officers and men of the Massachusetts Fifty-fourth Regiment were captured in the assault upon Fort Wagner of the 18th July. Beauregard's chief of staff has reported to Commissioner Ould, who, in turn, reported to Commissioner Meredith that no such persons were found. It is now understood that General Gilmore has been directed to make a demand for an account of their present condition upon Beauregard, and in case of any dodging upon the rebel side the Government will presume that the rebel threats against the prisoners have been carried out, and will act accordingly. That is to say, an equal number of rebel prisoners will be held to "involuntary servitude" until the proper explanations are made.

It is quite time that this were done. It is quite time that the Government of the United States declared by its acts that whoever serves under its flag shall be equally protected by it. It is quite time that we hastened to purge ourselves of the suspicion with which we have taught the men of African descent to regard us. It is certainly fully time, if we have not the heroism to welcome all loyal men to our ranks with the same generosity, that we should at least have the honor to refuse the assistance of all whom we do not mean to protect in every way. A half-hearted policy is a foolish policy. It invites and secures defeat. If the colored man is good enough for a soldier, he is good enough to stand upon the same footing with all other soldiers. If the loyalty and love of liberty among the colored men are to be effectively invoked, it must be done in such a way that they may know our friendship for them as surely as they know the contempt and oppression of the rebels.

It is by the action which the Government takes in this very case that the rebels, the Copperheads, and our foreign enemies will understand our intention and our conscious force. Let them all see and feel that as the United States have said liberty, they mean liberty. Let the whole world know, as we know, that the heart and hand of any brave, earnest, devoted citizen are a thousand-fold more precious to us than the color of a traitor or Copperhead face.

REBEL VICTORIES IN THE FIELD AND AT THE POLLS.

IF we had heard of some overwhelming disaster to the army of Rosecrans the chances of the Wood and Seymour ticket in this State would have been greatly increased. Why? Why should a national misfortune be of good augury to a political party? If we look at this question for a moment, the true character of the anti-administration policy will appear.

The immediate consequence of a great disaster would be despondency and doubt. The old story that the rebels could not be beaten, despite all that we have done, and the national flag floating in every State, would be repeated with exultation by the frank, and with professions of profound sorrow by the sly, Copperheads. The imminence of European intervention would have been lugubriously pressed. Mr. Fernando Wood would have demurely suggested that it is clear we must agree to compromise. Mr. Benjamin Ditto would have chuckled that we had got to let 'em go. And all the Copperhead organs would have asked if it were not sufficiently clear that the policy of the Administration was ruining the country, and that nothing but Tom Seymour in Connecticut, Horatio Seymour in New York, Vallandigham in Ohio, and M'Clellan in the field, could possibly save the country.

The effect of a disaster would thus have been to increase the tendency to ask whether we must not make peace at any cost whatever, whether it were honor, security, liberty, future tranquillity, decency, or self-respect. And with this would have come the greater willingness to vote for the ticket that was felt to represent that policy; not in terms, not openly, but by the necessity of the case. All the weak in whom disaster would have bred despair would have clutched at the Wood and Seymour policy. All the mean who delight in the peril of noble principles would have seized it even more gladly than they do now. All the traitorous Copperhead crew who agree with Governor Seymour that the Union had better go rather than slavery, would have hailed with rapture the possible success of a ticket which would deliver the imperial State into the hands of men who are more anxious to serve South Carolina than the Union.

It is because rebel victories in the field and Copperhead victories at the polls are thus substantially identical, that the destruction of Rosecrans would have helped defeat the Union ticket in this State.

BRITANNIA AND RAMS.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, who, under the signature "Historicus," has written some most unanswerable letters upon international questions to the London Times in a spirit friendly to this country, has recently stated very clearly the position which England truly occupies in the rebel rum question.

That they are building for a belligerent government he thinks will hardly be questioned. But the main object of their building, he agrees with Mr. Dayton, is not their direct use as weapons, but the indirect mischief which their sailing will produce between England and America. In other words, it is an effort to do exactly what the Foreign Enlistment Act declares that it was drawn to prevent—to navigate neutral English property with a belligerent. But, he says, if Great Britain found France conspiring with smugglers to defraud the British revenue, she would know how to deal with the case very suddenly and summarily. So in this case the British Government should say to the rebel belligerent: "You know our laws, and if you seek to violate them, no matter whether directly or indirectly, openly or by fraudulent contrivances, we will hold you responsible and make you answerable for the offence."

And that is what is said to be, he argues, not as a Government but as a recognized belligerent. Its guilt would be established by the passing of the laws in such a way as "colorable transfers." The measures of redress would be acts of reprisal and of hostility.

Nothing can be simpler or more conclusive than this view. But Britain has no wish to be impartial. She affects impartiality hoping that such a position will produce the catastrophe she desires. We say affects, deliberately, because while her ministers and most of her leading papers were continually exclaiming that British law should not be changed at the will of a belligerent, they quietly winked at the breaking of those laws in favor of other belligerent. Now that it is palpably dangerous to continue this game, Britannia ruefully abandons it. She revokes, but not until she has revealed the full value of her honor, friendship, and impartiality.

LITERARY.

"ELEANOR'S VICTORY," by Mr. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," etc. (Harpers), is the last novel, just now, of the most popular novelist of the moment. She is, we believe, usually writing two novels at a time, all of which are read, and seem one dramatized simultaneously in England, France, and America. It is an astonishing popularity, for the secret of which the books are explored in vain. The startling plot, and consequent movement, developed with no remarkable constructive or literary skill, but with more than ordinary interest, will account for the sale of the first part of the unbeaten and undoubted popularity awakens a curiosity which can only be satisfied by reading.

"A French Reading Book," by William I. Knapp, Professor of Modern Languages, in Madison University (Harpers), is unquestionably the best book of its kind. It is divided into two parts, with a vocabulary at the end. It introduces the student to the best French literature and its masters. The first part consists of a variety of brief and characteristic pieces from the most eminent older and modern authors; and the second part contains what the editor calls "the most perfect specimens of French composition." There are the Phedra of Racine, the ninth satire and epistle of Boileau, the Bourgeois Gentilhommes of Molière, and the Athalie of Racine. It is a most valuable and convenient class-book, legibly printed and neatly bound.

A SWORD AND A GOWN.

ALL England is laughing at Mr. Guy Livingston Lawrence. This worthy came over here, bringing a large pair of riding-boots, and a determination to offer his sword to the gallant, etc., etc., traitors. He has written a novel called "Sword and Gown" and failing to be impressed by the noble intention, the London wags said, "H-m-m-ves—offer his sword; and what will he do with his gown?" A silly young gentleman who arrived, ate canvas-back duck in Baltimore, flirted with the lively ladies of that city, and astonished them by his warlike performances in the celebrated boots, which, he assures us, had been paid for. When he got out of singing with the Maryland belles of the people's best which was on the shore, he tried to pass into the lines of the enemy, of this country, having escaped the gowns, to draw his sword against American citizens fighting for their country and government against a horde of slave-drivers. The Government authorities simply took him by the nape of the neck, locked him up, and then told him to run home and keep out of mischief. Spite of his formidable boots and biceps, the pitiful amateur rebel hastened to sweat, and running home, now turns about and blacksguards us, which, Colonel laughs still more, is quality at his return that it did at his going forth.

Mr. Guy Livingston, having ludicrously failed with the "Sword," should at once betake himself to the "Gown," and a very long one—long enough to hide the boots. I like not, when a woman has a great beard. I spy a great beard under her muffler."

FROM PRIVATE P.

DEAR LOUNGER,—Shall we whip or be whipped? That is the question for all of us nowadays. But instead of giving significance to victory or defeat, is another. Shall principle or prejudice be our standard? Here are some millions of persons of a peculiar class, who, for a centuries past, have held peculiar relations to our peculiar class, and the relations have now to be readjusted either on the old basis or a new.

The old relation has been that of a subject to a dominant race—the lower hated and oppressed by the upper with an intensity and activity that have seldom been equaled. The relation has been maintained by all the force of statute and compact, political intrigue, and social ostracism. The South aggravated the case as far as it could go, and made property of its victims. In the North it has been with more atrocious. The North has recognized and co-operated with the Southern dictum, and has added to it the bitterness of malignant and canvassing prejudice.

This old relation, like most others among us, has now its foundations unsettled, and the question is, Shall we settle them back in their old positions and re-establish the old matters upon them with new strength, or shall we clean them out utterly and establish a revolutionist security founded in justice and equity and redeemed honor? In other words, shall we, peiper ourselves, or shall we keep our heads?

The initial act or our national existence pledged us to equity and justice. The present war involves the fundamental principles of our national existence. The manifest conflict was adopted as savey the nation forward had this principle for its motive power. We have accepted the principle as our banner forward in, and have voluntarily come to it as our watchword. In every form, in every quarter of earth and heaven. We are sworn to ever way, now to stand by it. Shall we cowardly subside, or shall we keep our oath?

Shall we say to the negro, "do you know what you are doing? You are running into abolitionism and nigger equality. You have been in my regiment.

"This has nothing to do with the case. These men are men, and our oath applies to men, not Caucasians.

"But you are white negroes, I tell you." Shall we leave the niggers running around here loose, putting on style, and setting up for voting against us? Nothing with us. I don't want the niggers catching up in any such way."

"That's it. You stand by your color and your policy. Your likes and dislikes are on one side, and our oath and nations principle are on the other. Which shall rule? Your likes and dislikes, your prejudices, or our oaths? I have more authority than my own dislikes to govern; I dislike to be a nigger driver, but I am one. I dislike to be a murderer; I don't want a murderer in the ranks hand. You don't want a gambler in the ranks. You don't want a man who chews tobacco. Suppose you and I enlisted on prejudices. Then suppose every other man enforces his prejudices, and we will have a mob. Principle, not prejudice, matter is not to be decided by your likes or my dislikes. We are to be governed by principle, and prejudice must be to decide on principle. We have sworn always by the Declaration of Independence to maintain and redeem ourselves, if at all, by honoring a practicality.

"Nigger equality. There it is, but—

Yes, there it is. It must be considered, not color, that shall adjust the scale of relation among us. We must treat man as man, and not as Caucasian. We must, whatever his color, govern himself ourselves to exercise in the rights and to meet the duties of men. In no other case, every man, whatever his color, must be allowed to use his prerogatives. The test must be character, not color. Shall we, then, all Democrats and negroes, let the negro be true; what then? He (the negro, not Seymour) is a man, and as such must be treated. He is responsible, as a man's chances and a man's responsibilities, a man's rewards and a man's punishments.

What other adjustment is worthy of Americans, save an adjustment on the Declaration of Independence? We will not have a negro equality that will make the negro the only land on God's earth where principle is the policy; that will make the negro the only man who is denied his wealth; where the natural grandeur is only the aggregate of individual meanness. We will not have equality but the radiance of universal equality. How long shall we heap up shame by keeping all this a lie? It is worth while to think about, however, that in the presence of God and man that we may indulge a cowardly, paltry, imbecile dislike to a man because he is black, or the color of certain class, or the shape of certain feet?

It will not be long before a unpleasant qualm and must an inconvenient effort to submit to the arrangement of matters on the basis of right instead of prejudice, but so it will be, and we may as cheerfully as we can begin to do it shape. We will have to put up with our inconveniences. Principle must be followed, and we must live up to principles may not be dishonored by others. Shall we not? Yours truly, PRIVATE P.

CAMP DOUGLAS, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

A NEW THING FOR SMOKERS.

WHAT my Uncle Toby would have said to the "Ridgewood Pipe and Tobacco Case," which he would have found at 429 Broadway, it is not easy to imagine. But King James I., who hated tobacco and Parliament, would have blown a "counterblast" against it as a vile Yankee invention by which the sinful smoker carries his pouch and pipe and matches all together in one convenient case, and fills his pipe by pulling a wire before opening the case, and cleans it thoroughly by the simplest contrivance in the world. It is impossible to describe as he clasps the case and slips it away in his pocket, that smoking is now made easier and pleasanter than ever before.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL HOOKER left Washington on 10th to enter on active service. Major-General Pleasonton will act as his and will continue to be General HOOKER'S Chief of Staff.

Brigadier-General Rufus Saxton, U. S. A., has been ordered from Beaufort to Hilton Head, S. C., and has directed that he will be retired from active service, as, since the promotion of Major-General Hunter, he is the only officer equal to the fatigue and excitement incidental to service in the field.

Colonel Ulric Dahlgren, who was promoted from a captaincy in the regular army, was killed while bearing dispatches to General Lee at the battle of Gettysburg, has been ordered to report to the Secretary of War, who no doubt will not enable him to take the field at present.

Colonel Thomas Sewall, who was killed in the San Francisco, California, where he will report to General Halleck for duty.

Major-General Sigourney is said to have tendered his resignation, and it is rumored that Major-General Howard will succeed him.

It is stated that the resignation of General Burnside has been accepted.

Lieutenant-Colonel Forsyth, of the Twelfth Loyal Virginia Infantry, is now treated as a traitor by the rebels, and imprisoned in a felon's dungeon at Richmond. The rebel authorities have been notified that a rebel prisoner of equal rank will be subjected to similar treatment unless he be at once put on the same footing with other prisoners of war.

The sentence of death in the case of Private James VAUGHAN, Company B, Thirteenth Ohio Volunteers, has been commuted to confinement for three months at hard labor, with forfeiture of pay and allowance due or to become due until the expiration of his sentence.

DR. ALEXANDER M'DONALD and the Rev. Mr. SCANDLIN, of the Sanitary Commission, held an prisoners in Richmond, arrived at Washington last week, state that the report that Captains FLYNN and SAWYER had been executed is untrue. They were treated with great inhumanity at first; but when the rebels learned that General W. H. Lee and Colonel WIRTZ were held as hostages, they were removed from the dungeon in which they had been kept by their friends, and now have the same privileges as other Union officers.

The case of Captain WILLIAM WOODBURY, Second Minnesota Volunteers, convicted of using disloyal language, and sentenced to death, in the absence of Lincoln, the United States service has been commuted to forfeiture of all emoluments.

First Lieutenant MERRILL HUME, Fourth Kentucky Volunteers, and Second Lieutenant HARRISON, Company G, Twelfth regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, have both been dismissed the service for having shaved without leave and the latter for embezzling public property.

Private DENVER MCCARTY, Company B, Twenty-third Illinois Volunteers, having been convicted of a deadly assault upon Brigadier-General Veatch with intent to kill, he speak, has been sentenced to be shot, and the sentence has been approved by the President.

Captain OLIVER OWENS, Fifth New York Artillery, convicted of forging his brother officers' names, has been dismissed the service.

Lieutenant-Colonel PEARCE and one hundred and eleven rebel officers, captured at Cumberland Gap by General Burnside, have arrived at Johnson's Island.

On the 2d of July, General CHARLES H. GRAHAM was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Gettysburg. He was shot through the lungs, and was taken to Richmond, where he remained until recently, when he was exchanged and sent to Fortress Monroe. He is now on his way to Annapolis by a party of prominent citizens, who exchanged as civilians to meet him on the route.

The following are among the naval orders recently issued:

Captain CHARLES S. BOGGS, detached from the Sacramento, and ordered to the command of the Sacramento.

Lieutenant-Commander JOSEPH E. DURAHTD, detached from the Sacramento, and ordered to the command of the Schooge.

Lieutenant-Commander F. B. LOWRY, detached from the Metamora and ordered to the command of the Tuscay.

Lieutenant-Commander EDWARD E. JOHNSON, detached from the Tuscay and ordered to the command of the Metamora.

Lieutenant-Commander CHARLES F. STANTON, detached from the Metamora, and ordered to the command of the Pinola.

Lieutenant-Commander C. H. E. BENHAM, ordered to the command of the Penobscot.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN C. DELPHATY, detached from the Penobscot, and ordered to the command of the Schooge.

Lieutenant-Commander R. B. LOWRY, detached from the Metamora and ordered to the command of the Tuscay.

Lieutenant-Commander EDWARD E. JOHNSON, detached from the Tuscay and ordered to the command of the Metamora.

Lieutenant-Commander CHARLES F. STANTON, detached from the Metamora, and ordered to the command of the Pinola.

Lieutenant-Commander C. H. E. BENHAM, ordered to the command of the Penobscot.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN C. DELPHATY, detached from the Penobscot, and ordered to the command of the Schooge.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN C. DELPHATY, detached from the Schooge, and ordered to the command of the Penobscot.

Lieutenant-Commander C. H. E. BENHAM, detached from the command of the gun-boat Kanawha, is ordered to the command of the Penobscot.

Government has received intelligence that Colonel Corcoran and Colonel Lee Wilson men have been exchanged from Georgia dungeons to Richmond, and are now treated as officers and gentlemen. The case of Dr. Heir confinement has wrought by retaliatory measures adopted by the Government. Dr. MCDONALD will be held for exchange for General NEAL DOW.

General MCCLELLAN arrived at Philadelphia on 29th ult., and was serenaded at the residence of his mother, Mrs. MARY MCCLELLAN, in Spruce street, in the presence of a large crowd of his admirers and friends. He returned thanks for the compliment in a few words.

Colonel JOHNS, of the celebrated "Leonis Battery," has received a dispatch from Chattanooga stating that the battery of which he is the commander became by lot in duty in the early part of the battle of Chattanooga, were recaptured before the battle was over.

The War Department has ordered a Court of Inquiry to investigate the charges against Major-General M'COOK and TENNEYS in the late battles near Chattanooga.

The fleet of iron-clads now assembled in our harbor was reinforced on 29th by the arrival of three English and two French iron-clads, and by English vessels named the Nile, line-of-battle ship, from Halifax; Ariadne, frigate, from Bermuda; Phaeton, dispatch boat, from Halifax. The French vessels are the Guerriere, frigate, from Halifax; and the steam-frigate Belleisa.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

DISPATCHES have been received from General Rosecrans which state that he is posted in a natural strong-hold from which he can not be removed. Also, that the enemy has made no attack since the 20th ult.

Quarter-master-General Meigs arrived at Rosecrans's headquarters on 29th ult., and upon invitation examined the position of the army. He declared that it can not be flanked by a regular siege, which Bragg does not seem to be attempting.

THE LATEST REBEL ACCOUNTS.

A dispatch, dated Augusta, Georgia, Saturday, September 26, says:

Several trains with wounded and prisoners have arrived.

Reports of the condition of affairs above are conflicting. We are inclined to believe that the enemy are fortifying Chattanooga. Our lines are within four miles of the place. There was no fighting yesterday.

General Bragg has issued a flag of truce, asking permission to bury their dead and relieve their wounded. General Bragg refused to grant them.

THE WOUNDED AND PRISONERS.

A Nashville dispatch says: Trains from the front are coming in with wounded rebel Confederate prisoners. Up to date about 1300 rebels have arrived here, among them Colonel J. C. Moffett, Adjutant-General Preston, Major J. C. Davis, Eleventh Tennessee, and Major W. D. C. Bell, Fifty-first Tennessee, together with five Captains and eighteen Lieutenants. Among the Captains is E. D. Sayre, Chief Engineer of Bragg's staff.

Over 5000 wounded have reached here since Wednesday. Many more are coming, wounded some weeks ago by our sick and wounded, are again taken for the same hospitals.

Communication by telegraph has not yet been opened with Chattanooga, but reports are very numerous that Columbia.

Major Hodgkiss, of the Fourteenth Michigan, arrived here to-night with thirty-eight prisoners—among them one Captain and two Lieutenants of Wheeler's cavalry. He reports all quiet in front. Our forces were still fortifying.

BRAGG'S REPORTS.

CHICAGO, Sept. 29, 10 P. M. REBEL RECORDS, Sept. 29.

To General S. Cooper, A. and I. General:

GENERAL: Yesterday the enemy were driven the enemy, after a desperate resistance, from several positions, and we held the field. To-day the enemy confronts us.

The losses are heavy on both sides, especially to in our front.

We have taken over twenty pieces of artillery, and some twenty-five hundred prisoners.

BRAXTON BRAGG, General.

THE MILES SQUIRE OF CHATTANOOGA.

FOR SUBSCRIBERS, Sept. 30, 1863.

The enemy retreated on Chattanooga last night, leaving his dead and wounded in our hands. His loss in very large in killed, wounded, prisoners, and colors. Ours is heavy, but not yet ascertained.

The victory is complete, and our cavalry is pursuing.

With the blessing of God our troops have accomplished great results against largely superior numbers.

We have to mourn the loss of many gallant men and officers. Brigadier-Generals Preston Smith, Helm, and Deshler are killed; Major-General Hood and Brigadier-Generals Adams, Gregg, and Brown wounded.

BRAXTON BRAGG.

THE LATEST FROM CHARLESTON.

From Charleston advices to the 26th have come to hand. General Gillmore was still engaged getting siege guns into position. Stormy weather had prevented operations on the part of the army.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

All was quiet in front of the Army of the Potomac at latest dates.

CAVALRY AFFAIRS IN VIRGINIA.

There have been several cavalry encounters during the past few days between the advance forces of the armies in Virginia. On 28th a very spirited affair occurred three miles beyond Warrenton Court House, when General Buford encountered a strong force of the enemy's troopers, driving them back across the Rappahannock, killing twenty and taking 56 prisoners. Another affair occurred also on the same day near Rockville, Upper Maryland, between a body of rebel cavalry and a portion of Scott's Nine Hundred and some Loudon Rangers, in which the rebels lost 15 killed and wounded. Our casualties in these affairs were trifling. The guerrillas seem to have been exterminated by these operations.

AFFAIRS IN EAST TENNESSEE.

General Burnside has appointed General Carter Provost Marshal of East Tennessee, and the latter authorizes a policy in an order under date of Sept. 15. He says that it is the intention of the Government to punish persons who have been guilty of no offense but a tacit acquiescence in the acts of which the rebels has raised the flag of war to the last two years. Persons against whom no crime is charged will be released on taking the oath of allegiance. Where assist for damages will be allowed to take the oath of allegiance. General Burnside now holds East Tennessee and Virginia Road from Knoxville to Henderson, seventy-five miles, and the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad to have practical possession of to the place, but the bridges over Holston and Watauga and Osbornes, and the Watauga River at Loudon has been pontooned. When last heard of, Burnside was at Knoxville.

THE CAMPAIGN IN TEXAS.

The expedition to Texas has not been abandoned in consequence of the disaster at Galveston. We learn from New Orleans that the movement will now be made from Brazos Santiago. Large force to be sent there, and taking were going forward as rapidly as the transportation facilities would admit. The force will consist of the Nineteenth Army Corps. The occupation of Texas may be regarded as a fixed fact. Banks, Grant, and Canby, each has his station to the Red River region, under General Herron, had made perfect preparations for the campaign. Refugees have infested the banks of the Mississippi, between Vicksburg and Port Hudson.

THE WAR IN ARKANSAS.

Colonel Chief, of General Blunt's command, arrived at Little Rock on the 4th ult. with a small force of cavalry. Colonel Cloud with a battalion of the Second Kansas Cavalry, and Colonel Phillips with a force of several Cabal Indian forces, two thousand strong, in the defenses between Perryville and Fort Smith, Indian Territory, and secure in retreating them with considerable loss. He also defeated a rebel force under Colonel Coffee, at Cane Hill, capturing his camp and commissary stores. Over two thousand Union refugees from Arkansas and Missouri, and deserters from the rebel forces were arriving at Little Rock daily.

THE CORPS D'AFRIQUE.

Fifteen thousand of the corps d'Afrique, under General Banks, have been mustered in, and recruiting is active. The maximum strength is 25,000.

ANOTHER REBEL RAID.

Another female bread riot is reported to have taken place in Mobile on September 4, on which occasion the women broke into the stores and carried off what they could. The disturbance, but refused to do their duty. The Mobile Advertiser and Register says that the women appear to the infuriated women. The rioters openly declared that "if some means were not soon taken to provide them their suffering or to stop the war they would burn the city." The suffering in Mobile is said to be very great.

THE LEGAL TENDERS CONSTITUTIONAL.

The Court of Appeals at Albany has decided that the legal tender act passed by the Legislature are constitutional, and by its decision confirms that made in the Seventh Judicial District which it overturns one made in this district. This settles a serious question, that has heretofore caused some unpleasant doubts to be felt by many people.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE INTERVENTION RUMOR.

EARL RUSSELL alluded pointedly to the American question in the course of a public speech in Dundee, Scotland. He stated that the British Government had determined from her neutrality, and that the rebel chances of intervention by the Palmerston ministry had been regarded as ended.

THE REBEL RAMS.

One of the rebel iron rams has been removed from Laird's yard to another establishment, preparatory to making her trial trip. Mr. Laird, Jun., assured the Liverpool Post that the rams will not be delivered to the Government on the part of the Government to detain the rams. All the Liverpool Custom House officers have notified he must not send the ships to sea.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

The confidence in the success of the new plan for laying the Atlantic telegraph cable in the summer of 1864 is daily increasing. Professor Fields, the Rev. Mr. Barlow, and others contracted to make the cable, but to successfully submerge it.

FRANCE.

THE CONTEST AT BREST.

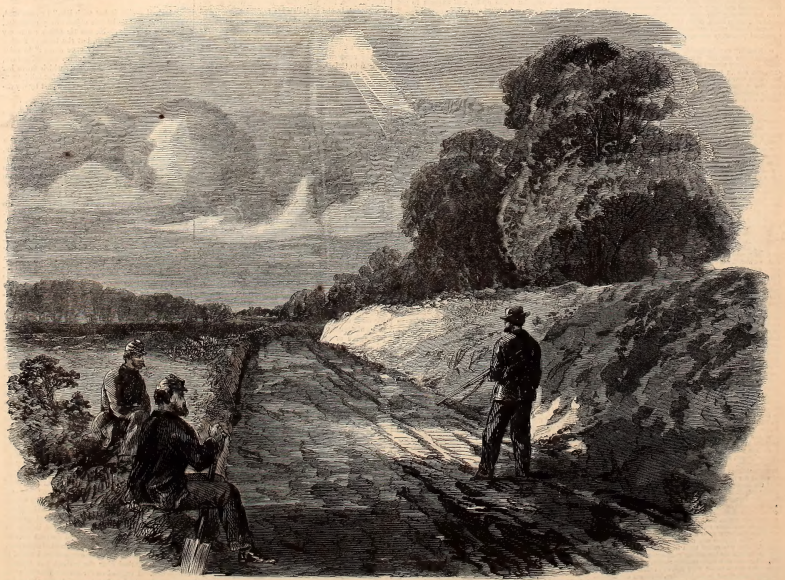
Captain Malli, of the pirate Florida, ran his vessel into difficulty by taking her to Brest. She was at first provisioned and allowed to repair by the Napoleonian naval officers. She claims an indemnity of 100,000 francs for a vessel sunk by the Federal cruiser Kaatskill; but the Government would not permit the seizure of the Florida to satisfy the claim, and consequently she was at once dismantled in the dock-yard of the Imperial navy.

It is rumored that the pirate Captain Malli intends to abandon his famous vessel at Brest and take command of another prize at Liverpool, having himself sworn to a discussion of the expediency of applying the measures claimed on behalf of England by the three great Powers.

JAPAN.

THE BRITISH WHIPPED.

Japanese accounts reached Hakodadi on the 20th of August that the British fleet, which had been dispatched to Kagosima to demand the surrender of the murderers of Richardson, had encountered a heavy fire from a number of batteries of the Japanese, which riddled the greater portion of the fleet, and caused the balance to retire from the contest.



THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE NEW BLACK ISLAND BATTERIES, FOUR AND A HALF MILES FROM CHARLESTON.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 651.]

1. 15-inch Shell.—2. Torpedo.—3. Mortar Shell.—4. Brooke (Rebel).—5. 100-pounder Parrott.—6. 200-pounder Parrott.—7. Brooke (Rebel).—8. 300-pounder Parrott.—9. Whitworth Bolt (Rebel).—10. Brooke (Rebel).—11. James.—12. Anglo-Rebel.—13. Hand-Grenade.—14. Greek Fire.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—SHOT AND SHELL PILED IN FRONT OF GENERAL GILMORE'S TENT.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 651.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE COVERED WAY LEADING TO THE BLACK ISLAND BATTERIES.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 651.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We publish on pages 648 and 649 a large engraving representing one of the final reviews of a corps d'armée in the Army of the Potomac previous to the present southward movement. It is seldom that the artist, in drawing a picture of a review, succeeds in conveying to the spectator the idea of immense numbers of men; a few regiments in the fore-ground generally shut out the bulk of the army from sight. Mr. Nast has, we think, overcome this difficulty, and has shown us a whole corps d'armée in active evolution. A nobler sight it is seldom possible to witness.

On page 653 we reproduce a sketch of Mr. Wand's representing

HEAD-QUARTERS.

Mr. W. writes:

"Since General Meade has been in command a marked change has been apparent in head-quarter arrangements. All the cover now consists of a single fly, under the weather is a few tent flies, which are pitched like a small gable roof, as seen in the sketch, open on all sides. The wagon train is left in the rear, and a few light vehicles and ambulances, to carry the necessary blankets and frugal supplies of the officers, is all that accompanies the staff. The drawing represents the local habitation of the medical director, Dr. Letterman, who, in company with the head-quarter General, Dr. Da Boyce, and Dr. Davis, are to be seen taking soup on the ground by their fly. The camp is in a fine grove of oaks."

On the same page will be found the description of a rifleman using the dead body of a horse as a rest for his weapon—a scene of not uncommon occurrence during the recent campaign.

THE DISASTER AT SABINE PASS.

We reproduce on page 652 a drawing by Mr. James Ferguson, of Company A, First Indiana Artillery, representing the unsuccessful attack of a Union fleet upon the rebel fort at Sabine Pass on 8th September.

The expedition, under command of General Franklin, was intended to occupy Sabine Pass as a base of future operations in Texas. Four lightdraught gun-boats accompanied the troops—the Clifton, Arizona, Sachem, and Granite City. After a preliminary reconnoissance the plan of battle was arranged. We quote the following account from the New York Herald correspondence:

The gun-boats Clifton, Arizona, and Sachem, were to engage the main work, while the Granite City, which mounted only a brace of small brass guns, was to cover the landing of the troops. The force of the expedition was composed of a division, selected from the heroes of Fort Hudson, consisting of two regiments of infantry, the Nineteenth and Thirty-fifth New York, four companies of the One Hundred and Twenty-first New York, and the Sabine Legion of Captain Pfitt. Of the last-named regiment the General himself was on board at the last moment to superintend personally the operation of disembarking his troops.

"All ready" was the signal, and about four o'clock P. M. the gun-boats moved slowly forward, Captain Crocker running directly toward the fort, followed by the Granite City, and she in turn by the transports, the former having on board the advance of the army. The Sachem and the Arizona steamed off to the right, and the fleet nearly opposite the battery. The Clifton opened the ball with a shell from one of her 9-inch pivot guns, which exploded inside the rebel work, throwing up a perfect shower of debris, and inaugurating a scene of excitement of the most exciting kind. Soon the little Sachem, commanded by Captain Johnson, opened her broadside fire, pounding away at the work, and the next moment the Arizona also paid her compliments to the fort. The gunners were stationed on four of the shells only exploding prematurely, and the pieces flying overboard in a shower. Up to this point, from thirty to forty shells had exploded in the works, not a shot had been returned by the rebels, and every appearance pervaded the fort, and many were of opinion that the works had been abandoned. Subsequent events, as the habitants made their appearance, and the only signs of life appeared in the movements of a small steamer up in the river, which had run up above the city and down as far as the fort once or twice during the bombardment, and was joined by a second steamer about the time the action commenced.

The action of the enemy, however, was the deceptive calm which often precedes the storm, and the first flash of flame which was plainly visible from the deck of the General Banks lit up the beaked eye, and the first white smoke which floated lazily up from the parapet of the enemy, was immediately followed by a terrific report from the Arizona, the largest boat of the fleet, and which passed directly over, striking in the edge of the bank in the fort. This was followed in quick succession by a shot at the Sachem and one at the Clifton, both missing fire, however, took effect. The engagement now became general, and very soon the Clifton and Arizona received a shot through and back, while the brave little Sachem, under a perfect storm of shot and bursting shells, was endeavoring to pass the battery and engage it in the rear, which was supposed to be unmanned. The enemy discovered the movement, and redoubled their fire at her, answered fire for fire in the narrow basin, the huge shells from the rebel battery in their midst, carrying destruction in their wake, and leaving great holes in the parapet, through the gunport of sufficient size to admit the passage of a carriage and horses. Several shells struck the Sachem during the fight, and if their fire slackened an instant after one of those terrific explosions, which seemed to rend the vessel's earth around them, it was instantly resumed with increased vehemence. The unshielded fastenings of the rudder, by not saving the little Sachem was gaining her desired position, a few minutes more, and she would be out of the range, and the day would be won. All eyes were bent upon the rebel battery, when suddenly a shell was seen to strike her steadfast, crashing in her sides, and tearing their way through to the protection of the engineer's room, a piece of paper, and causing her to curse and tremble from stem to stern. An instant more, and the vessel was wrapped in the scalding vapor of escaping steam, and lay a helpless wreck at the mercy of the enemy. The fire was redoubled and the enemy, ceasing their fire on her, now turned their entire attention to the Clifton, probably aware of the fact that the draught of the Arizona would not permit her to advance very much nearer to the fort without grounding. The disabling of the Sachem at the instant when victory was within her grasp was the severest blow the unfortunate accidents referred to, and was, of course, of so serious a character as to dispirit the entire crew of the little craft. The Clifton was now the only effective boat engaged. She was called upon to do double duty, and no doubt her brush did her gallant commander and brave crew fortitude, for with the three rousing cheers, which were heard above the battle, they poured in their fire, running to and fro from the battery to the bank, as the nature or thirst for of the entire rebel fortification.

Fighting on one broad side of steam the Clifton ran swiftly down directly toward the battery, with the intention, doubtless, of delivering her broadside, and then, after giving Granite City and the General Banks gradually followed in her wake, for the purpose of reaching the point of debarkation as soon as the Clifton had effected her object, although the latter could shell and hissing shell which were incidentally alone on the water, almost reaching the fort as the Clifton gained the point she aimed at. Nearing, and as her bow was thrown almost slightly to the left of turning, she struck, the velocity with which she was running driving her a long distance into the thin mud at the bottom of the pass. At the same time a hitherto masked battery opened on the fleet of the gun-boats, and a fiery rage, opened upon her as she lay, her broadside offering a target of which she cannot have failed to avail herself. The gallant Crocker still kept up a constant fire from both fore and broadside guns, with grape, canister, and shell, double charges of grape, being poured into the main work, the heavy shot also striking the parapet, and doing much for the enemy by scarce, while with his broadside guns he apparently did not show any desire to make solid shot to the battery on the left. Lying as he did, he would probably have succeeded in silencing the main work, and in landing the troops to land, had it not been for the broadside work; for it is more than his boat was disabled. Up to this time she had sustained no material damage. The shots which had struck her had been harmless to the ship, and but very few of his crew were injured. But fate was against him, and the tide was receding rapidly. Even from the small battery struck his boat about the centre, passing through the side and exploding in the hold, leaving her a stranded wreck at the enemy's mercy. The flag was instantly lowered; but the fire was still continued, both from the boat and the batteries. It must have been about that the captain was killed, as he must have been killed and the crew left without a leader. An instant more, and just when a shot was passing from the enemy was poured into the stern little craft, the white flag was run up and the firing ceased. Every engagement on the field of war has been usually forms had been sacrificed upon the altar of their country, but unlike the Arizona, the Clifton was now the only effective boat engaged. She was called upon to do double duty, and no doubt her brush did her gallant commander and brave crew fortitude, for with the three rousing cheers, which were heard above the battle, they poured in their fire, running to and fro from the battery to the bank, as the nature or thirst for of the entire rebel fortification.

Fighting on one broad side of steam the Clifton ran swiftly down directly toward the battery, with the intention, doubtless, of delivering her broadside, and then after Sachem an opportunity of picking off the enemy's gunners and thus silencing the works. At the same time the Granite City and the General Banks gradually followed in her wake, for the purpose of reaching the point of debarkation as soon as the Clifton had effected her object, although the latter could shell and hissing shell which were incidentally alone on the water, almost reaching the fort as the Clifton gained the point she aimed at. Nearing, and as her bow was thrown almost slightly to the left of turning, she struck, the velocity with which she was running driving her a long distance into the thin mud at the bottom of the pass. At the same time a hitherto masked battery opened on the fleet of the gun-boats, and a fiery rage, opened upon her as she lay, her broadside offering a target of which she cannot have failed to avail herself. The gallant Crocker still kept up a constant fire from both fore and broadside guns, with grape, canister, and shell, double charges of grape, being poured into the main work, the heavy shot also striking the parapet, and doing much for the enemy by scarce, while with his broadside guns he apparently did not show any desire to make solid shot to the battery on the left. Lying as he did, he would probably have succeeded in silencing the main work, and in landing the troops to land, had it not been for the broadside work; for it is more than his boat was disabled. Up to this time she had sustained no material damage. The shots which had struck her had been harmless to the ship, and but very few of his crew were injured. But fate was against him, and the tide was receding rapidly. Even from the small battery struck his boat about the centre, passing through the side and exploding in the hold, leaving her a stranded wreck at the enemy's mercy. The flag was instantly lowered; but the fire was still continued, both from the boat and the batteries. It must have been about that the captain was killed, as he must have been killed and the crew left without a leader. An instant more, and just when a shot was passing from the enemy was poured into the stern little craft, the white flag was run up and the firing ceased. Every engagement on the field of war has been usually forms had been sacrificed upon the altar of their country, but unlike the Arizona, the Clifton was now the only effective boat engaged. She was called upon to do double duty, and no doubt her brush did her gallant commander and brave crew fortitude, for with the three rousing cheers, which were heard above the battle, they poured in their fire, running to and fro from the battery to the bank, as the nature or thirst for of the entire rebel fortification.

Fighting on one broad side of steam the Clifton ran swiftly down directly toward the battery, with the intention, doubtless, of delivering her broadside, and then after Sachem an opportunity of picking off the enemy's gunners and thus silencing the works. At the same time the

THE GHOST IN THE GREEN PARK.

"My name is Lane Daly. I am of the Dalys of Fermoy—good family, but sadly reduced in means, like many another Irish house, by prolonged improvidence. I was a younger son, and as a consequence inherited little more than a foolish pride, a monstrous pedigree, and that phantom property, a contingent interest in an over-encumbered estate. But these were excuses enough for keep an Irishman from industry. I was never trained to any profession. I seemed destined to live a gentleman's dead. I was brought up with independent notions without independent means. I received an accidental share of my father's education, as the neighborhood of the family estate. Then, as a young man, a brief career of life in Dublin, where I acquired little except the science of debt, and I came to London fortune seeking.

I had name and connections, although I had not money, and moreover, every Irishman has a right to a place or a station, whom he looks up to, and expects to get something from. A promise is the general result of whatever word he is in the habit of using. So with others, dangled attendance at a great man's levée, in the hope of advancement I never received. He was one of those unfortunate public servants—a man who seemed a patron, and arrogated to himself the airs of one, without ever doing a single action to merit his fame. I lived upon him for a long past. I was a young man then. I am not now so old as you perhaps deem me. I am now but little more than thirty, though I am often by my seem older. I was young, and as a necessary adjunct to youth, I was penniless.

"The family of the Monckton have been, as you are doubtless aware, for many years distinguished in the annals of London, and of this country for their enormous wealth and influence. The late Sir John Monckton had one daughter—Margaret. Of her exquisite beauty I will not attempt to elaborate description. Here is her portrait, painted about the date of my first meeting with her, by a French artist of some fame. Is it not beautiful."

He took from his breast-pocket a morocco-leather miniature case and handed it to me. It included the portrait of a woman, young, and surpassingly fair. For some minutes the charming expression of innocence and contemplative purity depicted in the miniature held me spell-bound. I had never, in fact, cease and returned it to him, motioning my thanks.

"In mind," he went on, "she was as fair as in form. And here I should state—you know me so slightly it is necessary—that not one thought of the kind in which she was concerned ever entertained the truthfulness of my love for Margaret Monckton. I believe that had I met her even in the very humblest position in life I should have loved her less. I had frequent opportunities of seeing her. I was admitted to her father's house, and received there on the usual terms of visiting guests. That the cadet of a needy Irish family should aspire to the hand of an English heiress was looked upon as a danger too absurd to be considered. So my love grew and swelled unchecked within me, until my surcharged heart broke down beneath the burden. My circumstances were the bar to my words. I betrayed myself. You can guess the result. The door of Sir John Monckton's house was thenceforth forever closed against me, while sunk in poverty and my love. But how unpardonable are these in a lover's eyes!

"The father of Margaret had views of his own in relation to his daughter's hand. There were other matches spoken of for her, and I did not be considered. What could be more important than strengthening his political connections, than enlarging the arena of his parliamentary influence, than had decided upon the marriage of his daughter with a General Galiou, a man of high family and great wealth, who had returned from an important colonial appointment to marry and be buried in his native land. Obedience is a nobler virtue than love—the conviction can not be too soon grafted into the heart of a child. Filial piety is rightly built in high places.

"Lord Galiou was a man of a happy temperament, and a happy temperament is a fortune. To promote parental pride! Does not the philosopher do you think, champions of liberty abroad, are you the man to ask a happy father, basking and joying with their children's joys, weighing their hearts but as feathers in the scale against political advancement and sordid ambition?

He spoke with violence, and then paused for some minutes, as though overcome with his exertion.

"She loved me," he continued, in a low voice, and speaking slowly and with effort. "Yet she prepared to obey her father's commands. There was something touching—It was pitiable to be condemned—in her compliance with a bidding which was breaking her heart. In the interval between my dismissal and the final arrangement of her marriage I had written to her beseeching an interview. Trembling, for it is that we love most, she had acted willfully in opposition to her father, she granted my request. Our meeting was a strange mingling of happiness and suffering—joy and pain, and outbursts of regret. In vain did we attempt to read the ties that united us. Each interview delicate to the interference of eternal silence, ended in an arrangement for a further meeting. I saw her again and again. Sir John Monckton resided in one of those houses in St. James's Place, the gardens of which run down to the Green Park. A place of meeting was beneath a lime-tree, in a secluded part of the inclosure. Margaret had free access to the park in the early part of the morning, and by indistinguishable mark on the bark of the tree she was enabled to indicate to me the hour at which she could probably escape from her father's house for a meeting in the gardens. The gardens—a portion of the law that she could descend from it into the park, or return thence, without difficulty or much fear of detection.

"What hours of happiness did we pass in the calm of those summer evenings, beneath the shadow of the lime-tree, forgetful of surrounding evil, the dangers which menaced it, by the despair in which it was inevitably to end.

"Let me hurry on. It was the night before the wedding. The forthcoming marriage had been published throughout the town. Sick with terror, Margaret and myself met in the tree—fell weeping upon my bosom. Once more she enabled after much difficulty to resume the receipt of my annuity. This furnished me with little more than a bare subsistence. My personal wants are small, and every farthing not absorbed by these I have expended in the prosecution of my love-suit. Spies were visited every town in Europe, making inquiries far and near as I proceeded. I have visited every cove, near where I could dream of her being by any possibility secluded. I have called in the aid of the police. I have sent agents here, there, in Germany. I wander from one to the other, searching, waiting, hoping. All, all in vain. I can not find her. She is lost! she is dead!

There was a dreadful accent of despair in his words.

"And you have now resigned your quest?" I asked.

"I shall resign it but with my life," he answered, solemnly. "I shall be able to search for her elsewhere. I live for this only. No one tie unites me to my fellows, or to this earth, but the hope of finding Margaret. Ah, my friend," he cried with the cried with passion, "to assure her of my unceasing love, to win her pardon for the wrong which drove her from me, to soothe the sorrows of her fatherless orphanage, to efface the anguish of the past by my devotion!"

"You have not seen her for fifteen years?"

"No," and then after a pause, he added, "unless I saw her last night."

"You think you saw her this morning?"

"Listen. I seek her every where. No place is too exalted, no spot too low for my search. By night and day and night have I pursued it. In the palace as in the cellar, in the church-yard and in the prison I search for her. Last night a strange scene it had been better she should have died a hundred times than have lived to know, I have carried on my search. In the day I pursue it in accord with probabilities, I seek her systematically every where. I extend my toil through the night, even into the hours of the morning. Then I have pondered to that lime-tree in the park, consecrated by her memory, and have loved down in the hope that I may meet her yet once again before I die. I am known to the police, who regard me possibly as a madman, accustomed to their keen seen to them strange things. Hence my rambles by day or night receive from them no hindrance nor molestation.

"It was a cold night. The ground had been covered for some days with a frozen snow. There was no moon, but the stars were out, shining brilliantly in their pale, was splendor. The white ground and the cold, clear air rendered objects vividly distinct, even at a considerable distance. I strode toward the lime-tree, and when within some fifty yards of it, perceived what I fancied was a figure. It was from the opposite direction, had already reached the tree: the form of a woman about the height of Margaret, and the white dress I could hear no sound of other footsteps than my own, crunching on the congealed snow. The figure was now beneath the tree. Only before me I recognized a pale, thin face, and a figure clothed in black and floating garments. I gasped for breath. It was not from visual recognition, however, as from the conviction of some inner feeling I knew that it was she! My blood mounted to my brain, and with a shout I dashed over in the direction from which it had come. I followed, greatly agitated. I sought to overtake her, but I kept in advance of me. It moved toward the park gate on Constitution Hill, passed through, and disappeared. I ran to the gate. To my amazement I found it locked. I climbed over the railing, but I could see no one. I walked on for some minutes in the direction in which I had seen the figure, but the figure had turned. At length I encountered a policeman carrying his lantern, and beating himself with his disengaged arm to keep himself warm. In reply to my questions, I learned that he had not seen a foul upon his boat for some two hours. Bewildered and excited, I hurried past him. For miles I walked on without pause. But fruitlessly. The figure had escaped me, and I returned toward town much and painfully moved.

"I know how the world would receive the story of this strange occurrence. I should be ridiculed as a monomaniac, or science would tell me that I was the victim of a spectral illusion; the result of unstrung nerves or disordered brain. Yet, as certainly as I stand here, as plainly as I can see you facing me, on the night in question did I see the form of Margaret, my wife, beneath the lime-tree in the Green Park. I am not more satisfied of my own existence than of that."

"But how did she escape you? How did she quit the park?"

For some minutes he did not answer.

"In these days," he said, at length, "it seems to me that men have become so learned they have taught themselves to dispense with belief, and have rejected faith unnecessary. The supernatural is regarded as an old nurse's tale, fit only to frighten children. To credit aught out of the pale of the commonplace is scorned as credulity. I am born of a country where ignorance embalms belief—where superstition is a religion. Tales of omens, of banshees, of wraiths, and all the wonderful poetry of the mysteries, were among the first lessons impressed upon my childish mind, and have always deeply fixed there to be effaced by either education, or age, or experience. Smile if you will. I do not believe that it was Margaret's wife at my side, but as I believe in Heaven, I believe that it was her wraith. It was Margaret—not in the flesh—but in the spirit."

"You believe her dead, then?"

"No," he cried, starting up. "I can not believe her dead—and yet I should die myself could I think that. No. She is living still. She may be in trouble, perhaps in pain; and her gentle spirit in some ecstasy of longing has for a term escaped its material bondage, to hover near the spot it has most loved of all the earth. Oh, my wife, where she must be now—pale, calm, and beautiful—come to me in spirit, to warn—to bid obey, perhaps! I can not know. She may be dying, she may be dead. I can not reason upon this. I can give you no such explanation as would satisfy modern science; but I saw—and I do, believe!"

"And your next step?"

"Continued search. The same pow brought me these letters."

He took from his pocket a packet of papers, among which were the letters he referred to. Two of them were written on thin paper, and bore foreign post-marks. The third was a London letter, posted apparently in an adjoining neighborhood.

"This tells me," he said, opening the last, "that there is some one residing in a street in Camden Town, answering to the description of what I seek. It is a mistake. I have made inquiries. This is from Paris. My correspondent informs me, that at the fourth door, No. 32 Rue des Martyrs, resides Madame Winter, stated to be German, but believed to be English—age about thirty-three—lives retired. This is the last. In it she gives particulars concerning a Madame d'Audry, residing in a secluded street, in the outskirts of the city. One of my correspondents may be right. It is likely enough that they both are. It will not be the first time by many that they have been so. But I start tomorrow on this new trace. To Paris first, and then on.

"And now I'm growing late, and I have detained you long. Thank you for your kind interest and attention, and good-night. I will write to you from the Continent. And you will see me on return. Think over my strange story—believe it —if you can—for it is true. I am no madman, tell those who think me so—and my strange doings have had an object. Good-night!"

I assured him of my deep sympathy, and much moved by what I had heard, I left him.

II.

A YEAR and some five months intervened between my parting with Daly and our next meeting.

I had often pondered over Daly's strange narrative. I had never received the promised communications from abroad, and I began to think that I had lighted upon a thread of mystery which no effort of mine could ever rave out completely—that I had met with the first chapter of a romance of which the last part was to be forever withheld.

I was strolling in St. James's Park on a lovely evening in August. The weather was very sultry, and the sinking sun was still darting out hot rays between the branches of the trees that fell from behind the bars of a grate. The park was full of visitors, moving slowly about in an oppressed manner, hovering on the edge of the ornamental water, or reclining on the parched turf, trying to breathe some slight element that seemed was springing out of the lazy breathing of the evening air. I was idling amidst the idle, thankful to be out of the hot streets, or the hot rooms of a London house, and reckless as to the near approach of the hour for closing the park gates. Suddenly I saw before me a form I could hardly fail to recognize.

On one of the park seats encircling a tree, among a crowd of other loungers, but completely alone in mind from his neighbors, Daly was sitting, resting his hand upon his stick, and gazing abstractedly upon the scene before him. I was struck with the change in him. Ill as he had been at the time of my parting with him, he now appeared to be infinitely worse. His face had paled fearfully, as though sorrow were turning it to stone. Many, too, were the lines of suffering upon it. His hair had turned quite white—his whole frame was emaciated and bent. I have never seen any man assume in so short a time the signs of extreme age. He appeared to be lost in contemplation, and I felt for some minutes unwilling to disturb him, but as at length it became evident that I should not receive recognition unless I did so, I went to him and touched him gently on the shoulder. He started up instantly much agitated, but gradually recovering himself, he greeted me cordially, and rose to walk with me.

"I have often wished to see you," he said, "and I regret to have written to you. I promised to do so, I know. But my acquaintance with you was after all so slight. I had so poor a claim upon your sympathy, that, much as I desired to do so, I could not bring myself to write to you from abroad, or to seek you on my return to England a few weeks since. Pray, pardon me. Your kind welcomes assures me that I have done wrong in doubting for one moment your kind interest in me and my misfortunes."

His voice had lost its firmness. He spoke in a low and broken tone, and seemed to be wrestled with difficulty. He leaned upon my arm as we walked slowly away from the other sauntrers, who were turning their steps toward the park gates. He bore so much the mark of suffering, so fixed an air of disappointment if not despair was in his face, that I felt at once I was forbore to inquire as to the object which had drawn him from England. At length I questioned him upon the subject.

"All has failed," he said, in a tone of anguish. "The information I had received was founded upon error. I have had a long, long journey, and a fatiguing search, only to be parted—but all has been in vain. I have failed to find her, and have returned."

"You have resigned the task?"

"I am dying," he answered, solemnly.

I recollected his old declaration that he would give up his quest but with his life.

"I have enough medical learning to know that the work and I must soon be finished. I am not dying. I am prematurely worn-out by my great trouble. My pulse numbers little more than thirty beats to the minute. My strings are no rest. I lay my head upon the pillow only to pass hours of wakeful sorrow, and to rise each day more weary. I am not sick. Outside of the one fact that I am dying, from a bundle of letters in faded ink there fell a very thin envelope. It was of the same material as had seen on my visit to the dead man. The peculiarly beauty of the face struck me with new force, and Daly's words of the morning seemed unpreshensible. Soon after I discovered a letter of some years back from the brother of the deceased at Fermoy. I at once wrote to him with an account of his sudden loss.

The attempts to revive the body—the removal of the letter accompanied the paper—had all been together occupied some hours. It was early morning when I quitted Daly's lodgings. On my way home I met a friend, Mr. Dove Street, who I observed at the door of the police station a policeman posting a notice on the board outside. Moved by an impulse which I cannot explain, I went to read the bill. It was just from the printer's, and was quite wet. It was headed with the words "Found Drowned," and went on to state that the body of a woman had been that morning found in the Thames. She was clothed in mourning, very fair in complexion, with black hair slightly tinged with gray; age about thirty-five; figure slim and tall; there was no evidence upon her of her name or address. A strange feeling rose in my mind, connecting the description in the handbill with the letter I had seen in the park. I spoke to the policeman.

"Well," he said, "I know as much about it, perhaps, as any one. I was on the river the night, taking charge of an empty house in Stamford Street. I'd been on duty last night at the Lyceum Theatre, and was crossing Waterloo Bridge on my way home. I'd just got half-way across when I met a woman running. Lord, how she did run! I could just see that she was dressed in white as a sheet, and quite mad-like, and she'd passed me, I turned round. I thought something had gone wrong. A few yards off there was a bit of a sudden, as though struck by lightning. She had staggered from the pavement on to the road. Then she screamed out, 'I've seen him again—again! Dead! dead! dead!' She, I'm sure, must have heard the splash like. I ran toward her; it was no use; the quickest thing you ever saw. More like flying than anything else—a spring and over. She was as mad as could be!"

"What o'clock was it?"

"Well, just before I struck twelve by St. Paul's as I paid the toll to go across. It must have been all within the five minutes after. I ran back, gave the alarm, and got a boat off. It was no use. The tide was running up strong, and the night dark. It was some time before the body was picked up, and then it was close up to Hungerford. Quite dead, of course."

The body had been taken to the work-house, preparatory to the inquest. It was just in the same soiled clothes in which it had been drawn from the water. A sad sight! The face was thin and hollow, and there was a deep furrow on the forehead. The hands were emaciated, but of beautiful form. The hair streamed down in long, lank locks.

"A seamstress," said the policeman, as he raised the left hand and pointed to the forefinger. "Needle-worn, as from the action of a needle. "The old story, I suppose. She must have been a good-looking woman, too."

I came away strangely perplexed.

That any identity existed between the body found in the Thames and the Margaret of Daly's story—that any tie connected the death of the woman at Waterloo Bridge and the death of Daly in the Green Park, could only be maintained upon hypothesis long scouted as supernatural and illusive. I could not accept these in explanation of the strange occurrences that had come to my knowledge. While, on the other hand, I could not logically connect them in any other way in any other way. Many would have me believe that I have been made the dupe of a madman, and that the figure supposed to have been seen in the park was a hallucination resulting from an overstrained imagination; that the finding the body of the woman had nothing to do with Daly's narrative or his sudden death, and was a coincidence in no-wise remarkable. The resemblance of the face of the drowned woman to the portrait of Margaret was certainly faint enough to be a matter of fancy merely; but then the picture had avowedly been painted many years back, and the similarity of the corpse to the figure believed to have been seen in the park, so far as I had been able to define it, was unquestionable. Had I kept an accident stumbled, as it were, upon the conclusion of Lane Daly's story—or had I construed a fictitious whole by joining the two fragmentary romances? I shall never know. I can not even satisfy myself upon the subject, much less any other person. I have simply narrated the events as it seemed to me that they occurred.

The body of the woman was never claimed. An inquest upon the body of Daly resulted in a verdict that he had died by the visitation of God.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

YACHTING NEWS.

FROM ON NATIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

On Monday last a very fine race to the Library and back came off between the yachts seven Sheets Scott and the Leaves. Each carried as much canvas as they dared, considering the wind.—The Leaves was a pilot sloyen she is working for pups, and the Sessie the bruce she is living for Count Fred. The Leaves had a pretty fair thin head, and kept it to the end of the Parade, where some of her sheets got fouled with her earrings, and she had to die-te for repairs. The Leaves at this moment sailed up with all her canvas to the wind, and passed her. Her her advantage was not long kept, for a little way on she run into a patch of calm, and was passed by most of the steam-cakes. The collision, however, was not serious, and she reached the Library almost at the same moment as the Sessie. They both got round the buoy successfully, and finished a neck and neck for the home-stretch. This run home was effected in five minutes and twenty seconds.

A young man, on being asked by his sweet-heart what photography was, took out his pencil and wrote the following, telling her that was photography: "I D A D E I, I N!" (You are a beauty, Ellen.)

"I wish I had your head," said a lady, one day, to a gentleman who had a very large and handsome one. "And I wish I had your heart," was his reply. "Well," said she, "since your head and your heart can't agree, I don't see why they should not go into partnership."

A person complained to Dr. Franklin of having been insulted by one who called him a fool. "Indeed, sir!" replied the Doctor, "and what did you call him?" "Why," said he, "I called him a scoundrel." "Then," said the cool Franklin, "I presume you both spoke the truth."

A FAST FOR BACHELORS.—It is no less strange than true that the girdle most popular among unmarried ladies is a sash.

A young man and a female once upon a time stopped at a country tavern. Their awkward appearance excited the attention of one of the boarders, who entered into conversation with the female by inquiring how far she had traveled that day. "Traveled!" replied the young stranger, somewhat indignantly; "we didn't travel, we rid!"

Coleridge, the poet and philosopher, once arriving at an inn, called out, "Boy! waiter, do you drink gentlemen or individuals?" "Sir," replied the knight of the napkin, "we drink all sorts."

An old salt, when asked how he felt during a recent severe gale which he encountered at sea, and during which the ship was in great peril, replied, in his peculiar and simplicity, "Why, I thought, what will the poor fellows on shore do now?"

Three Cambridge undergraduates went into a hotel celebrated for its wines, particularly old hock. One of them, who was known himself to be the wit of the party, ordered the waiter to bring a bottle of "his, hare, hock." The waiter, however, not being aware of the joke, and no being again called, said, "Which, sir?" "Why, I thought you had declined it."

A little boy, a few days since, while coming down stairs, was cautioned by his mother to be careful and not fall. His question which followed was a puzzler: "Mother, if I was to lose my balance, where would it go to?"

A short time since as a well-known master in a grammar-school was censuring a pupil for the dullness of his compositions, he remarked that he would give him a sum in practice, he said, "Is not the price of a penny bun always a penny bun?" "Yes," answered the urchin, "No, sir, they sell them two for three half-pence when they are stale."

A countryman once brought a piece of board to an artist, with the request that he would point upon it St. Christopher as large as life. "But," exclaimed the artist, "that board is much too small for that purpose." The countryman looked perplexed at this unexpected discovery. "That's a bad job," said he; "but look'ee, Sir, you can but draw the head over the rest of the body."

It may sound like a paradox, yet the breaking of both wings of an army is a pretty sure way to make it fly.

A young gentleman says he thinks that young ladies who refuse good offers of marriage are too "No-ing by half."

A young lady at a ball was asked by a lover of serious poetry whether she had seen Crabbe's Tales? "Why, no," she answered "I have not seen crabs since I was a child." "I beg your pardon, miss," said he; "I meant have you read Crabbe's Tales?" "Oh!" said I scarcely see the use, "I did not know that red crabs, or any other crabs, had tails."

A stock-broker, whose mind was always full of quotations, was asked a few days since how old his father was? "Well," said he, reluctantly, "he is getted a little in eighty, but there is every prospect he will reach par, and possibly be at a premium."

"There's no humbug about these sardines," said Brown, as he helped himself to a third plateful from a newly-opened box: "they're the real thing, and no mistake, and all the way from the Mediterranean." "Yes," replied his ecclesiastical wife, "and you will only exhibit your appetite if they will go a great deal further."

Jones calls crinolines the large circle of his female friends.

What letter is that which is perilous to young ladies? —The letter G; because it is sure to be in love.

Some men keep savage dogs around their house, so that the hungry poor who step to "get a bite" may get it outside the door.

"What do you think of my wound, doctor? Is it deep?" "Very probable."

GRAND REVIEW OF THE ARMY OF THE POTO

MAC.—Drawn by Mr. Thomas Nast.—[See Page 646.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ALFRED thus encouraged told his story with forced calmness, and without a word too much. Indeed, so clear and telling was the narrative, and the logic so close, that incoherent patience on one or two stole up and listened with wonder and a certain dreamy complacency; the bulk, however, held aloof somewhat, being inextricably wrapped in fictitious Autobiography.

His story told, Alfred offered the Dodds in evidence that his unfortunate cousin's mind was no illusion; and referred to his sister and several friends as witnesses to his sanity, and said the letters he wrote were all stopped in the asylum; and why? That no honest man or woman might know where he was.

He ended by convincing Mr. Vane he was a sane and inju ed man, and his father a dark designing perso n.

Mr. Vane asked him whether he had any other revelations to make. Alfred replied, "Not on my own account, but for the sake of those afflicted persons I am here for life. Well, the body vant repaying; the vermin thinning; the instruments of torture want shaking instead of hiding for an hour or two when you happen to come, what do the patients gain by that? The sundays men dare not complain to you, Sir; because the last time one did complain to the justices (it was Mr. Penwoth), they had no sooner passed through the iron gate, than Dodd made him an example of him; felled him with his fist, and walked up and down him on his knees, crying, 'I'll teach you to complain to the justices.' Now one or two gentlemanly madmen, who soon found out that I am not one of them, have complained to me that the attendants treat them very much like Hindoos treat dogs, and choke them up with the chaff-stones, then fling on their clothes without drying them. They complain that the meat is tough and often putrid, the bread stale, the butter rancid, the tea often stinted, since they can't be adulterated, and as for sleep it is hardly known; for the beds are so short your feet stick out; insects are numerous to easy sleepers, but highly odoriferous and profoundly carnivorous, bite you all night; and dogs howl eternally outside; and, in short, the nature defies even these enemies of rest, then the doctor, who seems to be in the pay of Insanity, claps you on a blister to keep you quiet, and drives away ... Insanity's cure, or hounses you by brute force as he did me, and so steals your sleep, and tries to steal your reason with his opium, henbane, morphia, and other tremendous brain-stealers. With such a potion, Sir, administered by violence, he put me in a night a burning fever, headache, loss of sight, and bleeding at the nose; as Mrs. Archbold will tell you. Oh, both these things, Sir, in pity to those whom God has afflicted: to me they are but strokes with a feather; I am a sane man, torn from love and happiness, and confined among the mad; discomfort is nothing to me; comfort is nothing; you can do nothing for me, but restore me to my dignity as a man, my liberty as a Briton, and the rights as a citizen I have been swindled out of by a fraudulent bankrupt and his rank two venal doctors, who never saw me but for one five minutes, but came to me ready bribed at a guinea apiece, and so signed away my wife his and my back."

"Now, Mr. Baker," said Vane, "what do you say to all this?"

Baker smiled with admirable composure, and replied with equal moderation, "He is a gentleman, and believes every word he says; but it is all his delusion. Why to begin, Sir, his father has nothing to do with putting him in here; nothing on earth. (Alfred started; then smiled incredulous.) And in the next place, there are no instruments of restraint here but two pair of handcuffs and two strait-jackets, and these never hardly used; we trust to the padded rooms, you know. And, Sir, as to the getting warm, which instantly affected his pronunciation, "if there's a hinsect in the ouse, I'll heat 'im."

Delusion of fancy, especially in a mad-house; it overpowers a visitor's understanding, Mr. Vane was staggered. Alfred, whose eager eyes never left his face, saw this with dismay, and feeling that if he failed in the simplest matter he would be fatal to Alfred in establishing his sanity, he said, with inward anxiety, though with outward calmness, "Suppose we test these delusions?"

"With all my heart," said Vane.

Baker's countenance fell.

"Begin with the instruments of restraint. Find me them."

Baker's countenance brightened up; he had no fear of their being found.

"I will," said Alfred; "please to follow me."

Baker grinned with anticipated triumph.

Alfred led the way to a bedroom near his own, and asked Mr. Baker to unlock it. Baker had not the key: no more had Cooper: the latter was sent for it; he returned, saying the key was mislaid.

"That I expected," said Alfred. "Send for the kitchen poker, Sir; I'll soon unlock it."

"Fetch the kitchen poker," said Vane.

"Good gracious, Sir!" said Cooper; "he only wants that to knock all our brains out. You have no idea of his strength and ferocity."

"Well bed, Cooper," said Alfred, ironically. "Fetch me the poker," said Vane.

Cooper went for it, and came back with the key instead.

The door was opened, and they all entered. Alfred looked under the bed. The rest stood round it

There was nothing to be seen but a year's dust.

Alfred was dumbfoundered, and a cold perspiration began to gather on his brow. He saw at once a false move would be fatal to him.

"Well, Sir," said Vane, grimly. "Where are they?"

Alfred caught sight of a small cupboard; he searched in it. It was empty. Hope and Cooper grinned at his delusion, quietly, but so that Vane might see that formula. Alfred returned to the bed and looked at it, and Baker held off grinning; Alfred's quick eye caught this and he shook the bed violently, furiously.

"Ah," said Mr. Vane, "I hear a chink."

"It is an iron bedstead, and old," suggested Baker.

Alfred tore off the bed-clothes, and then the mattress. Below the latter was a frame-work, and below the frame-work a receptacle about six inches deep, five long, and three broad, filled with chains, iron bel wrist locks, muffles, and screw-locked hobbles, to ; regular Inquisition.

If Baker had descended from the Kemble family, instead of rising from nothing, he could not have acted better. "Good Heavens!" cried he, "where do these come from? These must have been left here by the last patient."

Vane replied only by a look of contempt, and ordered Cooper to go and ask Mr. Tollett to come to him.

Alfred improved the interval. Sir," said he, "all my delusions, fairly tested, fall turn out like this."

"They shall be tested, Sir; I give you my word."

Mr. Tollett came, and the two justices commenced a genuine scrutiny; their first. They went now upon the true method, in which all these dark places are to be inspected. They did not believe a word; they suspected every thing; they examined every quart, detected every filth and vermin under philanthropy phrases and clean linen; and the upshot was they reprimanded Baker severely and severals severely, and told him his license should never be renewed, unless at their next visit the whole system was changed. They ordered him the iron body-belts, chains, leg-locks, wrist-locks, and muffs, to be put into Mr. Tollett's carriage, and concluded a long inquisition by inquiring into Alfred's sanity; at this inquiry they did not allow Baker to be even present, but only Dr. Bailey.

First they read the order; and found it really was not Alfred's father who had put him into the Asylum. Then they read the certificates, especially Wycherley's; it accused Alfred of headache, insomnia, nightly visions, a rooted delusion respecting a will, and violence to an affectionate father; and at the doctor's last visit, a wild and incoherent, and excitement, and, threats of violence without any provocation to justify them. This overpowered the worthy inquisitors' understandings. Oh, both! they proceeded to examine the three books an asylum has to keep by law; the visitor's book, the case book, and the medical journal; and these were kept with the utmost looseness in Silverton House; as indeed they are in the very best of these places. However, by comparing the scanty notices in the several books, they arrived at this total.

Admitted April 11. Had a very wild look, and was much excited. Attempted suicide by throwing himself into a tank. Attacked the keepers, and resisting by the most vigorous strength and violence. Refused food.

And some days after came an entry with his initials inserted in his name, which was contrary to law. "A. H. Alfred exacted. Threats. Ordered ceasing drugging."

And a day or two after, "A. H. excited. Blasphemous. Ordered blister."

The first entry, however, was enough. The doctor had but seen real facts through his green spectacles, and he! "suicide," "homicide," and "refusal of food," three cardinal points of true mania.

Mr. Vane asked Dr. Bailey whether he was better since he came.

"Oh, Infinitely better," said Dr. Bailey. "We hope to cure him in a month or two."

Their justices sent for Alfred, and had a long talk with her, recommending Alfred to her especial care; and, having acted on his judgment and information, they left a man who called him insane, turned tail at a doctor's certificate; distrusted their eyesight at an unsworn affidavit.

Alfred was packing up his things to go away, bright as a bird, when Cooper entered the room, and told him she had orders to give him every comfort; and the justices hoped to liberate him at their next visit.

The poor wretch turned pale. "At their next visit!" he cried. "What, not to-day? When is their next visit?"

Mrs. Archbold hesitated; but at last she said, "Why you know; I told you; they come four times every year."

The disappointment was too bitter. The contemptible result of all his patience, self-command, and success was too humiliating. He fainted about. "And you can come with a smile and tell me that, you cruel woman." Then he broke down altogether and burst out crying. "You were born without a heart," he sobbed.

Mrs. Archbold quivered at that. "I wish I had been," said she, in a strange, soft, moving voice; then, casting an eloquent look of reproach on him, she went away in visible agitation, and left him sobbing. Once out of his sight she rushed into the nearest room there, which was no more notice of a gentle madwoman its occupant than of the bed or the table, she sank into a chair, and, throwing her head back with womanly abandon, laid her hand up ; her bosom that heaved tempestuously.

And soon the tears trickled on of her impetuous eyes, and ran unrestrained.

The mind of Edith Archbold corresponded with her powerful frame and h r bro ws. Inside this woman all was vigor strong passions, strong good sense to check or ide them; strong will to carry them out. And between these mental forces a powerful st uggle was raging. She was almost impenetrable to mere personal motives; she had seen people early youth to the other sex; and six months spent with Alfred in a quiet country house would probably have left her comparatively indifferent to him. But the first day she saw him in Silverton House he broke through her guard, and pierced at once to her deep heart. She watched her by darting through the window to escape; and terror is a passion. So is pity; and never in her life had she overflowed with it as when she saw him drawn out of the tank and laid on the grass. If, after all, this man was a se looked, that brave high-spirited young creature, who preferred death to the touch of coarse confining hands!

No sooner had he filled her with dismay and pity than he bounded from the ground before her eyes and eyed her, determined, and hoped he would escape; she could not help it. Next she saw him fighting alone against seven or eight, and with such fury, the keepers almost beating them. She sat at the window panting, with clenched teeth and hands, and wished him to win, and, when he won, wondered at him. He yielded, but not to them: to her. All the compliments she had ever received were tame compared with this. She trembled her vanity. It was like the men she had read of, and never seen: the young knights of romance. Then came a pause of calm, and detecting herself in time was frightened. Her strong good sense warned her to beware of him: he was nine years her junior, yet had stirred her to all her depths in an hour; and not to see him nor think of him too much. Accordingly she kept clear of him altogether at first; pity soon put an end to that and she protected and advised him, but with a cold air that astonished him to express. When with her kind acts and her cold manner he did not know what to make of her; and often turned puzzled eyes upon her to see, as much as to say, are you really my friend or not? Once she forgot herself and smiled so tenderly in answer to these inquiries that all his hopes rose very high indeed. He flattered himself she would let him out of the asylum before long. That was all Alfred's true friend could do.

A feeling hidden, and not suppressed, often grows fast in a vigorous nature. Mrs. Archbold's affinity for Alfred was a passion at this dangerous treatment; and it smouldered, and consuming fire, because it warmed no object of fancy, from a fancy to a passion. But penchant, fancy, or passion, she hid it with such cunning and success that neither Alfred nor even those of her own sex saw it; nor did a creature even suspect it, except Nurse Hannah; but her suspicions, aroused by jealousy, for that muscular young virgin was beginning to sigh for him herself, with a gentle timidity that contrasted strikingly with her heaps muscle and prowess against her own sex.

Mrs. Archbold had more passion than tenderness, but would not be surprised if tenderness softened? When her young favorite, the greatest fighter she had ever seen, broke down at the end of his struggle, and wept like a child in a girl, her bowels of compassion yearned within her, and she longed to cry with him. She only saved herself from some impropriety by flight, and had her cry alone. After a flow of tears which astonished herself, she returned Alfred at tea-time with remarkable coldness and reserve. This piece of acting led to unlooked-for consequences. Cooper, who was himself encouraging against Alfred for telling the justices, but had forborne from violence, for fear of getting his house shut up, saw his chance. He went to the doctor, and asked for a powerful drastic; Bailey gave him two pills, or rather boluses, containing a powerful purgative, called Jalap, was one of the farraginous foils of the unscientific science. Armed with this weapon of destruction, Cooper left Alfred's bedroom at night, and ordered him to take them: he refused. Cooper whistled, and four attendants burst into the room. Alfred stood on his powerless; he lost no time, sprang at Cooper, and with his long arm launched a blow that knocked him against the wall, and in this position, where his body could not give, struck him again with his left hand, and sent him ... one right open. The next minute he was pinned, handcuffed, and in a strait-jacket, after crippling one assailant with a kick on the knee.

Cooper, half stunned, and bleeding like a pig, recovered himself now, and burned for revenge. He entered a padded room and jumped on it like a fiend as he lay bound and powerless, and gave him a lesson he never forgot.

Every one has its secrets: the attendants in such mad-houses as this have been for years possessed of one they are too modest to reveal to the public: the art of breaking a man's ribs, or breast-bone, or both, without leaving any marks. The country doctor at Toulon arrive as a similar result by another branch of the art; they stuff the skin of a country man with straw, and then give the inanimate noxious person a sly crack with it; and a rib or back-bone is broken, with no contusion to mark the external violence used. But Mr. Cooper and his fellows do their work with the knee-joint: it is round, and leaves no bruise. They subdue the patient by striking them down on their knees. If they don't jump on him as well as promenade him, the man's spirit is often the only thing broken; if they do, the man is apt to be broken bodily as well as mentally. Thus died Mr. Sizer in 1854, and two others quite recently. And how many more God only knows; we can't count the stones at the bottom of a well.

Cooper then sprang furiously on Alfred, and went kneeling up and down him. Cooper was a heavy man, and his weight crushed and hurt the victim's legs; but that was a trifle; at once as he kneeled on Alfred's chest, the crushed one's whole frame-work seemed giving way, and he could scarcely breathe. Cooper seemed to his work, and kneeled hard on Alfred's face. Then Cooper jumped knees downward on his face. Then Cooper drew back and jumped savagely on his chest. Then Alfred felt his last hour was come: he writhed aside, and Cooper missed him and struck the padded floor, bewildered himself. He faces came together for a moment, and Alfred, fighting for his life, caught Cooper with his teeth by the middle of the nose, and bit clean through the cartilage with a shrill snarl. Then Cooper shrieked, and writhed, and whirled his great arms like a wind-mill, punching at Alfred's head. Now man is an animal at bottom, and a fatal animal at the very bottom. Alfred ground his teeth together in bull-dog silence till they quite met, and with his young strong neck and his despair-honed jaws that pressed hollow as a carrier shakes a cat, still grinding his teeth together in bull-dog silence. The man struck him, pounded him, in vain. At last they got hold of his throat and choked him, and so parted the furious creatures: but not before Mrs. Archbold and nurses Jane and Hannah had rushed into the room, drawn by Cooper's cries. The first thing the new-comers did was to scream in unison at the bleeding victim of love. On the left Alfred all but insensible, his linen and his pale face spotted with the persecutor's blood. Upon him crowded the gory miscreant, swearing oaths to set the hair on end.

"I'll stop your biting forever," said he, and raised a ponderous fist: and in one moment more Alfred would have been disfigured for life, but Bloody-nose Cooper's arm, and Cooper's blood said sharply to the nurses "Handcuffs!" and the three women pinned him simultaneously, and, by the force of surprise, kept him down for a moment with a strength, sharpness, skill, and determination not to be found in women out of a mad-house—luckily for the newspaper husbands.

The other keepers looked astounded at this manœuvre; and, as no servant ever yet confronted Mrs. Archbold without being dismissed directly, they took their cue and said, "We advised him, ma'am, but he would not listen to us."

"Cooper," said Mrs. Archbold as soon as she had recovered herself, "you are not fit for your place. To-morrow you go, or I go."

Cooper, covered in a moment with handcuffs, began to whine and say that it was all Alfred's fault. "Look at my nose."

But Mrs. Archbold was now carried away by two passions instead of one, and they were together too much for prudence; she took a handful of those locks out of her bosom and shook them in Cooper's face:

"Your nose!" said she; "you should go, for that, if you were any thing but a brute."

The two young nurses assented loudly, and turned and cackled at Cooper for cutting off such a lovely hair.

He shrugged his shoulders at them, and said coldly to Mrs. Archbold: "Oh, I didn't know. Mrs. Archbold, I am sorry I have struck him, my cake is burnt. Tim't the first lunatic you have taken for your fancy man."

Cooper's brutal speech, all the more intolerable for not being quite false, Mrs. Archbold turned pale and red, looked round for a weapon to strike him dead; but found none so handy and so deadly as her tongue.

"Mr. Cooper," said she, you have tried to MURDER," said she. "I know all about that death in Calton Retreat; you kept it dark before the coroners, but it is not too late yet. I'll open the world's eyes; I was only going to dismiss you, Sir; but you have insulted me. I'll hang you finely."

Cooper turned very pale and was silent; his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth.

But the dreadful unexpected issued from the bed and murmured cheerfully, though with some difficulty, a single word:

"Justice!"

At an expression so out of place they all started with surprise.

Alfred went on: "You are putting the saddle on the wrong horse. The fault lies with those justices, Mrs. Archbold. Bailey knows I am a servant, you know, and obeys orders."

"What business had the wretch to cut your hair off?" said Mrs. Archbold, turning on Alfred with flashing eyes. Her blood once up, she was ready to quarrel even with him for taking part against himself.

"Because he was ordered to put on a blister, and hair must come off before a blister can go on," replied Alfred, soberly.

"That is no excuse for him beating you and trying to tear your front teeth out."

She didn't mind so much about his side-bits.

"No," replied Alfred. "But I hit him first. And don't blame him, like an Irish screamer. Look at the bloke's face! Dear Mrs. Archbold, you are my best friend in this horrid place, and you have beautiful eyes, and, talk of teeth, look at yours! but you haven't much sense of justice: forgive me for saying so. Put the proposition into signs; there's nothing like that for clearing away prejudice. B. and C. have a scrimmage: B. begins it, C. gets the worst of it: C. comes A. and tears B. to bits. Is that justice? It is me you ought to turn away; and I wish to Heaven you would: but don't turn Mrs. Archbold, or grey tars me away, and keep the other blackguard."

At this extraordinary, and, if I may be allowed the expression, Affredian speech, the men first stared, and then laughed; the women smiled, and then were nearer crying than laughing.

And so it was that justice handcuffed, straitjacketed, blistered, and impartial, sent from its bed of torture a beam through Cooper's tough hide to his inner heart. He hung his head and stepped toward Alfred: "You're what I call a man," he said. "I don't care a curse whether I stay or go, but what she has said to you is to come what may, you're a gentleman, and one as can put himself in a poor man's place. Why, Sir, it wasn't done so rough; but I have been twenty years at it; and mad folk they'd wear the patience out of Jove, and the milk of human kindness can of sudden turn to gall. However, if I was to stay here all my life, instead of going to-morrow, I'd never lift hand to trouble you again, for you taking my part against yourself like that."

"I'll put that to the test," said Mrs. Archbold, sharply. "Stay—on your probation. Hannah!"

And Baby-face biceps, at a look took off his handcuffs, which she had been prominent in putting on.

This extraordinary scene ended in the men being dismissed, and the women remaining and going to work after their kind.

"The bed is too short for one thing," said Hannah. "Look at his poor dear feet, they are cold as a stone: just feel of them, Jane."

"No, no; murder!" cried Alfred; "that tickles."

Hannah ran for a chair, Jane for another pillow. Mrs. Archbold took off his handcuffs, and, passing her hand softly and tenderly over his head, lamented the loss of his poor hair. Among them they relieved him of his straitjacket, set his head, covered his feet, and he slept like a top for want of drastics and opiates, and in spite of some brilliant charges by the Lilliputian cavalry.

After this the attendants never molested Alfred again; nor did the doctor: Mrs. Archbold got his boluses, and sent them up to a famous analyzing chemist in London, and told him she was mad, and said, "I'll thank you not to prescribe at random for that patient any more." He took the lady's prescription, coming as it did in a voice quietly grim, and with a momentary but wicked glance shot from under her black brows.

Alfred was all the more miserable at his confinement: his melancholy deepened now there was no fighting to excite him. A handsome bright young face clouded with grief is a very pitiable, and I need not say that both the women who had fallen in love with him had their eyes, or at least a rim of their eyes, red over on his face. The result varied with the characters of the watchers. The young Jane, a simple maid, Mrs. Archbold sigh, and long to make him happy under her wing. How it wrought on the purer and more womanly Hannah, will be revealed by the incident I have to relate. Alfred was sitting on a bench in the corridor, bowed down by grief and the Archbold ring hung in a room hard by, feasting her eyes on him through an aperture in the door caused by the inspection plate being under repair—when an excited maniac was driven past. She had obtained access—with marvelous cunning—to the men's side; but was now coming back with a flea in her ear, and faster than she went; being handcuffed and propelled by Baby-face biceps. On passing the disconsolate Alfred the latter evil thing (who gave her stray sheep a coarse push—as one pushes a dog—and told a third to guard, generally falling down, upon the rougher sex. Contrast sudden and funny.

"Don't be so sad, Sir," she murmured, cooing like the gentlest of doves. "I can't bear to see you look like that."

Alfred looked up, and met her full with his mournful, honest eyes. "Ah, Hannah, how can I be any thing but sad, imprisoned here, sane among the mad?"

"Well, and so am I, Sir: so is Mrs. Archbold herself."

"Ay, but you have not been entrapped, imprisoned, on your wedding-day. I can not even get a word sent to my Julia, my wife that ought to be. Think of the affright they have made me put on her I love better, ten times better, than myself, by this time, and she must be waiting for me humiliated perhaps by my absence. What will she think of me? The rogues will tell her a thousand lies: she is young, inexperienced, Hannah, impetuous like myself, only so gentle and so good; oh, my angel; my angel; I shall lose her."

Hannah clasped her hands, with tears in her eyes: "No, no," she cried, "it is a burning shame to treat true lovers like you and her. Hush! speak low. Brown told me you are as well as he is."

"God bless him for it, then."

"You have got money, they say: try it on with Brown."

"I will. Oh you darling. What is the matter?"

For Baby-face was beginning to whimper.

"Oh, nothing, Sir; only you are so glad to go; and we shall be sorry to part with you: but you would not for that—oh, oh, oh!"

"What, do you think I shall forget you and your kindness? Never: I'll square accounts with friends and foes; not one shall be forgotten."

"Don't offer me any of your money," sobbed Hannah; "for I wouldn't touch it. Good-by," said she: "I shan't have as much as a kiss for it, I'll be bound: good-by," said she again, and never moved.

"Oh, won't you, though," cried Alfred, gayly. "What is that? and that? and that? Now, what on earth are you crying about? Dry your tears, you dear good-hearted girl: no, I'll dry them for you."

He took out a white handkerchief and mopped her cheeks gently for her, and gave her a parting kiss; but the Archbold's patience was exhausted; a door opened nearly opposite, and there she stood yellow with jealousy and sombre as night with her chon brows. At sight of this lowering figure Hannah uttered a squawk, and fled with cheeks red as fire. Alfred, not aware of Mrs. Archbold's smouldering passion, and little dreaming that jealous anguish and rage stood incarnate before him, burst out: "Hannah is like a mischievous boy; on this she swept upon him, and took him by both shoulders, and awed him with her towering brows close to his. "You ungrateful wretch," she said, violently, and panted. His color rose. "Ungrateful! That I am not, madam. Why do you call me so?"

"You are; you are. What have I done to you that you run from me? Is it ingratitude?" However, she shall be packed off this very night and you to thank for it."

This was the way to wound the generous youth. "Now it is you that are ungenerous," he said. "What harm has the poor girl done? She had a virtuous indignation excited within me for the heartless fraud I suffer by; that is all. Pray do you never pity me?"

"Was it virtuous indignement set her kissing you?" said the Archbold, clenching her teeth as if the word stung her, like the sight.

"She didn't, now," said Alfred; "it was I kissed her."

"And yet you pretend to love your Julia so truly?"

"This is no place for that sacred name, madam. But be sure I have no secrets from her. And this nobody will believe, I suppose?"

"She must be a very accommodating young lady."

At this insult Alfred rose pale with anger, and was about to defy his monitor mortally; but the quick-witted woman saw some indication in the one moment, before ever he could speak, she was a transformed creature, a penitent; she put her hands together supplicatingly, and murmured,

"I didn't mean it; I respect her; and your love for her touches me, Alfred; I am so unhappy, oh forgive me."

And behold she held his hand between her soft, burning palms, and looked up and said languidly on his shoulder, and the inevitable tears ran gently.

Mortals apart, it was glorious love-making.

"Bother the woman," thought Alfred.

"Promise me not to do it again," she murmured, "and the doctor shall go."

"Oh, Lord, yes, I promise; though I can't see what it matters to her."

"Not much, cruel boy, alas! But it matters to her. For—" She kissed Alfred's hand gently and rose to her full height, very pale, but at the second step turned her head sudden as a bird and finished her sentence—"if you kiss her before me, I shall kill you both."

Here was a fresh complication! The men had left off blistering, torturing, and bullying him; but his guardian angel had been all the time turning up their sleeves to pull caps over him, and plenty of the random scratches would fall on him. Mrs. Archbold's jealousy had put him more to be out of the horrid place this voluptuous prospect would. He hunted every where for Brown. But he was closeted with a patient. At night he lay awake for a long time, thinking how he should open the negotiation: he shrank from it. He felt a delicacy about bribing Beelzebub's servant to betray him.

At Hannah's request Brown, who thought he might very well ask her to do the dirty work of bribing Brown, and he would pay her for it; only in money, not kisses, Alfred was resolved he sank to sleep; and his spirit broke prison: he stood with Julia before the altar, and the priest made them one: and then he saw the end the company and daylight disappeared, and her own sweet low moving voice came whirling. "My own, own, own, own, own, own." I love you ten times more for all you have endured for me;" and with this her sweet lips settled like the dew on his.

Impartial sleep flies at the steps of the scaffold and the gate of Elysium: so Alfred awoke as the shoes. Hannah was standing by his side, with her heels, and her heart beat furiously on his shoulder. He stirred directly, and thought he was gone like the wind, with a rustle of flying petticoats, and he heard a door open gently: it closed with a catch-lock; his dastardly assistant had opened it with her key, and left it open to make good her retreat in case of discovery. And she was stealing what she came after. Alfred sat up in bed indignant, and somewhat flattered. He confessed her ingenuity in his heart. But she was no help for it; he grinned and bore it, as he had the blisters, and boluses, etc., rolled the clothes round his shoulders, and lay to the step of the just again. Not so the passionate hypocrite, who, maddened by a paroxysm of jealousy, had taken this cowardly means to wreak vengeance. She had sucked fresh poison from those honest lips, and filled her veins with molten fire. She tossed and turned and writhed about in a high fever of passion, nor were the cold chills wanting of shame and remorse at what she had done.

In the morning, Alfred remembered this substantial vision, and determined to find out which of those two it was. "I shall know by her looks," said he; "she won't be able to meet my eye." Well, the first he saw was Mrs. Archbold. She met his eye full with a mild and pensive dignity. "Come, it is not you," thought Alfred. Presently he fell in with Hannah. She wore a serene, inanimate face, the picture of unobtrusive modesty. Alfred was dumbfounded. "It's not this one, either," said he. "But, then, it must. Confound her impudence for looking so modest." However, he did not question her; he was looking out for a face that interested him far more: the weather-beaten countenance of Giles Brown. He saw him once or twice, but could not get him alone till the afternoon. He invited him into his room: and when he got him there, lost no time. "Just look me in the face, Brown," said he, quietly. Brown looked him in the face.

"Now, Sir, am I mad or sane?"

Brown turned his head away. Alfred laughed. "No, no, none of your tricks, old fellow: look me in the face while you answer."

The man colored. "I can't look a gentleman like you in the face, and tell him he is mad."

"I should think not. Well, now; what shall I give you to help me escape?"

Hush! drawing attention that, Sir; it's as much as my place is worth even to listen to you."

"Good! then I must give you as much as your place is worth. Please to calculate that, and name the figure."

"My place! I wouldn't lose it for a hundred pounds."

"Exactly. Then I'll give you a hundred guineas."

"And how am I to get my money, Sir?"

"The first time you are out, come to Albion Villa, in Barkington, and I'll have it all ready for you."

"And suppose you were to say 'No:' you didn't ought to have been confined?"

"I must trouble you to look in my face again, Mr. Brown. Now, do you see treason, bad faith, avarice, ingratitude in my face?"

"Not a grain of 'em," said Brown, with an accent of conviction. "Well, now, I'll tell you the truth; I'm in debt at this time: and I'm no more afeared for the money than if I had it in my hand. But ye see my stomach won't let me do it."

This was a sad disappointment: so sudden, too. "Is it your conscience?" said he, ruefully. "What do you mean?"

"Ay, my stomach. Wouldn't your stomach rise against taking the money that had been the worst turn one man can do another—been and robbed you of your sweet-heart?"

Alfred stared with some amazement.

Brown continued, and now with some emotion: "Hannah Blake and I were very good friends till you came, and I was thinking of asking her to name the day; but now she won't look at me. 'Don't come teasing me,' says she, 'I am mad for you.' 'Well,' says I, 'you that have turned the girl's head, Sir.'"

"Bother the women!" said Alfred, cordially. "Oh, what fools they are! And how unjust you are, to spite me for the fault of another. Can I help it? Is it my fault coming upon me? He reflected a moment, then burst out: "Brown, you are a duffer—a regular duffer. What, don't you see your way? Why, you out and out fool. If you do, in forty-eight hours I shall be married to my Julia, and that dumpling-faced girl will be cured. Then, if I don't make her, by God, Sir, I'll make hot love to your Hannah, boiling hot, hotter than ever was—out of the isles of Greece. Now, Sir, you are out, and I'll post the hundred pounds, and I'll give Hannah another hundred pounds, on condition she marries you: and, if she won't marry you, she shan't have a farthing, only a good hiding."

Brown was overpowered by his maniac's logic. "You have got the best of me," said he; "and I'll go in, if I die for it."

They now put their heads together over the means. Brown was to wait, and wait, for an opportunity. Alfred's was to make one this very night.

"But how can I?" said Brown. "I shan't have the key of your room. I am not on watch and patrol that night."

"Borrow Hannah's."

"Hannah's? She has got no key of the male patients' rooms."

"Oh yes, she has; of mine, at all events."

"What makes you think that, Sir?" said Brown, surprised.

Alfred didn't know what to say: he could not tell him why he felt sure she had a key.

"Just go and find out for me," he said at last; "don't tell her I sent you, now."

Brown obeyed, and returned in half an hour with the key. Alfred had observed that the hobbles and chains were hidden on arrival of the justices.

She tells me this is the only key she has of any room in this corridor. But dear heart, Sir, how you have frightened this poor woman. She said, says she, 'if it is to bring sorrowful true lovers together again, Giles, or the like of that, I'll run the risk.' Those were the words of Mrs. Archbold's bunch, though I get the sack for it," says she. 'I know she leaves them in the parlor all day,' says Hannah. She is a trump, you must allow."

Alfred colored up. He suspected he had been spied.

"She is a good, kind, single-hearted girl," said he, "and neither of you shall find me ungrateful."

It was evident by the alacrity Brown now showed that he had got his orders from Hannah.

It was agreed that Alfred should lie down at night in his cabinet, ready to seize the right moment; that Hannah should get the key, and watch the coast clear, and let him out into the corridor; and Brown get him down by a back stairs, and out on the lawn. There he would find a ladder close by the wall, and his own arms and legs must do the rest.

And now Alfred was a changed creature: his eye sparkled; he walked on air, and already sniffed the air of liberty.

After ten Brown brought in some newspapers, and made Alfred a signal, previously agreed on, that the ladder was quite close at hand. He went to bed early, put on his tweed shooting-jacket and trowsers, and lay listening to the clock with beating heart.

At first feet passed to and fro from time to time. These became less frequent as the night wore on.

Presently a light foot passed, stopped at the door, and made a sharp scratch on it with some metal instrument.

It was the key. The time was not ripe to use it, but good Hannah had taken this way to let him know she had got it.

This little scratch outside his door, oh it made his heart leap and thrill. One great difficulty was overcome. He waited, and waited, but with glowing, hopeful heart; and at last a foot came swiftly, the key turned, and Hannah opened the door. She had a bull's-eye lantern.

"Take your shoes in your hand," she whispered, "and follow me."

He followed her. She led him in and out, to the door of the public room belonging to the second-class patients. Then she drew her whistle, and breathed it softly. Brown answered as softly from the other end. He was waiting at the opposite door.

"All right," said she; "the dangerous part is over." She put a key into the door, and said, very softly, "Good-by."

"God bless you, Hannah," said Alfred, with deep emotion. "God in heaven bless you for this."

"He will, he does," said the single-hearted girl, and put her other hand to her breast with a quick, quiet gush of sensibility. "Good-by. "Good-by, dear. I shall never see you again."

"And so these two parted; for Hannah could not leave the house of Giles at this time. He was welcome to Alfred though, most welcome, and conducted him by devious ways to the kitchen, latter in limbo.

He opened the kitchen door softly, and saw two burley strangers seated at a table, eating with all their souls, and Mrs. Archbold standing before the fire, but looking toward him: for she had heard his footsteps even so far off.

The men looked up, and saw Alfred. They rose to their feet, and said, "This will be the gentleman, mum."

"Yes," said Mrs. Archbold.

"Your servant, Sir," said the men, very civilly. "If you are ready, we are."

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

WE devote pages 644 and 645 to illustrations of the works on Morris Island, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. We will let Mr. Davis tell the story of his pictures, as follows:

GILLMORE'S BATTERIES.

"This mass of shot, shell, torpedoes, hand-grenades, Greek fire, etc., piled near General Gillmore's shed is daily subject to the concentrated fire of the many persons who 'have a word with the General.' Seeing this, the many readers of the Weekly will agree with me that the expression is a novel one, and I gladly pay it this little visit with them. The large spherical shell is a 15-inch, fired from Battery Gregg, and picked up in the trenches: this is the mortar shell; there the shot and shell for our big Parrotts and the Brooks projectile, grouped about with the hand-grenades and the little tin cylinders containing the Greek fire, about which we for some time joked its inventor, Levi Short, and which, we like to believe, have found to be no joke, and we a joke indeed; there are the torpedoes. Captain Gray, of the M'Clellan, brought these two of the latter, which were recovered from the steamer to his house by a crowd of the curious, and handed over with the King of Lightning Talk, Colonel E. S. Sanford, he gave the story of a telegraph operator who escaped from Richmond some months ago. At the time of the Dix-Hill cartel, upon Charleston a telegraph operator was placed in charge of an electric battery that was arranged to explode a torpedo containing three hundred pounds of powder, with instructions to blow up the Ironsides should she near the spot. During the engagement the whole ship, by accident or design, seemed at one time directly over it, and the officers in charge ordered the explosion of the torpedo. The loyal operator could not be induced to start the machine to work! Soon an order for the fire of every battery to concentrate upon the Keokuk was received to be fully complied with, the experiments would not work! These incidents occasioned so much fun that the minié ball which struck Islands that the operator was soon after imprisoned. Being released a short time since and sent to Richmond to resume his occupation, he was soon after sent to Winchester, Virginia, to procure some instruments. The visit to Winchester afforded him the much-desired opportunity to escape to our lines, where he now is—a man who seems to have done as much for our cause as any single person in the entire service.

OUR BLACK ISLAND BATTERIES.

"These and other batteries are soon to introduce themselves to the notice of the Confederates: they are unlike any batteries previously built. The range of the guns is over five miles. The construction of this work was under the charge of Colonel Serrell, of the New York Volunteer Engineers, the busy ones in the work being Captain Kenna and Lieutenant Parsons of the same corps. Captain M'Kenna is at this time hard at work, rendering Wagner a work of great strength, while Lieutenant Parsons is each night working away upon a battery of which I must not tell.

THE COVERED WAY.

Is a long trench with the dirt thrown toward the works of the enemy, and is used as a means of reaching exposed positions without endangering the lives of our men. The detectable scream of a coming shell is the signal for one to crowd and crouch under the covering bank. The shell bursts, the fragments fly over the trench, and off we start again, in almost perfect security."

THE ATTACK ON SABINE PASS, SEPTEMBER 8, 1863.—SKETCHED BY AN EYE-WITNESS.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

CUMBERLAND GAP.

We are indebted to the politeness of Sergeant Brennan, Company D, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, for the view of CUMBERLAND GAP, which we publish on this page. The Gap is one of the famous places of the war. It has been occupied and reoccupied both by Federals and rebels, and has seen more than one surrender. Last month General Burnside moved against it, and compelled the rebel commander, General Frazier, to surrender unconditionally. The following tells the story:

Before leaving Kentucky General Burnside ordered Colonel DeCourcy, with a brigade of infantry, to march upon Cumberland Gap by the direct route, through London and Barbourville. Learning on the 6th that the rebel force defending the Gap was strong, and likely to offer resist ance, he dispatched General Shackelford, with his brigade, on the 5th, from Knoxville, with instructions to seize all avenues of escape to the South. He followed himself, with another body of infantry and cavalry, on the 7th, and arrived within four miles of the Gap on the 9th, after a forced march of sixty miles. De Courcy and Shackelford had both made demands for surrender, which General Frazier declined. Upon his arrival, General Burnside renewed it, when the rebel commander offered to surrender upon condition that his officers and men were paroled. An unconditional surrender being insisted upon, he yielded. His force consisted of the Second North Carolina, First Virginia, First Georgia regiments, and several companies of artillery. The Georgia regiment was eight hundred strong, and was once before captured by General Burnside, at Roanoke Island. The prisoners are now on their way North. In explanation of the extraordinary isolation General Frazier was left in, rebel officers asserted that General Bragg had peremptorily ordered him to remain. On the night of the 7th two companies of our troops stole their way through the rebel pickets and burned a mill that had supplied the rebels with meal in the very sight of the enemy's camp. This neat performance helped much to hasten the surrender.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S ARMY OCCUPYING CUMBERLAND GAP.—SKETCHED BY SERGEANT BRENNAN, EIGHTH MICHIGAN CAVALRY.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SHARP-SHOOTER IMPROVISING A REST FOR HIS RIFLE.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE BEDOUIN TENT.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 646.]

HOME.

Two birds within one nest;
Two hearts within one breast;
Two souls within one fair
Firm league of love and prayer,
Together bound for aye, together blest.

An ear that waits to catch
A hand upon the latch;
A step that hastens its sweet rest to win;
A world of care without,
A world of strife shut out,
A world of love shut in.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A CARD.

A NEW GAME.—Judge Whitley, of Hoboken, has published a game, which he calls "Whitley's Pantological Game of Chevy Chase," and which is designed to instruct and amuse the social circle. We have seen both the diagrams on which the game is played and the tablets, fifty-two in number, which are used in the game. A juvenile set is also prepared for the use of children. It is replete with instructions without being tiresome. Old and young, learned and unlearned, will be delighted with it, as it is susceptible of much innocent amusement and free from the possibility of fraud or gambling. The diagrams are strewn with extracts from eminent writers, and the original matter is in scholarly taste.

We may safely commend the Judge's ingenious invention to the public, and especially all families where card-playing is interdicted. The descriptive part, beginning with the mythological heroes of antiquity, descends through all periods, touching with brevity and clearness the great personages of different epochs. The game is so simple that children can play at it, and yet may be so learned that the man of study will seek it to refresh his memory of events.—New York Post.

CHEVY CHASE can be had at Horace Waters, 481 Broadway; Howe & Ferry's 76 Bowery; and by addressing Judge Whitley, Hoboken, N. J. Price from $1 00 to $2 50. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

HUBBARD BRO'S IMPORTERS of WATCHES NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $204. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

COMPOSITE

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Piece!

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES MUST INSURE

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected from the solid material by the most experienced judges. The material being alike all through, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very readily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact!

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dial, and fancy cut hands, in good running order, by the half dozen, $66; postage, $1 80; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our importations are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Their encomiums are emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered." —N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 9.

"Elaborately and artistically finished." —N. Y. Scottish American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ TERMS CASH; INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk! Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
169 Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just published:

AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

ABEL DRAKE'S WIFE. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE SILVER LUTE,

For day schools, and Juvenile Singing Classes; by GEO. F. ROOT. There are two things that seem to assure us that this is a useful and popular book. The first is, its large sale, and the other is the strong voluntary expressions of approval (we have never solicited one) from some of the most successful teachers of music, and educational and other journals, both East and West. This little book contains

Two Hundred and Twenty Pieces!

Lessons, Songs, in one, two, three, and four parts, and a few Tunes, Hymns, and Chants, composed and arranged with reference to the pleasure and profit of both pupil and teacher, by one of the best teachers and singing school writers now living.

The "SILVER LUTE" has two new and important features, the first of which is Progressive Song Lessons,

by means of which all the things necessary to a knowledge of notation are introduced for practice, one after another, in an unusually attractive manner. The other is

Songs of Exercise, Trades and Occupations, in which physical exercise may be united with singing.

The "SILVER LUTE" has been adopted as the musical text and recreation book for the public schools in several large places East and West; and we have just received an account published in the Winona (Minn.) Daily Republican, of the proceedings of the STATE TEACHERS' CONVENTION, of the 26th and 27th ult., from which we make the following extract:

"A committee appointed to consider what singing-book was best adapted to the wants of our schools, reported unanimously in favor of 'The Silver Lute,' published by Root & Cady, which was therefore recommended by the Convention."

We print here the names of LESS THAN HALF the pieces in the book:

After the Battle,
All's Well,
All Together Again,
As a band of Brothers joined,
A swarm of Bees,
A welcome to Little Nell,
Battle-cry of Freedom,
Beautiful Sea,
Be careful of your Money.
Catch the Sunshine,
Cheer, Boys, Cheer,
Clap, Clap, Hurrah,
Come follow where we go,
Come, John, keep time,
Come, let's sing a Merry Round,
Come sing the Sixteenth Notes,
Don't you see me coming?
Doors open wide,
Down by the Crystal River's Side,
Farewell,
For a Season Called to Part,
Freedom and Union,
Gaily our Light Bark,
Give me the Spade,
Go forth to your place,
Hark, 'tis the Fairies' song,
Happy New Year,
Have you seen my Lillie?
Here are we all to learn of Singing,
How the Merry Wind Blows,
I can, yes, we know you can,
If a body find a Lesson,
I have no Mother now,
I'm glad I am a Farmer,
Joyful sing, the Summer's Coming,
Laughing May is here,
Let others sing of Sunny Lands,
Lightly my Boat I Row,
Lightly we're Tripping along,
Little Rose,
Make your Mark,
March, March, March,
Music Everywhere,
No mortal eye that Land hath Seen,
Nellie Lost and Found,
Never Forget the Dear Ones,
Never Idle,
Never say Fail,
O, we are Volunteers,
One Sweet Flower has Drooped,
Once more before we Part,
On the Heather,
Out on the Prairie,
Out on the River,
O, wrap the Flag around me, Boys,
Parting Hymn,
Persevere,
Sailor on the Trackless Ocean,
Sister thou wast mild and lovely,
Shut the Door,
Some one Comes,
Song of Exercise,
Sounds of the Summer night,
Stand up for Uncle Sam,
Strive and Wait,
Take Good Care,
Teacher, may I be your Pupil,
Temperance Rallying Song,
The Auctioneer,
The Echo,
'Tis in the Quiet Village Home,
The fine old Yankee Gentleman,
The Gentleman (Lady) Workers,
The Happy Meeting,
To Arms,
The Mountain Horn,
To my Brother,
There's a Bright Glorious Dawning,
The Wayside Well,
The Song of the Bob-o'-link,
The Watchman,
The Skaters,
They're Coming Home To-day,
The Song of the Cooper,
The Pilot,
The Union,
The Vacant Chair,
The Song of the Minutes,
There's Music in the Air,
The Seasons,
The Star Spangled Banner,
The Land beyound the River,
Up in the Morning so Early,
Wait, Wait, Wait,
Wake! 'tis Freedom's call,
When the joyous day is dawning,
Would you know how the Farmer,
We have come from various places,
What does Little Birdie say,
What I love and hate, John Brown.

All who are getting up juvenile singing classes, in or out of day-schools, will do well to take a look at the "SILVER LUTE."

Single Copies 35 Cents. $3 60 a dozen in Chicago. In all Eastern cities $4 00 a dozen.

ROOT & CADY,
95 Clark Street, Chicago.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, in Suites. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Paillasses. WARREN WARD, No. 277 Canal St., N. Y.

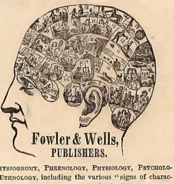
Highly Important to old soldiers, conscripts and substitutes, and persons just going into camp. The greatest Humbug of the age. Send 25c. to "Old Soldier," Box 2588 P. O., N. Y. city, and obtain valuable information.

National Union League.

Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,
208 Broadway, New York.



Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 2 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
669½ Broadway, New York.

PHYSIOGNOMY, PHRENOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, PSYCHOLOGY, ETHNOLOGY, including the various "signs of character," and how to read them, given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume, 38, commenced in July. $1 50 a year. Sample Nos. sent by first post for 15 cents.

FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was short, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five feet four inches in length—when let down reaching to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

Mrs. L. A. BROWN, No. 498 Broadway, New York.

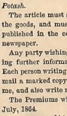
PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 493 Broadway.

For sale by all druggis s.

$200! $150! $100! $50!

PREMIUMS.



To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the underisgned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864. B. T. BABBITT,
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

The "Star" No Chimney Burner for Kerosene Oil Lamps, Patented Aug. 11, 1863.

Gives a large, clear, and steady light without smoke or smell. An excellent portable or hall light. It can be carried and handled freely without being extinguished. Superior to any other of the kind. Try it. Sample sent, post-paid, for 35 cents. Circulars free. Agents wanted. PETER ESSIG & CO., Manufacturers, No. 2 Platt Street, N. Y.

WEDDING CARDS.

French Note Papers, Seals and Presses, Silver Plates, etc., at J. Everdell's, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane St. For Specimens by mail, send 25 cents.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1

Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & CO., No. 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 8 ct. stamp for circular.

Watches and Jewelry.

CHEAPEST AND BEST yet offered to the public. For list of Articles and Prices, address
PARKER COX & CO., N. Y.

WINDOW SHADES.

White,
Buff,
Green
and Blue Holland,
Gold
and Frescoed Shades.
Bray's,
Putnam's,
Bailey's,
and Judd's
Patent Fixtures,
At G. L. & J. B. KELTY'S,
Window Shade Manufacturers,
No. 359 Broadway, New York.

LACE CURTAINS, Nottingham Curtains, Brocatelle Curtains, Rep Curtains, Terry Curtains, Satin Delaine Curtains, — Wholesale and retail, at KELTY'S, 359 Broadway.

Attention, Soldiers!

In solid 18 k. gold, $3 50.

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to any garment. Adress

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

One Agent wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, with a Circular giving full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Pin, or Guard Chain, or an Engraved Spring Locket, or a Seal Stone, California Diamond, or Chased Ring, or a fine Gold California Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps Pin, with your Name, Co., and Reg., handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kearney Cross in Gold Plate; and, for 50 cents, I will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,
Box 4876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, SOLDIERS, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested, as a FAVOR, to send us their address, and we will send in return, FREE, information for which they will be THANKFUL. We offer EXTRA INDUCEMENTS. From $6 to $15 per day ABOVE EXPENSES. We want addresses from EVERY COUNTY in the U. S., and from EVERY REGIMENT in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Box 3131, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Ropes, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Loom Cord and Surgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $25. Price of an Office, with Press, $12, 22, 32, and $43. Send for a Circular to the
LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $3500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Grover & Baker Machines have taken the First Premium at the late State Fairs held in

NEW YORK,	ILLINOIS,	KENTUCKY,
NEW JERSEY,	MICHIGAN,	TENNESSEE,
PENNSYLVANIA,	IOWA,	VIRGINIA,
OHIO,	MISSOURI,	NORTH CAROLINA,
INDIANA.	ALABAMA,	CALIFORNIA.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
100 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
$500 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
$200 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
$500 "	2 00 to 5 00 each.
$300 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$300 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$600 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$600 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$800 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$800 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$800 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
$800 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
$100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$600 Watch Keys	3 00 to 4 00 each.
$600 Fob and Ribbon Slides	3 00 to 4 00 each.
$600 Sets of Studs	3 00 to 4 00 each.
$600 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 4 00 each.
$600 Chain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
$600 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 4 00 each.
$600 Lockets	2 00 to 5 00 each.
$600 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
$1000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ed Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
$1000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed, and when ordered, are taken at random, and forwarded to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will know what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, the sum of 25 cents must be inclosed with each the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10, and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

$15 Sewing Machine Company

Now furnish the Exclusive Right of any County (not taken), and the machines,

1 Case, containing twelve (12)	$75
1 " " six (6)	$40

Single Machine for Canvassing $10

FIFTEEN DOLLAR S. M. CO., N. Y., Union Box 283 P. O.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ART ARTICLE required, on the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Latest Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Percussion Caps, Badges, or any other articles procurable in this city.

We will Observe, on receipt of 20 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, FREMONT, BUTTERFIELD, BANKS, HOOKER, HALLECK, SIGOURNEY, SCHENCK; ADMIRALS FORTER, FOOTE, DUPONT, or any of the leading OFFICERS in the ARMY and NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PATENT IVORINE.—This excellent article, being tough, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive bone, will relieve the tedium of the Camp and the Hospital. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10,00.

SINGLE BADGES. 15 cents.

Send free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.

111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,

NEW YORK CITY.

Send free by mail for 60 cents.

Dyspepsia Tablets,

For INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c.—Manufactured only by

S. D. WELLING, No. 507 Centre St., New York.

Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—No utensils required—Needlework and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. profit for 1-0 per cent.; demand staple as flour. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars and circulars of two stamps for return postage. Address C. MUNRO, BROWN, No. 74 Dinckler Street, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.,

Have just Published:

ELEANOR'S VICTORY.

A Novel.

By MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF

"AURORA FLOYD" AND "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET."

8vo, Paper, 50 Cents.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Fifty Cents.

Office 429 Broadway.

The "Ridgewood" Patent Smoking Case.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by means of a valve, without use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. Nothing can excel its comfort and utility for Smokers. It is of various styles, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $3 50, and $5 75, to $3 75 and $6 00, the two latter richly plated and engraved. It is substantially made for service, and never what it promises for all Smokers, at home or abroad, in the ARMY or NAVY, a Liberal Discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail or Express, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cents.

The Attention of Sutlers is particularly invited to these Goods.

All orders will receive prompt attention.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,

Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Signs, Marble and other surfaces. Glass Signs and Show Cards, with Pencils or Brush at low prices. Office 107 Fulton Street, N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 61 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents, and also by CLAGE & LEAVITT, 39 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

French (Solitaire) Patterns.

These fashionable goods are made of the finest ivory, and brought to a high polish of all colors, Black, White, Red, &c., and engraved with Solitaire Letters, Old English, &c. Complete set $1 50, free by mail. Trade supplied.

JOHN F. PHELPS, 493 Broadway, New York.

Agents and Dealers.

SOMETHING NEW.—Potent Apple and Vegetable Parer and Slicer combined, for Peeling, Coring, Work and Napkin Holder, and 29 more Novel Articles. Send stamp for Circular. D. W. RICH & CO., Boston, Mass.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS AND PRINTERS.

The subscribers manufacture TYPE REVOLVING Double and Single Cylinder Printing Machines, Bed and Platen

POWER PRESSES,

For Book, Job, and News Printing.

They would also call the attention of publishers of newspapers to their new

RAILWAY NEWSPAPER PRESS

and their Single

LARGE HAND CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, either of which is admirably adapted to supply newspapers of a moderate circulation with a cheap and serviceable Printing Machine, capable of doing quick and handsome job work of an cost of town offices. They are designed to run by hand, at a speed of 250 copies an hour, and at this rate will run without jar or noise.

Circulars of prices, with description, will be forwarded on application.

R. HOE & CO.,

Printers' and Binders' Warehouse,

No. 29 and 31 Gold Street,

Corner Broome, Sheriff, and Columbia Sts., New York,

And Foundry Street, Boston, Mass.

Publishers of newspapers who will insert this advertisement thirteen times in their weekly papers, with this notice pointing to January 1, 1864, and forward us a copy of paper containing the same, will be paid in printing materials by purchasing four times the amount of their bill for this advertisement.

Deafness.—Sound Magnifying Tubes. Can be concealed, and enables deaf persons to hear at public assemblies. Send for a descriptive pamphlet to

E. HASLAM, 32 John St., New York.

$15 Per Day Easy $15 And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our tremendous popular, successful, and valuable extra large size FREE STAY-SUSPENDERS, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOVELTY PACKAGES, containing free Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writers, Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gold Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Receipts, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from $10 to $200 per cent. PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express to be ALL PAID at the Army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our NEW CIRCULAR containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. B. C. RICKARDS & CO., 1023 NASSAU ST., New York. Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

Soldiers' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver $1. Solid Silver, $1.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $3 50 each.

Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1. Solid Silver, $1 50.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Terms Cash (a reference). Send for a Catalogue.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,

261 Broadway, New York.

The Standard American Billiard Table.

Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1859. The best and only reliable billiard tables manufactured. Slate, Cushion and correct article relating to billiards, for sale by FRIELAN & COLLENDER, corner of Crosby and Spring Streets, New York.

Mr. Kice Military and Collegiate Institute. The Fall Term opens Oct. 5th, 1863. For circulars address A. B. WIGGIN, A.M., Mount Kisco, Westchester Co., N. Y.

TWO WORKS

Sent by mail.

No pay expected until received, read, and approved.

1st. DR. S. S. FITCH'S SIX LECTURES on the Causes, Prevention, and Cure of Consumption, Skin Diseases, Sick and Female Complaints, &c. On the Mode and Rules for Preserving Health, &c. Price $1. Engravings. Price $1.

2d. DR. S. S. FITCH'S NEW WORK on Heart Diseases, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Dropsy, &c., with many Valuable Medical Prescriptions for these Diseases. 168 pages. 6 engravings. Price $1 00. Address DR. S. S. FITCH, No. 714 Broadway, New York.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enameled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, Cannon, Flags, &c., and you can play all the standard games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The trade supplied. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

465 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

A NEW STORY

By a great

American Authoress

Is now ready in the

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

ENTITLED

The Calcraft Property,

By

Mrs. Catherine A. Warfield,

author of

Household of Bouverii.

The thousands of admirers of her great work HOUSEHOLD OF BOUVERII, should not fail to read the opening chapters of

The Calcraft Property,

A Record of Kentucky.

Written expressly for the

NEW YORK WEEKLY.

For sale everywhere.

Incomparably the best Book about the War.—Washington Chronicle.

A faithful Picture of the Soldier's actual daily Life in the Camp, the Fight, and on the March.—Christian Inquirer.

THE BIVOUAC

AND

THE BATTLE-FIELD;

OR,

Campaign Sketches of Virginia and Maryland.

BY

Captain George F. Noyes.

12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send this work by mail postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 25.

Captain Noyes's Bivouac and Battle-field is a record of the personal experience of one of General Doubleday's first staff in Virginia, told to simply, nimbly, and graphically, that the reader will at once comprehend the daily routine of a soldier in active service. It is full of anecdote, of incident, of striking descriptions, and is a most delightful and instructive volume.

From the Christian Inquirer.

We have seen no account which conveys so faithful a picture of a soldier's actual daily life in the camp, the fight, and on the march.* * There is a general tone of cheerfulness and manliness in the record, and we cordially recommend it to those infected with despondency; and his resilience to seize the humorous side of campaign life and the book a sprightliness eminently calculated to make it pleasant reading.*

From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The battle-pictures are very fine, and the philosophic comments admirable.

From the Portland Transcript.

His pictures of camp-life and of the battle-field are the most vivid and life-like we have seen. He evidently learns from the battle of South Mountain is a remarkable specimen of word-painting.

From the Washington Chronicle.

Incomparably the best book we have yet seen about the war and its varied scenes. We have read it with intense interest, and have learned more from it of what war is than we had thought it possible to learn even from books. So complete is the spell of the truthful narrative that one seems to accompany the author and see all that he saw, and almost feel all that he felt.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, N. Y.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With numerous Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain GEORGE F. NOYES. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By SHUTTLEWORTH KAY, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. HUTCHISON, Author of "Olive Blake's Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. New and Second ready. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00

Two Copies for One Year 5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

Back Numbers and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00

One Copy for Two Years 3 00

And an Extra Copy until be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20 00.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for Ingtin, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

WANTED—AN ŒDIPUS.

THE SOUTHERN SPHINX. "NOW, MASSA CONFEDERATE, what are you gwine to do with me?"

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities, AND AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN, No. 38 Wall Street.

Orders received for Five-Twenty Bonds at Par, interest to commence with date of payment.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes.

" One Year Certificates.

" Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881.

And all other Government Securities bought, sold, and constantly on hand.

Accounts of Banks, Bankers, and others received on favorable terms.

Special attention given to the Collection of Government Vouchers, Quartermasters' Checks, and mustering Certificates of Indebtedness.

FISK & HATCH, 38 Wall Street.

Straightforward!

Read

Lincoln's Letters on National Questions.

I. To General McClellan.—II. To Horace Greeley.—III. To Fernando Wood.—IV. To the Albany Committee.—V. To Governor Seymour.—VI. To the Springfield Meeting.

A neat 12mo pamphlet. Price, post-paid, 3 cents; Two Copies, 10 cents. Stamps received. Sold by all News Agents.

H. H. LLOYD & CO., Publishers, 81 John St., N. Y.

From the N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10, 1863.

"One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered.

Magic Time OBSERVERS!

The Perfection of Mechanism

HUBBARD BROS. IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

DEDUCE A HUNDRED, OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH CONSISTED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty, of which we are the only consignees in this country! In this watch is not connected with its mechanism its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The case of this watch is composed of two metals, the exterior the color of fine 18 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate time-piece. Its size is convenient, measuring but two inches across it. Price, expertly engraved, per case of half dozen, $264. Sample Watches, in neat Morocco Cases, $50. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

TERMS: CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers, Iron Safes, cor. Courtlandt Street, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N.Y.,

15 Rue d'Enghien, Paris,

47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Stubbs' Ointment, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 30 cents. Address C. C. STUBBS, Troy, N. Y.

A Bad Breath—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentrifice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

H. T. PETTELER & CO., 21 and 35 Dey Street, N. Y., and for Sale by all Druggists.

American Enamelled Metallic Collar Co.,

No. 94 Pine Street, New York.

Are now manufacturing their splendid Collars, which for shape, appearance, and durability are FAR IN ADVANCE of anything heretofore produced.

They are the inventors and manufacturers of the only real "TURN-OVER" COLLAR ever offered.

These Collars are infinitely SUPERIOR TO STEEL, being more flexible, and the method by which they are manufactured BEING A NON-CONDUCTOR, renders them free from the objectionable feature of the steel collar, viz.: the courting of that dangerous element, electricity, in the shape of lightning. Unless it be a "Choker," for $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar, to the AMERICAN ENAMELLED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 5173 New York City Post Office, and receive it by return mail.

They are the inventors and manufacturers of the only real "TURN-OVER" COLLAR ever offered.

These Collars are infinitely SUPERIOR TO STEEL, being more flexible, and the method by which they are manufactured BEING A NON-CONDUCTOR, renders them free from the objectionable feature of the steel collar, viz.: the courting of that dangerous element, electricity, in the shape of lightning. Unless it be a "Choker," for $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar, to the AMERICAN ENAMELLED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 5173 New York City Post Office, and receive it by return mail.

PHYSIOGNOMY,

OR SIGNS OF CHARACTER, and "How to Read Them;" Physiology, the functions of the body; Phrenology, the organs of the brain; Ethnology, the races of man; and Pyrhology, the science of the soul, are given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, Vol. 38 (now), commenced July. $1 50 a year. Single number, 15 cents, by first post. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

EDWARD ALLEN 1846 IND. VOS

Annexed is a fac-simile design of the SOLDIER'S COMPANY PIN. The letter representing the COMPANY is in BOLD RELIEF, and very conspicuous.

The undersigned will forward to any soldier one of the above pins in solid silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar.

For CORPS BADGES, see inside.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO., 293 Broadway, N. Y.

THE BEST CHANCE FOR AGENTS TO MAKE money is on Mrs. Stephens' Great Work, the Pictorial History of the War for the Union. It is the work for the people. It is meeting with an unprecedented success. For particulars and agency, address JOHN G. WELLS, 165 William Street, New York.

GREAT TRIUMPH.

STEINWAY & SONS, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, N. Y., are awarded a first prize medal at the late World's International Exhibition, London. There were two hundred and ninety-one pianos from all parts of the world entered for competition.

The special correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinways' endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A Splendid New Book for Boys!

"The Drummer Boy

Is a story of Marmaduke Bluewing's adventures in North Carolina—a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and rapid incident—of daring and enthusiasm of the young hero is painted in vivid colors."—New York Evening Post.

Elegantly illustrated. Price $1 66.

Just published by J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all book-stores.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be sent, postage paid, for $2 50; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3 50. Address,

HENRY CRAIG,
315 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

BENJAMIN'S GOLD MEDAL TRUSS is deserving of, as it has always received, the highest premium. It retains the worst rupture with ease without pressure upon the cord or spine. Never rusts nor weakens from use. It cures all recent and many long standing cases. No. 1 Bareday Street, N. Y., opposite the Astor House, formerly of 14 Eardsman Street.

WATCHES FREE. $15 Per Day Easy $15

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can create a splendid business by it. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, and made money for. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all agents. Package in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. See "$15 per day Easy" on inside page.

S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 189 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

Gold Pens and Cases,

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.

Ladies' Pens-	$ 75	Engrossing Pens	$2 00
Med. "	1 00	Union "	2 50
Large "	1 25	Mammoth "	3 00
Commercial Pens	1 50	Commercial Eureka	2 25
Large Eureka "	1 75	Mammoth Eureka	2 50

The above Pens are 14 carats fine, and warranted perfect in every respect for 1 year. A written guarantee accompanies each Pen. These Pens are well known in the mercantile community for the last (10) Ten years, and the subscriber believes, from the number of unsolicited testimonials given him, that they are the best Pen ever in use, or he would not be able to give them the guarantee he does. Send for a circular, before purchasing elsewhere, giving the exact sizes and prices of the various styles of Pens and Cases. Pens made to order to suit any hand or style of writing. Beware of the imitation Johnson Pens and Cases. Pens sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Pens reprinted on the receipt of 36 Cts.

E. S. JOHNSON,
Manufactory and Office, 15 Maiden Lane,
New York City.

Fish's Patent Lamp Heating APPARATUS.

Every Family should have One.

For descriptive circulars and Price List, address W. D. RUSSELL, Agent, 306 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind.

Address

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BARNUM'S, Corner of Fulton and Nassau, New York.

NOW READY.
New Edition Revised.
U. S. ARMY REGULATIONS;

With an Appendix containing the Changes and Laws affecting Army Regulations and Articles of War to June 30, 1863. Official. One volume octavo, pages 594, price $1 50. For sale by Booksellers and Newsdealers everywhere. Sent free on receipt of price.

Address GEORGE W. CHILDS, Publisher,
628 & 630 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

N. B. The old edition is now obsolete.

$22 WATCHES. $22

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver, heavy Hunting Case, warranted, for $22. Retail price $30.

Genuine Full Jewelled American Lever Watches, in 4 ounce Coin Silver Hunting Case, gold joint, for $30. Also every variety of good watches, at equally low rates. All orders from the army must be prepaid, as the express companies will not take Bills for Collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
208 Broadway New York.

How to Paint Photographs.

A NEW WORK.

Just published. Price 10 cents. Sold by all principal Booksellers, Artists' supply-men, and Stock Dealers, and sent, post-paid, by the publisher.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

To all Wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlement of Vineland. Rich soil, Good crops of Wheat, Corn, Grapes, Peaches, &c., to be seen—only 30 miles from Philadelphia. Delightful climate—59 acre tracts of from $10 to $20 per acre, payable within 4 years. Good Schools and society. Good crops can be seen growing. Hundreds are settling. On account of extreme sickness of climate, it is highly beneficial to pulmonary complaints. Apply to CHAS. K. LANDIS, F.M., Vineland, Cumberland Co., New Jersey. Report of Solon Robinson and Vineland Rural sent free. From Report of Solon Robinson, Ag. Ed. Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts in on almost level position, and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western Prairies."

Patent Fountain Brush, for Marking Boxes, Bundles, &c. Size 3½ by 6. F. P. CLARK & CO., Northampton, Mass.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

STEEL COLLARS

AND CUFFS, ENAMELLED LILY WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by Post to any part of the Union on receipt of $1.15.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS

Made to Measure at $24. $30, $36, & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and large assortment of different styles of shirting and colors sent free everywhere.

FRENCH FLANNEL OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment in New York, $2 76, $3, $3 75 each; all cut one size full.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be enclosed—25 cents for each Shirt.

Send the size of your neck.

ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS,

$1, $1 25, $2 25, and $2 50.

SCOTCH LAMBS' WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS,

S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF L.Y.D.S.
Lustrumous,

Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S

YELLOW DOCK SYRUP,

Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nervous System, and Health to every Channel, Joint, and Limb.

Over 100,000 bottles of this medicine cured.

Depot, 130 CHATHAM ST., N. Y. Sold 563 GRAND ST. Beware of IMITATIONS. YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Use no other. Established 1846. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

The Great Secret for soldiers. Mailed for 10 cents. Address WM. PUTTEN, Box 1945, Philadelphia, Pa.

IMMENSE PROFITS!

Can be made selling our New Large Stationery Prize Packets. A Splendid Premium given to all who act as Agents. Send for our New Circular.

S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 189 Beekman St., N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $10. Each watch sealed in the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 35 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. Those who want one that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all their engagements."

All kinds Sewing Machine Needles, at 25 cts. per dozen. J. BARTLETT'S,
The only GENERAL NEEDLE DEPOT, 643 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 355.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

RECEPTION OF THE COMMON COUNCIL COMMITTEE BY ADMIRAL LISOVSKI ON BOARD THE FLAG-SHIP "ALEXANDER NEVSKI."—[SEE PAGE 662.]

A Proclamation by the President of the United States of America.

The year that is drawing toward its close has been filled with the blessings of fruitful fields and healthful skies. To these bounties, which are so constantly enjoyed that we are prone to forget the source from which they come, others have been added which are of so extraordinary a nature that they can not fail to penetrate and soften even the heart which is habitually insensible to the ever-watchful providence of Almighty God.

In the midst of a civil war of unequaled magnitude and severity, which has sometimes seemed to invite and provoke the aggressions of foreign states, peace has been preserved with all nations, order has been maintained, the laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed every where, except in the theatre of military conflict, while that theatre has been greatly contracted by the advancing armies and navies of the Union.

The needful diversions of wealth and strength from the fields of peaceful industry to the national defense have not arrested the plow, the shuttle, or the ship. The axe has enlarged the borders of our settlements, and the mines, as well of iron and coal as of the precious metals, have yielded even more abundantly than heretofore. Population has steadily increased, notwithstanding the waste that has been made in the camp, the siege, and the battle-field; and the country, rejoicing in the consciousness of augmented strength and vigor, is permitted to expect continuance of years with large increase of freedom.

No human counsel hath devised, nor hath any mortal hand worked out these great things. They are the gracious gifts of the Most High God, who, while dealing with us in anger for our sins, hath nevertheless remembered mercy.

It has seemed to me fit and proper that they should be solemnly, reverently, and gratefully acknowledged as with one heart and voice by the whole American people; I do, therefore, invite my fellow-citizens in every part of the United States, and also those who are at sea, and those who are sojourning in foreign lands, to set apart and observe the last Thursday of November next as a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to our beneficent Father who dwelleth in the heavens. And I recommend to them that, while offering up the ascriptions justly due to Him for such singular deliverances and blessings, they do also, with humble penitence for our national perverseness and disobedience, commend to His tender care all those who have become widows, orphans, mourners, or sufferers in the lamentable civil strife in which we are unavoidably engaged, and fervently implore the interposition of the Almighty hand to heal the wounds of the nation, and to restore it, as soon as may be consistent with the Divine purposes, to the full enjoyment of peace, harmony, tranquillity, and union.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-eighth. Abraham Lincoln.

By the President:
William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, October 17, 1863.

A RUSSIAN ALLIANCE.

THE fundamental principle of the foreign policy of the United States has always been to beware of entangling foreign alliances. It was Washington who laid down the principle, and Presidents and statesmen of all parties have uniformly adhered to it ever since. Of that principle the natural corollary was the Monroe doctrine, which, though it was not proclaimed till twenty years after Washington's time, has nevertheless taken as deep root as a part of our national policy as the parental doctrine from which it sprang.

We all dislike to see any principle of policy settled by the Father of the Country being brought into question; but still it is obvious that, as the world has kept on moving since Washington's time, there must be a great portion of his work which, though perfect enough in his day, has, by the advancement of civilization and the changes in the world's condition and circumstances, been rendered susceptible of improvement now. Is it not possible that this dread of "entangling foreign alliances" may have been wiser or more natural seventy years ago than it is now?

When Washington lived steam, telegraphs, and railroads were unknown, and the United States were thirty days' distant from the nearest part of Europe. An alliance offensive and defensive with a European nation might have obliged us to send fleets and armies to points forty, fifty, and sixty days' distance from home—a risk not to be encountered on any condition short of absolute necessity. Again, in Washington's time intelligence circulated slowly. One nation knew little of another; and peoples separated by an ocean were absolutely ignorant of the most common features of each other's idiosyncrasy. It is easy to understand why Washington sought to guard the nation he had so largely helped to create against alliances with strangers as ignorant of our views and purposes as we were of theirs. And again, in his time the United States were so far separated from the rest of the world that their very isolation was ample protection against foreign attack. No European nation could hope to carry on war against them, at a distance of 3000 or 4000 miles from their base, with any reasonable hope of substantial success. So protected, we needed no foreign allies, and had we entered into alliances, the gain would all have been on the side of our ally.

But three quarters of a century have changed all this. We are now within fifteen days of almost any part of the coast of Europe. During this war we have sent out naval expeditions on as long voyages as from here to Liverpool or Brest. It was further from London to Balaclava than from Liverpool to New York. Steam has placed Europe and America within easy striking distance of each other, and the ocean is no longer a protection against hostile attack. The telegraph and the spread of intelligence have, moreover, made us all familiar with the position, policy, views, and purposes of each other. We know precisely what a foreign alliance might involve. Furthermore, we are no longer isolated from the rest of the world. Our commerce, and our steadily increasing communication with all parts of the world, have made us part and parcel of the great civilized community of mankind; nothing which happens any where is now indifferent to us, and our transactions interest all the rest of the world.

It seems quite doubtful, under these circumstances, whether we can possibly much longer maintain the position of proud isolation which Washington coveted; and it is pretty certain, as things are now shaping, that if we do we shall lose as much as we gain by doing so.

The cardinal principle of the policy of the Western Powers of Europe is a steady offensive and defensive alliance. France and England—was Louis Napoleon's calculation—if heartily united, can rule the world. That alliance, formed by the Emperor, was maintained through the Crimean war and the Chinese war, and was more lately exemplified in the recognition of the Southern rebels by both Powers conjointly. If the Slave Confederacy is recognized the recognition will be simultaneous at London and Paris, the calculation being that the United States could not afford to make war on both the Western Powers. The alliance of the Western Powers is in fact, if not in name, a hostile combination against the United States.

What is our proper reply to this hostile combination? When Lee reinforced Bragg we replied by sending two corps of the Army of the Potomac to Rosecrans. Would it not be wise to meet the hostile alliance of the Western Powers of Europe by an alliance with Russia? France and England united can do and dare much against Russia alone or the United States alone; but against Russia and the United States combined what could they do?

The analogies between the American and the Russian peoples have too often been described to need further explanation here. Russia, like the United States, is a nation of the future. Its capabilities are only just being developed. Its national destiny is barely shaped. Its very institutions are in their cradle, and have yet to be modeled to fit advancing civilization and the spread of intelligence. Like the United States, Russia is in the agonies of a terrible transition: the Russian serfs, like the American negroes, are receiving their liberty; and the Russian boiars, like the Southern slave-owners, are mutinous at the loss of their property. When this great problem shall have been solved, and the Russian people shall consist of 100,000,000 of intelligent, educated human beings, it is possible that Russian institutions will have been welded by the force of civilization into a similarity with ours. At that period the United States will probably also contain 100,000,000 of educated, intelligent people. To two such peoples, firmly bound together by an alliance as well as by traditional sympathy and good feeling, what would be impossible? Certainly the least of the purposes which they could achieve would be to keep the peace of the world, and prevent the ambition of despots or the knavery of shopkeepers from embroiling nations in useless wars.

At the present time Russia and the United States occupy remarkably similar positions. A portion of the subjects of the Russian empire, residing in Poland, have attempted to secede and set up an independent national existence, just as our Southern slave-owners have tried to secede from the Union and set up a Slave Confederacy; and the Czar, like the Government of the Union, has undertaken to put down the insurrection by force of arms. In that undertaking, which every Government is bound to make under penalty of national suicide, Russia, like the United States, has been thwarted and annoyed by the interference of France and England. The Czar, like Mr. Lincoln, nevertheless perseveres in his purpose; and, being perfectly in earnest and determined, has sent a fleet into our waters, in order that, if war should occur, British and French commerce should not escape as cheaply as they did in the Crimean contest. We run no similar risk of being blockaded in the event of war with England and France, and need not send our squadrons away; but still we are preparing, in our way, by the construction of fast cruisers and heavy iron-clads.

An alliance between Russia and the United States at the present time would probably relieve both of us from all apprehensions of foreign interference. It is not likely that it would involve either nation in war. On the contrary, it would probably be the best possible guarantee against war. It would be highly popular in both countries, and it is hard to see what practical dangers it could involve.

The reception given last week in this city to Admiral Lisovski and his officers will create more apprehension at the Tuileries and at St. James than even the Parrott gun or the capture of the Atlanta. If it be followed up by diplomatic negotiations, with a view to an alliance with the Czar, it may prove an epoch of no mean importance in history

THE LOUNGER.

OUR PLATFORM.

New York, September 29, 1863.

Since its first issue myself and family have been constant readers of your valuable Weekly, and the general character of its illustrations, selected and original reading matter, have been unexceptionable; but I have noticed, within a recent period, that you begin to dabble in the dirty pool of partisan politics, and thus lower the high character your paper has attained, and render it unfit for a place upon the centre table, or to be read by those that assemble around the family altar. Sincerely believing this, I have been compelled to exclude it from my house more in sorrow than anger, for, until recently, it was there a welcome visitor.

I would not be understood as questioning your right to publish what you please. But I deny the right of a public journal, that boasts of its neutrality in matters political, under that guise to publish articles, in regard to men and things, utterly devoid of truth, and in language that would disgrace the lowest partisan political journal in the land. If you are to publish a political journal let it be known, and the public will know what they buy, and not under the guise of illustrations seek to force upon them sentiments political that are unpalatable to those who do not think as you may, and not in accordance with their views of principle and party.

Yours,
Henry E. Smith.

Dear Mr. Smith,—Harper's Weekly is issued every week, and sold for six cents a copy. The illustrations are always worth more than that money; and if any purchaser does not like the sentiments he finds here he can abstain from any future purchase. You, Mr. Smith, ought to understand that you confer no favor upon any body but yourself in buying the paper, and that no sentiments are "forced" upon any body "under the guise of illustrations" or in any way whatever.

You say that the paper, notwithstanding its professions, dabbles in party politics. The remark betrays your sympathies. The country is in mortal peril from a conspiracy to overthrow the Government and to perpetuate Slavery. The stability of that Government is the security of all the rights and property of the citizens. Its defense, therefore, is not only the instinct of patriotism and honor, but of individual interest. But the defense of the Government is in no sense a party measure, except as it tends to bring to grief the party of rebels, Copperheads, and foreign enemies. Instinctively, therefore, and with the consent of all our convictions and faculties, we support the Government. It is not because it is Democratic or Republican, but because it is the Constitutional Government of the United States. If General Dix, a life-long Democrat, were President, we should do exactly what we do when Abraham Lincoln, a life-long Whig, fills the chair. It is not a question of persons or of parties, but of principle and of national existence.

We support also every necessary measure of war. We are, indeed, most sincerely rejoiced that the war waged upon the Government to secure the supremacy of slavery offers the opportunity for settling the eternal vexation of our history, and the constant menace of our peace and permanence, by overthrowing slavery itself. Our conscience and common sense alike approve the emancipation policy. But we support it not as a party measure, for it is not one. There are plenty of the President's political friends who did not like it. We support it not as a Democratic or Republican policy, but as the policy of common sense happily authorized by the Constitution. And upon this ground we stand side by side with the most eminent Democrats, such as Generals Butler, Logan, Grant, Rosecrans, and Burnside, who know exactly what the war demands.

In thus supporting the Government and its policy, in the war of self-defense against the foulest rebellion, we are of course the enemies of all its enemies, whether they are rebels or Copperheads, Englishmen or Frenchmen. We especially denounce and pursue Horatio Seymour, because he is the chosen representative of the policy which aims to pinion the arms of the Government while the rebellion stabs it to the heart. We oppose him, earnestly and constantly, because, in a crisis when national danger should obliterate all party lines, he is a persistent and shameless political partisan. We oppose him because, in all this fierce and momentous struggle, no sincere word of sympathy for his country, or her defenders, or her cause has even by chance dropped from his lips or pen; because all his words justify treason and palliate rebellion, and all his acts perplex the Government and prolong the war; because he is openly counted by the rebel leaders and papers as one of their "friends;" and because the most disloyal, dangerous, and criminal of the population are called by him "friends" of his own. We oppose Horatio Seymour for precisely the same reasons that we do Jefferson Davis, because we believe him to be an enemy of the Government, and because he openly declares that he would rather see the Union dissolved than slavery destroyed. We do not oppose him as a Democrat any more than we oppose Judah Benjamin as a Democrat, but as we combat Vallandigham as an accessory to national dishonor and ruin. We do not oppose him as a Democrat, because John A. Dix, Joseph Holt, and Andrew Johnson are quite as good Democrats as Horatio Seymour, and we stand by them shoulder to shoulder, and heart to heart.

What we say to you here, and now, has been said a hundred times in this paper. There is nothing equivocal in its position. It knows no party but the country, no politics but all measures necessary for its salvation.

Yours truly,
Dear Mr. Smith,
The Lounger.

STUDY FOR A COPPERHEAD EDITORIAL.

We have fallen upon evil times. We assist at the death-throes of the republic. From the moment when Abraham Lincoln haughtily refused to invite our outraged Southern brothers to state upon what terms they would consent to remain in the Union our doom has been sealed. Carthago delenda est! Not content with overrunning the fair fields of the South with an army which our Southern brothers, in their circumstances, may be pardoned for calling a Vandal horde—not satisfied with the effort, which history will fitly characterize, to plunge peaceful Southern society into the blackest gulf of massacre, rape, and fire, Abraham Lincoln, whom our naturally exasperated Southern brothers stigmatize with characteristic poetic fervor as a gorilla, has not hesitated to trample upon all law, all securities of social order, all the guaranteed rights of American citizens, turning the entire North into a huge Bastile, a colossal continental dungeon, which echoes and re-echoes continually with the moans and cries or the futile shouts of indignation of the oppressed but helpless people beneath his heel.

We have not failed in our duty. We have warned and again warned the American people in the most solemn manner that they were in mortal peril from this man whom our warm-blooded and excited Southern brothers have often picturesquely described as a drunken ape. But our advice to the country has been in vain. We have mourned to our fellow-citizens, and they have not wept. And now behold the result! The last sublime point of audacity has been scaled by the fanatical feet of him whom our brothers of the South, with startling emphasis, have, with what justice let time determine, denounced as the tyrant Lincoln.

The Confiscation Act, the atrocious, absurd, and inoperative Emancipation Act (alas for the delicate wives and daughters of the sunny South!), and the Habeas Corpus Suspension were blows under which this unhappy land still staggers—the recreant land, which sees a noble martyr and exile sighing upon the Canadian shore, and yet does not in thunder tones cry to him, "Come over and help us!"

But these were only the ring and the halter by which the country and our liberties were to be drawn down to receive the finishing blow. That has at last descended. America is discrowned among the nations. We are lost forever, unless under the leadership of tried statesmen, a Seymour, a Wood and his brother, a Vallandigham, and a Wickliffe, we strike a despairing blow and conquer the conqueror.

Details are useless. In the universal wreck why specify any single loss? But the final damning proof of the utter subserviency of the present imbecile Administration to the rankest Puritan fanaticism is the proclamation for Thanksgiving! What is Thanksgiving? It is a Yankee, Puritan, Roundhead, sniveling, snuffling, canting, hypocritical institution. It smells of baked beans, roast turkey, and Indian pudding, not to say pumpkin-pies and soft custards. Pah! We desire in all coolness to see the Constitutional warrant for such an appalling innovation upon national customs. We call for chapter and verse. It is an outrageous and illegal ebullition of that Roundhead spirit of Phariseeism which incessantly bloats New England conceit. Why, let us ask—why should we return thanks for the wasted fields and desolate homes of our Southern brothers? Why should we be glad that England stops the Confederate rams? Are we grown such caitiffs that we are unwilling to give fair play to an honorable antagonist? O tempora! O mores!

But is it possible that the despotism under which we live—or, rather, die—has so paralyzed our faculties that we do not see the claw in this smooth-seeming paw? Is not this Thanksgiving notoriously a State institution? Was it not always appointed by the Puritan Governors and their imitators? And shall we, without a murmur, see the Washington tyranny sweep this poor State-right away? Awake, freemen! Arise, ye oppressed! Let the imperial State of New York rally around her beloved and honored head. Let him take up the gauge so scornfully hurled at him and at our sovereignty, and say to Lincoln and his minions, in their teeth, that the people of the country have had enough of Yankee fanaticism, of Puritanism, and of cant, and are resolved to vindicate the majesty of State rights, and to appeal to the hearts of our betrayed Southern brothers, which yearn for the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is, and to insist upon their mentioning the terms of their submission. Could we but see Seymour President, Robert Toombs Secretary of State, General Lee in the War Department, and Fernando Wood in the Treasury, we should feel sure that the country was redeemed, and that we should have no more occasion for canting Thanksgiving proclamations.

THE FRENCH PAMPHLET.

The late French pamphlet by Michel Chevalier has been wisely translated and printed in the New York Times. It treats the United States as the Czar treated Turkey. Turkey was a mortally sick man upon whose estate Russia must administer. So, in Mr. Chevalier's view, speaking unquestionably what the Emperor wishes to have generally believed, the United States Government is virtually overthrown, and France must "consecrate final separation." It is impossible for any American but a rebel or a Copperhead to read this shameless pamphlet of one of Louis Napoleon's literary lackeys without a boiling of the blood. But we wish now, as briefly and coolly as possible, to state the substance of the work.

It is divided into four parts. The first begins by remarking that distant wars are always unpopular in France. Hence it is a second-rate colonial power. Frenchmen in war look to glory, and not to politics or business. When England and Spain withdrew from the treaty of Soledad, there was but one feeling of regret in France at the necessary war with Mexico. The active opponents of the war said that France was going to impose a Government; and France, who was false to his oaths, and whose administration was deplorable, was represented as the choice of the Mexicans. It was said, too, that the Emperor was too adventurous, and the first ill-success at Puebla awoke the echoes of Napoleon Bourbon (Prince Napoleon's party), and endless calumnies were cast upon the project.

The war is more than justified by the wrongs of France. She aims to help the Mexicans choose a Government which pleases them. After the Puebla failure she resolved to have force enough to secure success. Others saw only glory in the plan, but Louis Napoleon had laid down a net policy. It his interference to Keep by that France wishes the United States well, but does not wish to see her the sole distributor of the products of the New World. She must oppose the absorption of the Southern by the Northern American States, and also the diminution of the Latin race upon the Western continent. The interest which carries France to Mexico has already given her sympathy to secession. The European army in Mexico is but the van-guard of a great commercial immigration. Napoleon III. has long planned what he is doing, and he will push it to its complete conclusion.

The second part of the pamphlet is devoted to a survey of the soil, climate, and resources of Mexico. Why are they not turned to better account by the Mexicans? Because anarchy is fomented by the leaders, and the people are too feeble in numbers for the territory; of these people, also, the Indians and Creoles are too lazy or tyrannical. The Mexican soil demands intelligent immigration and capital. Now the tranquillity and solidity of French institutions pushes away from us all these kinds of colonists. Give them protection, and they will go to Mexico. It is thus a national interest that takes France to Mexico; and whether the Mexican accepts or not, French influence will remain there. The French army carries to Mexico—1st, cohesion; 2d, order; 3d, industry; 4th, an army. At home the empire has utilized Socialism and conquered anarchy. It wishes to do this in Mexico: but it can not do it with profit and security until after the recognition of the Confederate States.

The third part opens by the remark that the war has shown Europe how much she was menaced by the power of the United States. At the same time she has learned how precarious is an industry which depends upon a single source of material, with all the vicissitudes which it is subject. France also has no particular interest in ending the war. She sees with satisfaction a great power destroying itself, and the fears for Canada, which, at the end of the war, the North might seize as compensation for the lost South. While the war lasts her commerce profits and she turns to her colonies. Peace is the time developing in India the cotton culture. She will not be the first to recognize the South. Her rejection by both the overtures of France to that and shows that. But France can only look to the South for cotton, which, for quality and abundance, is the best of all. This the Federals know, and the war is one of interest. Emancipation is a pretext to win the hands of Europe. If victorious, the Federals would not emancipate for fear of hurting the cotton culture. In Europe we understand their coarse and ferocious egotism. We see that the liberty they have at the North, and the Governor of Minnesota offers twenty-five dollars for an Indian scalp. If the Federals conquer, the Congress will suffer. The European power which first recognizes the Confederacy can exact conditions favorable to the blacks. If France be the first, humanity and progress are secure. Emancipation at some time will come from the alliance of cotton, France and the Confederates. Besides, slavery need be no bar to recognition. France has cordial relations with many slaveholding states, and the Northern States saw long ago this result of emancipation from the alliance of some foreign power with the South. Mr. Monroe declared that war but a policy of insurance against civilization.

The men of the North have destroyed every guarantee of liberty in order to hold the position which yield them a support. The model republic is gone. The men of the North' would never confess the magnitude of the rent of the South, for the latter have furnished the great statesmen and most of the Presidents. They are mere peddlers, and look for gain by its intelligence and would destroy the rampart against Europeanism, the North would even annihilate the Confederate States, that is the North which has supported Jeanre in Mexico. The war in America can serve France only if it ends in separation. At first, the Confederates will be our allies against the North; second, Mexico in our hands and the North kept off, will do all she can; third, our manufacturers will be sure of cotton.

The fourth part declares that the American question must be solved at once. There is no time possible in the reconstruction of the Union. The North is powerless in ideas, arms, and organization, and can not subdue the South. Consequently separation ends the war. While Europe believed that the United States were invincible, it was right not to do nothing. But the South has made out its policy, its programme, and its rights; the peculiar interest of France conforms to it; and the moment she recognizes the Confederate States their force is increased five-fold. The secondary commercial nations will follow, and if slavery had displeased them, they will be satisfied that humanity will be cared for when France leads. Spain, which owns Cuba, will follow. Austria, of Maximilian accept, will, of course, assent. And England will not refuse. The North will abandon the struggle, and in case of need the French military marine would support those diplomatic acts.

As a discussion of French Mexican and American policy this pamphlet, of which we have given a faithful analysis, is rather brilliant nor forcible. It is merely a painful special plea for a foregone conclusion. It suggests and sounds public sentiment in France. In no other way does it help Louis Napoleon to answer the question upon which depends the peace of the world, whether he will remain in Mexico. To say it is to imperil France. To go is to endanger himself.

A YEAR TOO LATE.

IT is hinted in the Index, the rebel organ in London, and by a newspaper correspondent from Baltimore, who seems to have had extensive conversations with the rebel managers, that it is not impossible that Davis will in some way try the experiment of overthrowing slavery. In a speech delivered two years ago Mr. Wendell Phillips said that Davis would certainly do it, and he urged it as a reason for our pushing the start of him. The rebels are already too late.

By such an act the entire theory of the rebellion falls. That theory is that slavery is the foundation of liberty; that the doctrine of the United States Government is impossible and false; and that in the Southern States no relation between whites and blacks is possible except that of slavery. Moreover, all the pretense of revolution disappears with such an act. The constitutional right of secession having been proved to be simply the constitutional right of anarchy, the only pretext left to the rebels was the right of revolution against an apprehended oppression, which was to consist in some undefined action on the subject of law. Then the rebels arm and free slaves, therefore, they confess that they can not build upon the corner-stone they have so vaunted, and that the key of the arch they do the very thing themselves the fear of which from others they allege as a justification of this bloody war.

Of course no considerations of logic or common sense would influence them in so momentous an act. They would do it for reasons, as we have seen, agree throws his tomahawk at a victorious foe.

But how many hands can they spare from their corn-fields? How much do the slaves know of the scope of the war? How far can they be trusted with arms in their hands? How much do they believe of a promise of freedom? Which army will they suppose to be their true friend? Whose victory would they most desire would secure their liberty? In a word, will they believe Abraham Lincoln or Jefferson Davis? These are a few of the questions which the rebel chiefs must ask themselves, and quake as they ask. They are questions which only the experiment can answer. But the slaves know part of the answer to the first question. The rebel subterfuge of emancipation would come too late.

MASTERS AND LACKEYS.

THE peace party, which burns Orphan Asylums and murders unarmed citizens, women, children, and children, and then, by the mouth of its leader, Fernando Wood, talks about the Prince of Peace and the Golden Rule, and says that the arrest of the rebels whose bloody treason it is trying to serve, the 13th of September a resolution was introduced into the Virginia House of Delegates for inquiring into the tone and temper of the people of the United States upon the subject of peace. The House, by a unanimous vote, put its foot upon the resolution.

These rebel gentlemen can not make their Northern lackeys understand. They told them long ago that they were willing to use them, but in their own way. After eighteen months of war the conviction of slavery has been firmly planted, they have signified that it will still be their pleasure to trade with the North. Mr. Vallandigham, brother of Vallandigham, only upon condition of holding their noses. They no more wish a renewal of association with our Northern citizens than the negroes they wish to live in their own slave-pens. Until they were ready to accept the terms which, they were, in their estimation, good enough cattle, like their other "servants," for their purposes. But having failed there, they will not be allowed to them. And now when the vaccine herd, breathing pain branches and fraternity, propose to share their manner with the contented and indignant masters can not kick them away.

It is not the first job which the rebel gentlemen have undertaken and could do. It is not the first to be consoled. The loyal people of the country will manage a spurious "peace" party as they manage an open rebellion. They will only build to conclude that, under the Constitution, no Remnant can lose a right to the free enjoyment of his religion." And do you not see that the Constitution is a prohibiting conclusion? Because, he says, the Constitution has made the free enjoyment of religion one of the supreme laws of the land! Of course it is incredible. But you will find it upon page 85 of the bishop's book, and you will find it there, also, as you read, what Mr. Squeers said when there was very little breakfast, and that very bad, "Here's plenty to begin with."

In a large part of this notable volume the Bishop explains, defends, justifies, and commends the system which whips women to force them to work without wages, and sells their children to pay the debts of the whipper. The substance of this part was published by the "Democratic State Central Committee" of Pennsylvania, and was widely circulated in that State as a Copperhead campaign document, in company with a speech of Judge Woodward, the Copperhead candidate for Governor, in which he takes the same ground as the Bishop. The fact shows that the merits of our great controversy are most rapidly coming to light. The friend of the rebels, for whose success they prayed, and for whom every Copperhead voted, appeared as the open advocate of slavery, supported by a Bishop. But let us not fail to mention that the Bishop of Pennsylvania and his leading clergy did not hesitate to protest, as men and Christians and citizens, against the infamous views set forth by the Vermont Diocesan. The Bishop and the Judge, speaking for slavery, and consequently for rebellion, encountered also another tremendous antagonist. While they were talking smoothly about the "divine sanction and" the "singularly love" of this fraternal system of barbarism and the dark ages, and while the Copperheads carefully spread their talk before the people of Pennsylvania, the loyal men of that State issued a pamphlet, in which the truth is left to its consequences, and the sophisms of the clergyman and the politician were utterly scattered and demolished.

The way in which printing a few extracts from the Bishop's letter or the Judge's speech, and then illustrating them by copious and thrilling passages from the terrible book of Mrs. Kemble, "A Residence on a Georgian Plantation." It was an argument which no man was so dull that he could not comprehend. Every fireside in every remote nook of Pennsylvania, who had been taught that Democracy consisted in "loving niggers," and who therefore lent a willing ear to the divine and the lawyer theorizing about slavery, suddenly saw and felt to the bottom of their souls what slavery is. In every honest man in the land see it and feel it also, and the rebellion, with its Copperhead bulwark, would be swept away like a leaf by the ocean.

The Union and Loyal Leagues of this State can do the great cause no better service than a universal distribution of this Pennsylvania pamphlet, or of a cheap edition of Mrs. Kemble's book. Meanwhile, if any sincere man is troubled for a moment by the sophistry of the Bishop Hopkins, that argument that babies should be bred for sale, let him read Galileo's reply to the objective reply to the question, "Does the Bible sanction American slavery?"

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN returned to his command at Vicksburg September 14, and had an enthusiastic reception.

General PRICE is reported to have been raised to the rank of Lieutenant-General in the rebel service.

General BURNSIDE has issued an order relieving all their commands, and ordered to report at Indianapolis. The 18th and 23d Army Corps, formerly under those officers, are consolidated, called the 4th Army Corps, and placed under command of General D. S. Stanley. A Court of Inquiry is to inquire into the conduct of the deposed generals at the 4th Army Corps.

A movement is on foot in Massachusetts to procure an appointment for Colonel ROBERT GOULD SHAW as a special recognition of the taking of Fort Hudson.

Lieutenant A. H. GRAY, Assistant-Quarter-master, has been promoted to the rank of Captain and ordered to the Department of the Gulf.

Mr. HENRY HOWARD, of Boston, reported to have been killed at Chattanooga, is a prisoner, supposed to be at Richmond. He is on the staff of Brigadier-General under Brigadier-General JOHN H. KING.

Captain ALEXANDER has assumed the command of the privateer Florida in consequence of ill-health. Lieutenant MAURY was lately relieved from it.

Brigadier-General ROBERT ANDERSON, in response to an inquiry from the War Department, has stated that the ship which he hauled down from Sumter on the occasion of its surrender to the rebels is still in his possession, and can never left the captaincy.

In 1858 four officers in our regular army, three of whom belonged to what is now the rebel service, received from exactly alike in pattern and workmanship, for their own use. Two of these swords belong to ROBERT E. LEE and General LEE—are now in the rebel army, and the other two—COLONEL CROSMAN and Lieutenant-Colonel GEORGE H. PORTER—are in the army of the Union.

Major-General HALLECK, in the new Military Governor of Norfolk, arrived in that city on 30th ult., and entered upon the duties of his office.

Colonel ULRIC DAHLGREN arrived at Washington last week. His wound is of a very painful and complicated character. It was received in the recent Peninsular affair. It sides several other operations; but the surgeon is now sanguine of his speedy recovery. Colonel DAHLGREN'S father has been for some time anticipated.

General FREMONT has left the present continue his duties as Provost Marshal General of the Army of the Potomac, Brigadier-General MARCY is extremely difficult to dispense with his services.

Colonel JOHN DAHLGREN, who only a few days ago resumed command of his brigade of cavalry, has been relieved from that duty by order of the President.

Major CHARLES J. HOEY, Paymaster of Volunteers, who was summarily dismissed service, by order, we suppose, of the late Secretary, ascertained that the dismissal was all a hasty blunder. Major HOEY has since called on the same charges made against him, and has had the satisfaction of hearing the charges declared false. His reputation for integrity and ability is unsullied, and the Secretary of the Navy has ordered Paymaster-General Gihon to satisfactory and correct as those of any paymaster in the service.

A Board of Medical officers, to consist of Surgeons J. J. B. MCCAUSLAND, U.S.A., and Surgeon-in-Chief, and Surgeon J. M. CUYLER, U.S.A., has been ordered to convene at New York City on the 15th inst., or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the examination of candidates for appointment as Assistant-Surgeons in the Army, and such Assistant-Surgeons as may be brought before it for promotion as Surgeons.

Lieutenant-Colonel DELANEY, of Cone's Georgia Legion, died on Friday, 9th inst., at Washington on his 8th day of a wound received in a recent skirmish on the Rapidan.

Major-General ROSECRANS, of Cincinnati, Ohio, on 30th ult. on a ten days' leave of absence. Hoeft General Granger, commanding the army of the Maryland Department. There is no foundation for the report of his resignation.

Major F. N. CLARKE, Fifth United States Artillery, is under orders to proceed to Boston, Massachusetts, and report to Major-General Dix, Chief of Recruiting Service, and Chief Mustering and Disbursing Officer of the State. Major W. H. SIDNEY, Fifth United States Infantry, proceeds to Louisville, Kentucky, on similar duty.

General DIX has ordered a Union meeting in Philadelphia on 20th ult. He rapidly reviewed the events of the past and his successes, and predicted that it would not be long before all the armies of the Union would be victorious. The great principle of self-defense compelled the Government to engage in this war.

General DIX arrived and entered at Port Scott on Wednesday, September 23. He will be there until the 29th of October, to finish the remaining business, and receive final settlement of the claims of the Kansas brigade.

A St. Louis letter says that the Department of Kansas will be commanded by General M'NEIL. General CURTIS declined the honor of succeeding BLUNT, who, report says, is under arrest.

FIRST-LIEUTENANT ARTHUR F. SMALL, Adjutant Eleventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, First-Lieutenant ORDAL McDONALD, First Company Andrew's Sharp-Shooters, Captain SAMUEL VOTHERS, and Second-Lieutenant TIMOTHY REED, Ninety-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, have been cashiered for conduct unbecoming officers and gentlemen. Witnesses, and breach of arrest.

The evidence in the case of General MCLEOD has been reviewed by the Judge-Advocate-General and submitted to the President for his decision, which has not yet been promulgated.

Colonel LAIRD, 54th Virginia Regiment (Confederate), has been dismissed the service by order of the President. He was Provost Marshal General of Fredericksburg south of Washington last winter, and was charged with malfeasance in office and disobedience of orders, for which he was tried and honorably acquitted; but General HOOKER, remanding the judgment, disapproved the finding of the court, alleging that the evidence adduced showed that the charges were conclusively proven. The case was referred to the President, who ordered Colonel TATE to be dismissed.

Colonel RAMSAY has been appointed Brigadier-General, and assigned to the charge of the Ordnance Bureau, which he has filled since the retirement of General RENO.

Colonel GILMORE, recently captured by the rebels, was attached to Governor Pierpoint's staff. He was at once subjourning at the house of a relative several miles from Alexandria.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHATTANOOGA.

AT last accounts both armies were confronting each other, and Generals Rosecrans and Longstreet were busy in defense in front of the town, while General Bragg was on the same line fortifying Missionary Ridge. General Rosecrans's reinforcements reached him on 5d, and his force is now believed to be the largest one.

The Richmond Examiner admits that General Rosecrans's position is impregnable, and that the only hope of the rebel General Imboden to cut off the communication between Rosecrans and his reinforcements on the Tennessee and Ohio Railroad had proved a failure.

BURNSIDE'S POSITION.

The position of General BURNSIDE, at last accounts, is announced in a dispatch from Knoxville. His right wing is communicating with the army of the Cumberland. He holds the entire country south from Knoxville to Cumberland Gap, and the whole line of the Virginia Railroad as far as Greenville, on the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad. He also holds possession of all the passes into North Carolina.

BRIDGE BURNED AT MURFREESBORO.

Accounts from Nashville of 5th state that the enemy once destroyed the large railroad bridge south of Murfreesboro, have burned one portion of it, and the other portion they had cut down.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Affairs remain unchanged in General MEADE'S army, and with the exception of some skirmishing between the pickets on either side of the Rapidan, and the firing of the rebel batteries occasionally on our foraging parties, there is nothing to disturb the repose which both Union and rebel soldiers are enjoying in the delicious weather which prevails in the vicinity of the Rapidan.

CHARLESTON.

We have news from Charleston to the 1st inst. Our forces have been engaged with the rebels at Morris and Sumter Island. The troops were in fine health and spirits. Official report of Admiral DAHLGREN'S operations have been received at the Navy Department to the effect that the land and naval forces are not idle in the harbor there. Our guns were making terrible havoc on Forts Sumter, Johnson, and Chatsworth. The enemy's batteries on Fort Moultrie replied briskly.

AFFAIRS IN THE SOUTHWEST.

Dispatches from Cairo to the 8th state that over five thousand Arkansas Unionists have joined our army at Helena, and that the rebel newspapers in Texas referred to Little Rock, and that the railroad between Duvall's Bluff and Little Rock is in charge of Colonel WORTHINGTON, of General Meade, of the Army of the Potomac. The steamer Robert Ingersoll, from St. Louis for Vicksburg, was fired by incendiaries, near Milliken's Bend, on the 29th ult. The flames spread so rapidly that the passengers were forced to jump overboard before the boat could be run to shore. Over forty lives were lost, including several officers of the Federal army.

A RECONNOISSANCE AT MOBILE.

The rebel forts on Dauphin Island, Mobile Harbor and the rebel fort at GRENN'S PASS, near the entrance of Mobile Bay, in which the fort is believed to have been materially damaged, as well as a rebel iron-clad that for a brief thus participated in the engagement.

RUMORED CONSPIRACY AT THE WEST.

Several persons have been arrested and placed in irons in St. Louis, charged with a report that Southern rebels there to burn all the steamers in Western waters which may be of great use to the Government. The investigation is now on foot which will probably unravel the mystery of this desperate undertaking, if any such shoal be in contemplation.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MASON WITHDRAWN FROM ENGLAND.

MR. MASON'S removal from the position of rebel envoy to England is announced. The St. James's Chronicle says that he ever enjoyed a diplomatic character. The writer say that the door of the Foreign Office was never open to universally closed against him in a "public" manner, and that the Government of England, in its "side" action, has not alter the neutral course of the Government, or entrap the Cabinet into a recognition. It was a "side" action.

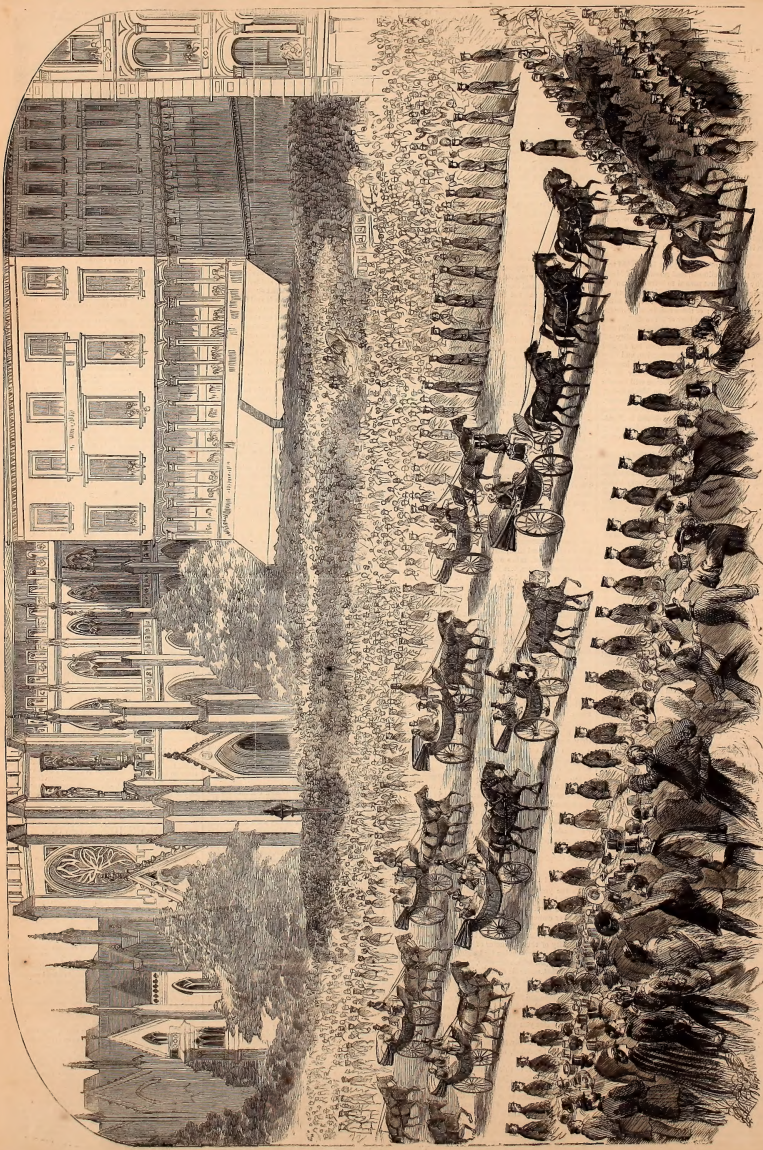
FRANCE.

THE PIRATE AND OUR CRUISERS.

La France says a fleeter steamer than the Kearsarge had arrived at Brest from Madeira, having been seen, 18th of August, off the Canaries, in pursuit of the Florida. The Florida leaves Brest on the 23d, completely repaired, and provisioned for three months. She will not be overtaken, which is as Lisbon, and attack her before she can be joined by the Alabama at Brest, which is expected.

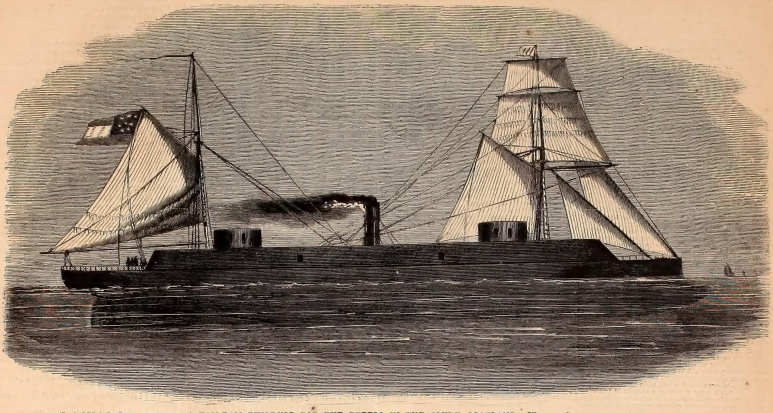
La France says the Federal corvette Kearsarge will be treated at Brest like the Florida. Both belligerents will enjoy the same rights and advantages.

RUSSIA.



A BOLD STAND ON THE POLISH QUESTION.

Russia had replied to the French note on the Polish question. The State paper volunteers the information that the Emperor Alexander has rejected himself. Prince Gortschakoff stated that the Emperor's Government had declared to the note that the Emperors to which an international relations apply, being ever ailment to be the Three Powers, even "if incidentally" also a "friendly" manner.



AUSTRIA.

MORE ROYAL ALLIANCES.

The Archduke LOUIS of Austria—brother of Maximilian—is to be married to the daughter, the only child of the Emperor of Brazil. The London Post regards the event of very high importance, as two thrones on the side of the Atlantic would be thereby made very nearly one. He died by members of the house of Hapsburg, who will mutually guarantee their rights. The London Post speaks of such a royal accomplishment with favor.

THE GRAND PROCESSION OF OUR RUSSIAN VISITORS THROUGH BROADWAY, UNDER ESCORT OF THE MILITIA AND POLICE.—[See Page 663.]

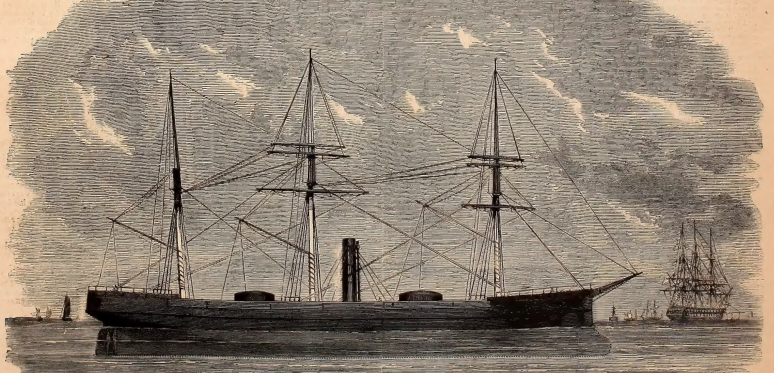
THE ANGLO-REBEL PIRATES—STEAM-RAM BUILDING FOR THE REBELS IN THE CLYDE, SCOTLAND.—[From a Sketch by an American in England.]

THE ANGLO-REBEL RAMS.

The picture of one of Laird's Anglo-Rebel Rams, which we give below, is from a drawing obtained by some patriotic citizens who were lately in England. They smuggled an artist into the yard in which this unscrupulous knave, Laird, is building his pirates, and succeeded in getting a pretty thorough picture. Both vessels are alike. A correspondent of the Providence Journal thus describes them:

"In company with an intelligent and experienced shipmaster we crossed the "Tranmere Ferry," and arrived at the yard at 10½ A.M. The "ram" on the stocks was of the same dimensions as the one previously built. In length about two hundred and fifty feet, forty feet beam, and twenty feet depth of hold, as near as could be judged by the eye. The "stem" is of oiled iron, about six or eight inches thick and twelve or fifteen wide. The bottom is flat, with a slight keel, and the screw as usual, but protected in the conformation of the stern. The "ram" is a projection of solid steel, of the same thickness as the stem, and from six to eight feet beyond this perpendicular line, resembling more nearly in form an inverted nose. When the vessel floats this formidable appendage is below the water-line and invisible. As the clock struck eleven the last block was "knocked from under," and the vessel moved steadily and gracefully into the water. The English ensign was flying from a spar at the "stern-post," and as the hull left the shed the "French" colors were raised at the stem. The momentum acquired carried the vessel nearly across the Mersey, where it was taken in tow by steam-tugs and brought back, beside the first built. There were several ladies and gentlemen on the launch, friends of the builders, and shudders many representatives of the so-called "Confederacy," citizens and sympathizers. The other "ram" had her iron masts, spars, and rigging in place. The masts are tubular, and the topmasts intended to be lowered as a spy-glass. The forecastle and poop-deck are of boiler-iron, and are sidelighted and arranged for being shot away in action.

"The bulwarks are hung with heavy strap hinges, intended to be lowered in action, so as to give clean, flush decks, and to facilitate the boarding of an adversary. There are two turrets or towers, about twenty feet in diameter and ten in height. They are placed partly above and below decks; are pierced for two heavy guns each, entered below decks through six man-holes; they are built of very heavy bolter iron on the outside and inside, and to be filled in with a foot's thickness of wood or some more resisting material. They revolve on twenty-four wheels (similar to the small wheels of a locomotive, radiating from a centre), on outer of wrought iron, to the circle of the diameter of the turrets. The top of the turrets (and deck) is protected by thick iron. One of them is in the rear of the foremast, the other of the mainmast. Between the forward turret and smoke-funnel is the pilot-house, of an octagonal form (if as the model of wood in place), pierced with small sight-holes, and overlooking the turrets. What the arrangements may be for directing the movements of the vessel was not ascertained, as no one except workmen were allowed on board, and the small size of the pilot-house would hardly admit of a wheel on it. Each vessel has a powerful engine of between 300 and 400 horse-power. The bolt of the "ram" nearest completion is first of heavy iron 1 inch in thickness, then a planking of teak-wood 9 inches, and an outer covering of iron plating of 4½ inches thickness. But no writ finished in this work that there is no indication of the thickness or strength visible. The tonnage of each must be nearly two thousand tons, and the armament for the turrets was not the only ordnance to be carried on deck. These vessels are of no peculiar model and construction that I expressed confidently the opinion that under no subterfuge of reasoning or pretext could they be allowed to depart on their intended mission of destruction. The French and English colors were so "manthed" on this latter vessel also. It was stated that they were for the French Government, but a card from the French Consul denied the rumor. Afterward it was announced that the funds for their construction were furnished by M. Sangier, a French banker, who has a mortgage upon both vessels. The objection that they are unseaworthy seems futile, as the weight of the turrets and machinery is principally below decks. Such an objection certainly was not expressed by my very intelligent companion."



The picture above was likewise taken surreptitiously by an American, who brought it here. The vessel represented is building in the Clyde, and if she gets to sea will be very formidable.

OUR RUSSIAN VISITORS.

We devote considerable space this week to illustrations of the grand reception given last week to our distinguished Russian visitors. The ceremony was intended to have, and had, a political significance. No notice whatever was taken of the fêtes of the British and French admirals lying in the Bay. But every citizen felt bound to do what in him lay to testify to the Russians our sense of gratitude for the friendly manner in which Russia has stood by us in our present struggle, while the Western Powers have done not a little to work our ruin. On pages 664 and 665 we give a general view of

LISOVSKI'S FLEET.

This consists of the flag-ship Alexander Nevski, screw frigate of 91 guns, 4500 tons, Captain Fedorovski; the screw frigate Pewzet, 48 guns, 3800 tons, Captain Kopytov; screw frigate Oslaba, 33 guns, 2800 tons, Captain Boutakoff; screw sloop Vitiaz, 17 guns, 2100 tons, Captain Lund; and screw sloop Variag, 17 guns, 2100 tons, Captain Kremer. The following sketch of the squadron will be read with interest:

THE ANGLO-REBEL PIRATES—ONE OF LAIRD'S STEAM-RAMS.—[From a Sketch by an American in England.]

The two largest of the squadron, the frigates Alexander Nevski and Peresvet, are evidently vessels of modern build, and much about them would lead an unpracticed eye to think they were constructed in this country. The frigate Osliaba is unlike the other two; she has more the appearance of one of the first of the heavy screw ships built in the European dock-yards. Her bluff bows and full counter do not give evidence of great speed; but she is doubtless a fair goer and fine sea-boat. The two steam corvettes, or sloops, as we term them, Variag and Vitiaz, are apparently very superior vessels. They are fully equal in tonnage to the steamers in our service of the class of the Brooklyn, Richmond, and others, and carry very serviceable batteries. They are evidently constructed for speed, and have engines of full power. All these vessels are ship rigged, and are heavily sparred, so much so that if their smoke-stacks were out of sight you would hardly suppose them to be propelled by steam. Their standing rigging appears to be very slight in comparison with our ships of the same class.

The batteries of these ships are of formidable character, although all smooth-bored guns. They are of one calibre, throwing a solid shot of sixty pounds' weight, and of two classes, the long and medium, weighing about sixty and eighty hundred weight. They are of a pattern peculiarly Russian, but are fitted in a similar manner to the broadside guns of our own vessels. The locks and sight are different from ours, but no doubt answer equally as good a purpose. The batteries appear to be in excellent condition, and ready for service at a moment's warning. The guns are polished like mirrors, and every thing goes to show that their crews take pride in keeping their "pets" in proper order, ready for service or inspection of visitors.

The instant you step foot over the gangways of these ships it becomes evident that they are in the hands of men who understand how to keep a ship in the most thorough order. The decks are as white as holy-stones and sand can make them, the paint work spotless, the brass and other bright work shining as if they were cleaned every five minutes; rigging neatly coiled down on deck or on the belaying pins—no ends of ropes hanging about—every thing hauled taut and properly belayed, in fact, every thing looks "ship-shape and Bristol fashion"—just as a sailor likes to see it. A lady with the most immaculate skirts and kid gloves can move any where, on deck or below, without danger of soiling either, so perfectly clean every thing about the ship is kept. The quarter-deck is entirely clear, with the exception of the battery; but on board the Osliaba the boats—between the fore and main masts—appear to crowd the decks, being stowed in a manner to leave but little space between them and the ship's bulwarks. The gun and berth decks are low in comparison with the heavy ships of our service.

On Thursday, 1st October, the city of New York gave the Russian officers a grand reception. The committee of the Common Council went off in the steamer Andrews to present the resolutions to the Admiral. We condense the following account of the

RECEPTION ON BOARD THE "NEVSKI"

(which is illustrated on page 657), from the Herald:

The scene was grand when the Andrews cast off her moorings and steamed down the bay, the band of the North Carolina regaling the ear with the performance of popular airs. The boat was gayly decorated with the American colors. She did not head right for the Russian fleet, but made a circuit south of Governor's Island, coming round on the west side of the British and French squadrons. As she passed the English line-of-battle ship the band struck up the first bars of "God Save the Queen," but did not play the whole air, probably because there was no sign of recognition or acknowledgment from the deck of the Nile. The French squadron was passed without even a note of the "Marseillaise," but when she neared the Russian squadron the band played the national hymn, "God save the Emperor," and the white flag with the blue cross was run up. The compliment was acknowledged by loud vivas from the Russian men-of-war. Soon their rigging was filled with white-capped sailors, the Stars and Stripes were given to the breeze, and hundreds of curious eyes peered over the bulwarks of the formidable-looking vessels. As the Andrews steamed up to the Alexander Nevski—the Russian flag-ship, lying almost on a line westward from Trinity Church—the musical compliment on our side was returned by the performance, on theirs, of "Yankee Doodle," which is regarded by them as our national hymn. The crews of all the vessels were by this time saluting us with loud cheers.

The Andrews had been provided with a splendid row boat, the Waverley, to convey the committee on board the flag-ship; but the Russian was too polite for that. His own boats were floating on the wave, all ready to take us on board. Captain Faunce hailed the Russian, and shouted, "I have the city authorities here, wishing to go on board." "Yes, Sir," was the response. The boats came alongside, and we had the pleasure of being conveyed to the Nevski in a sixteen-oared gig, manned by stout arms, that probably acquired sinew and muscle on the Steppes of Tartary; for the Russian sailors are not obtained from the sea-board, nor are they expected to have any particular aptitude for a sea-faring life. They are taken indiscriminately from the ranks of the peasants, just as the soldiers are; but they make very good seamen notwithstanding. Little barefooted middies or apprentices meet us at the foot of the gangway and at the several landings, and sailors present arms to us as we pass up.

Well, here we are, on board the Alexander Nevski, which looks, on deck, large enough to accommodate a fair-sized army, and with ordnance heavy enough to blow up Fort Sumter. The guns, we are told by an officer, are of American make, being cast at Pittsburg. They are modeled somewhat after the Dahlgren pattern. In the midst of the group formed by the Committee of Arrangements and accompanying gentlemen, the Admiral, a small, active, and extremely polite gentleman, wearing the full uniform of his rank, and many decorations and insignia of nobility, is talking with as much volubility as his knowledge of the English tongue permits, and moving about from one point to another, giving directions to his own officers, or saying complimentary things to our civilians. The principal officers of the fleet are near him, all in full dress uniform, and along the opposite bulwark the sailors are ranged as if on parade. Some who have muskets to their shoulders are performing the duties which in other navies are assigned to the marine corps, an organization which is not known in the Russian service.

Up to this time there had been no salute fired, and no official presentation made. Much caution was to be observed in having the small boats out of the range of the guns. At last all was ready. At a signal the sailors who had been standing in ranks on deck sprang up the rigging, not manning the yards, however, as our sailors do. Then the order is given to fire, and as gun after gun reverberates under our feet—the salute is fired from the lower deck—the sailors break out into loud cheers, the band striving hard to play "Yankee Doodle." And thus the salute of twenty-one guns is fired, to the satisfaction of every body, and to the proper observance of official etiquette.

The resolutions of the Common Council duly presented and responded to, the Admiral, his officers, and the Committee proceeded to the foot of Twenty-third Street, where they landed. There they were received by the city dignitaries and a division of militia, and escorted to the city. Our artist sketched the procession from Brady's windows, opposite Grace Church, and we reproduce his picture on page 660. The following from the Times report will give an additional idea of the scene:

After the procession had passed Union Square, and wheeling fairly into the vast current of Broadway, the scene became splendidly animated. The moving pageant rolled in a glittering stream down the broad thoroughfare between banks of upturned human faces, the trappings of the equipages, the gold and silver epaulets of the Muscovite guests and the sabres, helmets, and bayonets of the escort reflecting back in unnumbered dazzling lines the glory of the evening sun. The cavalcade advanced to the joyous time of exulting martial music like the van-guard of a conquering host returning to the metropolis of its power, and there was a proud and gratified feeling evidently in the hearts of the vast concourse assembled to greet it, that would have been befitting to the most important triumphs at home. Far as the eye could reach down the great central avenue of our imperial city, the sidewalks were packed with human beings, and the balconies and windows—nay, in some instances, the very roofs of the buildings above them—were beset with eager multitudes, the general surface of this animated border-work richly varied and enameled, as it were, throughout its length, with groups of richly-attired beauty. Above nearly every building gayly fluttered the Stars and Stripes, some in standards of immense size and others tricked off with scores of little Russian flags, waving and sporting in the breeze side by side with our own national colors. By-the-way it may be remarked that the great Autocracy and the great Republic had the scene all to themselves, no other nation being represented even in bunting—a significant incident of the ovation.

The demonstration on the part of the masses was not so noisy or boisterous as upon former similar occasions, but was none the less earnest and real, the people seeming to appreciate, with peculiar feelings of solemnity, the importance of a display which amounted to little less than an international demonstration. Shouting and cheering were not prevalent, but there was much clapping of hands, and the throngs of ladies in the windows most vigorously waved their 'kerchiefs, to the great delight of the Russian officers, who never left off bowing, smiling, and even uttering their thanks aloud, while they doffed their gold-laced chapeau. One of the Captains manifested almost child-like pleasure, and at almost every moment uttered, in sonorous Russ, his astonishment and admiration at the grace, loveliness, and animation, as well as the cordial courtesy of our fair dames and damsels. On the chill banks of the Neva, perhaps when far away on the boisterous billows of the Black Sea or the Caspian, he will recall, in his lonely midnight vigil, while he paces the storm-beaten deck, the sunny smiles that brightened the autumnal sunshine on the borders of the Hudson.

The Lafarge House, the Metropolitan, and the St. Nicholas Hotels, and several adjacent stores, were neatly adorned with American and Russian standards. The splendid establishment of Tiffany & Co., No. 550 Broadway, displayed in front, and pendent over the street, a Russian flag of huge dimensions, while, arranged crosswise in the shape of an X., and reaching from the coping of the roof to the pavement below, ran two huge blue stripes of bunting, which, against the white marble façade, gave to the latter the semblance of another monster Muscovite ensign. This decoration was repeated on the adjacent building, also occupied by the same firm.

MARGARET'S CROSS.

I.

The Nortonville Sewing Circle was convened at the house of Mrs. Deacon Parker. The ladies present were grouped as chance or choice dictated, and the sound of many voices, blending somewhat inharmoniously, floated out into the supper-room, where the mistress of the house was busily engaged in providing for appetites sharpened by labor. Apart from the other ladies sat one whose thoughts seemed self-centred and little cognizant of what was passing. The hum of conversation rippled about her, but she took no part in it. She was no longer young. Apparently she had passed by some years the half-way house of life. Her expression was thoughtful and grave, and afforded little encouragement to those who would have approached her with the light personal gossip which furnishes the main staple of conversation with commonplace minds. Little was known in Nortonville of her past history, though for ten years she had gone in and out among the people, and lived constantly among them. Just ten years since she had purchased the Holmes cottage with half an acre of land attached, and commenced the solitary occupation of it. Advances were made toward neighborly intercourse in the early part of her residence, but these were so indifferently responded to that the people, partly chilled, partly offended, drew off, and by common consent left Margaret Thorpe to the solitude which she so evidently preferred.

During her ten years' residence it is doubtful whether Margaret had ever been beyond the town limits. Indifferent as she was to every thing in the village, there seemed to be nothing in the great world beyond which specially interested her. Curious neighbors had never detected a visitor at her door save the butcher, the baker, and peripatetic merchants of their class. She seldom crossed another's threshold; yet when the widow Carver's son, a boy of ten, fell from a scaffolding and broke his leg, thus adding materially to the labors of a hard-working mother with a numerous family, Margaret Thorpe walked over to the small house and offered her services as nurse. These were gratefully accepted, not without surprise. Margaret proved faithful to her self-imposed task. Day after day she watched by the sick boy's bedside, evincing a rare tact in anticipating his wants, and furnishing at her own cost fruit and other delicacies such as the mother's scanty means would scarcely have supplied. The mother was deeply grateful, but the awe with which the silent nurse inspired her embarrassed her in the expression of her gratitude.

A softer expression came over Margaret's face as she listened to the mother's attempt to convey her sense of indebtedness. "Don't thank me, Mrs. Carver," she said. "If I have been of any service I ought to be thankful that the opportunity has been afforded me. I feel that the experience has done me good in drawing me for a time out of myself."

Mrs. Carver looked at her with a puzzled face. She was a worthy woman, brought up in a hard-working school, and had few ideas beyond the humble round of her everyday duties.

"She's a strange woman, and I don't understand her," she remarked to a neighbor; "but she's been very good to my George, and I sha'n't soon forget it. I don't know how I could have got along without her. If I knew of any way to thank her I would."

"You might invite her to drop in to tea some afternoon," suggested the neighbor.

"I don't think she would accept the invitation," said Mrs. Carver, doubtfully.

"At any rate you can try the experiment, and if you want some one to help you entertain her I shall be glad to come too."

The invitation, suggested by one whose curiosity sought an opportunity to learn something more of the mysterious resident, was gently but firmly declined, and as a matter of course was never repeated. But Margaret made the little lad whom she had attended in his sickness an exception to the general indifference with which she regarded her neighbors. Not unfrequently she called him as he was passing her door, and gave him some present either designed specially for himself or for his family at home, thus furnishing an illustration of the remark that benefits conferred lead to an interest in those benefited.

This was not a solitary instance of Margaret's kindness. A poor man who had struggled with poverty all his life lost a cow by disease. To him it was a severe loss, which he knew not how to repair. Great was his joy on receiving through the post-office an envelope containing a sum of money sufficient to purchase another animal in place of the one lost. There was nothing to indicate from whom the gift proceeded, but inquiries settled beyond a doubt that Margaret Thorpe was his benefactress. He called upon her and expressed his thanks in earnest words. She said little, but that little was kind. "Do not thank me," she said, "but rather thank Him who has given me the ability to make you happy with what is valueless to myself. If the amount which I sent you proves insufficient to replace your loss let me know."

It may excite surprise that Margaret Thorpe, with her distaste to society, should form one of the busy company convened at Mrs. Deacon Parker's on the present occasion. It was not an ordinary meeting, however, but assembled to sew for a company of soldiers about to leave the village to join our forces in Virginia. This was in the early days of the rebellion, when the lack of public system made such individual efforts more important and necessary than now. Early in the afternoon Margaret Thorpe had presented herself at the door of Mrs. Parker, and in a few words offered her services, if an extra needle could be made available. There being a press of work, which it was desirable to complete as soon as possible, Margaret's offer was not one to be slighted. Even had there been little need to accept it, the ladies would gladly have embraced this opportunity to become better acquainted with the mystery that enveloped their silent neighbor. But Margaret took a quiet seat in a corner, and made it evident by her manner that she had come to work, and not to talk. She appeared wrapt and unobservant, and it is doubtful if she heard a word that passed among her neighbors, no less busy with the tongue than the needle.

Kitty Parker and Jenny Reed watched her from the sofa opposite—watched her with the curiosity of impulsive seventeen. So watching her, Kitty formed the daring resolution to assail the fortress of her reserve and carry it by storm. Jenny, more timid, dared her to the attempt. With a half-laughing glance and a little inward trepidation, Kitty advanced and seated herself in a chair adjoining Miss Thorpe's.

"It is a pleasant afternoon, Miss Thorpe," she commenced, assuming more nonchalance than she felt.

Margaret Thorpe looked up in a little surprise. "Yes," she said, "it is pleasant;" then looked down again at her work.

"Don't you think this is a horrid war?" remarked Kitty, in her most sociable manner.

"All wars are terrible," returned Margaret, slowly; "and perhaps those which take place in the soul, and without outward show, are not less terrible than those of the field."

"I wonder what she means," thought Kitty, pretty but shallow. "Have you got any relations in the war, Miss Thorpe?" she asked, aloud.

"Relations!" repeated Margaret, with a sudden glance at her companion; "I have no near relations."

"Oh!" said Kitty, a little disconcerted by the glance. Then, after a pause, "I sometimes wish that I were a man, that I might go. Don't you, Miss Thorpe?"

The question slipped out before she was aware. After it had fairly passed her lips she looked a little frightened, lest it should seem too familiar.

Miss Thorpe took it in good part. "I don't know," said she. "If I were a man I should feel that it was the path of duty. But women have their duties also. I think I shall go."

"To the war?" inquired Kitty, in amazement.

"Yes," said Margaret, answering the question without a thought of the questioner.

Kitty was thoroughly mystified. Miss Thorpe going to the war! The thought of the grave spinster in regimentals crossed her bewildered mind, and the absurdity struck her so forcibly that she had much ado to stifle a convulsive burst of merriment. Fearful of another attack, she hastily retreated to her former position.

"What did she say?" questioned Jenny, eagerly.

"That she is going out as a soldier," returned Kitty, trying to preserve a sober face.

"How absurd! You are only laughing at me."

"It is true," said Kitty, earnestly.

"Did she say those very words?"

"Well," returned Kitty, thinking a little, "she said she was going to the war."

"As a nurse, of course."

"Well, perhaps it may be that. But the fact is, Jenny, when I was talking with her I felt so nervous that it's no wonder I understood her in such an absurd manner."

Margaret's intention was quickly whispered about among the company, and a few curious glances were directed toward her in consequence. But no one accosted her, and this was all the information which the members of the sewing circle gleaned that day concerning her plans.

II.

A fortnight later a lady introduced herself to the physician in charge of a large hospital in Washington.

"Miss Thorpe!" he repeated, glancing at the card which she placed in his hand.

Margaret inclined her head.

"I have come," she explained, "to offer my services wherever you can make them available. I have little experience in tending the sick, but I can follow directions."

The doctor let his eyes rest for a moment upon her grave, earnest face. Here was no youthful enthusiast, but a woman mature, self-poised, reliable—one who knew what she had undertaken, and would not shrink however painful the duties imposed upon her.

"Miss Thorpe," he said, "I am obliged daily to decline applications from persons whom I judge to be unsuitable. Unless my discernment is much at fault you will be of great assistance to me, and I gratefully accept your services."

Margaret did not acknowledge the compliment in words. She merely bowed, removed her bonnet and shawl, and said, briefly, "I am ready."

The grave face soon became well known in the hospital wards. More than one wounded sufferer followed with grateful glances her whose hand had cooled his fevered brow, and from whose lips grave words of encouragement had fallen. She devoted herself with special assiduity to those whose suffering was greatest. There was one poor fellow from Vermont, both whose legs had been amputated, who was waiting in the hospital the slow process of healing. Sometimes his courage failed him when he looked forward, and thought from how much his crippled state would cut him off.

"It might have been your life," suggested Margaret.

"Well, there isn't much use in a poor feller like me living, do you think so, Miss?" he said, looking up wistfully into her eyes.

"You have made the sacrifice for your country. Do you regret it?"

The face of the wounded soldier lighted up. "Never, Miss. I'd do it again."

"Then for your country's sake you will bear it bravely. When the war is over, and the Union is restored, in part through your exertions, you will feel repaid fully, will you not?"

"That I shall, Miss Thorpe," said the young man, proudly.

"And you will feel, as long as you live, that you are bearing a life-cross for your country's sake. It will not be easy, but when that thought comes you will not complain."

"Your words have done me good. You must come and talk to me again. I can bear my cross better."

"We all have crosses—some heavier, some lighter. Happy are they who have a compensation like yours."

The soldier looked after her as she glided rapidly from bed to bed in the crowded ward.

"She has her cross, too," he thought. "I wonder what it is."

This was one case—one of many. There are some who diffuse cheerfulness about them without an effort. Margaret Thorpe was not one of these. Her grave face never relaxed into a smile. Yet wherever she went she carried with her an atmosphere of trust and submission which stilled the murmurs of the querulous, raising them to a higher level of patience and a hopeful serenity which permitted Nature to work under more favorable conditions. Much of the effect which her words wrought might be traced to the impression which prevailed that she was one who had known sorrow and been acquainted with grief.

One day there was a large accession of patients. For a time all was bustle and confusion. At length order was restored. "Miss Thorpe," said the doctor, pausing as he met Margaret on the stairs, "there is one young man whom I have had removed to a room by himself. He is sick of a contagious fever. I find a difficulty in obtaining a nurse willing to undertake the charge of him. Yet the poor fellow ought not to be neglected."

"I will take charge of him if you think best," said Margaret, without hesitation.

"I ought to warn you that you will incur danger."

"In the discharge of my duty I shrink from no danger."

"I admire your courage and noble spirit," said the doctor, warmly. With a few necessary directions he left her.

She found her patient delirious. He was a young man, apparently not over twenty years of age. His abundant chestnut hair had been roughly clipped by the doctor's orders, and his face was much flushed. Intent upon her duties as nurse, Margaret did not at first examine his features closely. When she did so she started suddenly and turned quite white. She drew nearer and gazed earnestly in the youth's face. Though seen at disadvantage, it was evident that in health he must have been very handsome. The full blue eye, the fair skin, the open, frank expression of the face, recalled to Margaret another face known long before, and still too well remembered.

"It is very like," she murmured. "If it should be! How mysterious are the workings of Providence!"

Thenceforward she devoted herself with even more than her usual assiduity to the young man's recovery. Had the care been less it is doubtful if the disease would have yielded. With an anxiety which she could not conceal, and a new something in her eyes—was it hope?—Margaret watched for the first sign of a change. At length it came. One afternoon, as the sun was near its setting, her patient opened his eyes.

"Where am I?" he asked, in bewilderment.

"You are in a hospital in Washington."

"Have I been sick?"

"Very sick."

"But you think I shall get well?" he asked, anxiously.

"Yesterday I should not have known what to say. To-day I have great hopes of your recovery."

"How long have I been here?"

"It is now ten days."

"And you have taken care of me all that time?"

"Yes; but I fear you are talking too much."

"How kind you have been!" said the young soldier, gratefully.

There was something in his voice and glance which affected Margaret strangely, but with an effort she suppressed all outward signs of emotion.

"Do you think I could write a letter?" he asked, the next day.

"You have not the strength to write yourself, but if you will dictate I will write for you."

Writing materials were brought, and Margaret seated herself at a small table by the bedside.

"It is to my father," the young man said.

The letter was commenced. After an account of his falling sick and being brought to the hospital, the young soldier turned to Margaret, and said, suddenly, "I have never told me your name. I shall wish to remember in after-years to whom I am indebted for my recovery."

"My name is Margaret Thorpe," was the answer somewhat hesitatingly given.

"I shall mention to my father how much I am indebted to you."

"No, no!" said Margaret, hastily.

The young man looked at her in some surprise.

"Promise me," she said, eagerly, "never to mention my name to your father."

"Why should you be unwilling?"

"Regard it as a whim, if you please; I can not explain it."

The letter was finished, and no further allusion was made to the subject. Only on the margin of the letter Herbert Wentworth—for it is time to give his name—contrived, unobserved by Margaret, to write, "Come."

Some days passed. The fever had turned, and Herbert was rapidly regaining his health. Margaret was seated by his bedside reading to him when steps were heard approaching. Supposing it to be the physician, she looked up, composedly. The next minute she had arisen from her seat, and with unearthly steps strove to leave the room.

"Margaret," said the new-comer in a low, clear, penetrating voice.

She turned, irresolutely. e

"Now that we have met after so many years, we would you leave me so soon?"

"Why should you wish me to remain, Henry? You have had good cause to forget me."

"But I have not forgotten you, Margaret, have never wished to forget you."

"Even when I wronged you most?"

"Not even then."

He came forward and took her hand. It trembled in his own.

"Ought I to take your hand? Am I worthy?" said Margaret, humbly.

"You have repented the wrong you did me—you have nursed my son back to life. You have sinned you have atoned also. I think you have suffered, Margaret." He said this gently, noting regretfully the changes which time and grief had wrought.

"If you have forgiven me, Henry, I shall live happier henceforth. Yet I wronged myself not less than you. No sooner had I uttered the bitter words that I parted us than I would have given worlds to recall them. But my unhappy pride prevented that. From that day we have not met. In solitude I have mourned over a hope which I myself had blighted. My punishment has been not less great than my sin."

"Let both be forgotten. When I go back to Wisconsin, Margaret, will you go with me?"

"Henry!"

"As my wife, Margaret."

"No, no, it can not be."

"Why? I tell you that it will promote my happiness—that I have a family of young children to whom you can be a second mother—will not that allure you?"

"Give me time to think—it is all so sudden. It is not right that so much happiness should fall to my lot."

Margaret's scruples were at length silenced. At the altar she plighted her faith to him who had so long possessed her heart. The ceremony which she had so long borne fell from her shoulders. A sweet and grateful peace softened the gravity of her face. When she returned to Norwood it to arrange her affairs previous to her transfer of residence, the villagers hardly recognized in her the cold, statue-like woman who had repelled all her advances. They knew not that the lost harmony had been restored to her soul, and that with her the way of duty had led into the path of peace.

SOMETHING LIKE CAMPAIGN-ING.

"I REMEMBER one evening near Westminster, Maryland, which stands out in my memory like an oasis in the desert. We were marching hard, during Stuart before us. Day and night, with hardly an interval, we had been at it steadily, and every body was in a chronic state of exhaustion. Early, therefore, fell into an uneasy slumber on horseback, and soon afterward his horse followed the example, while in the very act of stumbling. I heard a sudden shriek behind me, and, looking back, saw Thompson very white as the snake sticking his heels violently into his horse's side as the animal, with nodding head, was gently subsiding to the earth. Of course, there were no bones to break as the column straggled, or got too close. On one occasion, the whole battery, men and horses, who led into the line of march, got so fast asleep that they did not hear the troops ahead move on; and so we remained stationary for an hour or two, with no idea what could be the matter. Then men slid to the ground and lay on the road-side by their horses, and some of the officers followed their example. I, however, felt very wide awake, in a mood for supper and society. Just where we halted was one of those nice snug little villages of Northern Maryland, which are such a contrast to the desolation of houses called towns in Virginia. The house nearest to me was cheerful with lights, and had altogether a cozy, home look that was irresistible to a man who had been on rough service at the front for a couple of years. I did not attempt to resist the attraction but moved boldly forward, knocked at the door, and entered.

"Bright lights, soft carpets, pretty furniture, were all pleasant sights to one used to decay and devastation; and a table spread with a white tablecloth, covered with country fare neatly arranged, was by no means disagreeable to a hungry man. But there was something in the room which was more attractive than any of these. There were pretty faces smiling out of nice curled or braided hair, dainty forms clothed in fine muslin, sweet voices uttering hearty welcome from such charming lips, that my heart gave a bound and throb which made me for a moment feel quite appalled. I can not say exactly how many girls there were in that room; I only know that I was enfolded in a halo of muslin, my hands grasped by yielding palms, and myself escorted in triumph to the table. Some of them were old friends, and many there already, but I did not find time to speak to them. An angel in curls was asking me if I took sugar and milk, while an elderly lady with black cap-ribbons was heaping my plate with cold beef, ham, and pickles. Then a darling little creature, whose beauty did not suggest any thing but rose flesh and blood, was sitting by my side helping me to butter, and asking me with such a sympathizing expression, whether I was tired, and hungry, and hoping that my appetite came back with a vengeance, only disturbed by my desire to look at her and bring her eyes back to mine. Such eyes! my dear fellow! They did not sparkle or flash or any of that nonsense; but there was a soft, deep, pearly light in their blue depths that I would have fallen fatally in love then and there, if a pair of black orbs had not done me good service in the same way.

"Well, Sir, I made an uncommonly good supper; and after that was over, of course, I tired, or was tired of, whichever you choose to call it; the first is the proper form of words, the other is most accordant with the facts. And it was all right too. I am sure we all were thought to want some little attention; and it would have been very unkind to have left us to sit by ourselves from the home-keeping youths with very honest wits who were the usual recipients of their little delicate attentions. I am sure no more charming mischievous-looking damsel of seventeen who soon took possession of me. She sat down on a deer skin sofa by my side, and very soon found, asking me all sorts of questions about marching and fighting, fingering my sabre, and trying to draw it with little hands. Now she thought I knew when I told about Brandy Station; what a glow lit up her face as I described our charge; and how sadly she dropped a tear or two as I mentioned the sad night of our dead Major lying across a rebel corpse, his sabre still in his hand! Her head drooped so that I almost caught my cheek resting on her shoulder, and no place for my left arm except around her waist.

"There was a tall young gentleman in the room, who looked as civilians are apt to look on such occasions, as if he were out of place and knew it well. The young ladies neglected him; we did not want to talk with him; he had no sabre to play with, and no spurs to flash in the firelight; consequently he did not know what to do with his hands and feet or tongue, while he was not civilized enough to keep quiet. I felt sorry for the tall young gentleman, therefore, chose to occupy himself with me and my companion, and our proceedings did not appear to yield him much gratification. So, as I rose to take leave, he tried to interpose between us, with some whispered remonstrance to the girl, which I heard: 'Don't be catch a look!' And then the girl flashed out, 'You stay at home and make money, and have all your comforts about you, and then you have to be jealous of our feelings for those who are giving their lives for us, when we have only our comforts, and may hear of to-morrow as lying dead upon the battle-field!' I am not ashamed of what I feel then, Sir, when I say that I felt like a cad. A good-by! I kiss the sword which I know that you will use well for us, and I kiss you for doing so, as she said this, and I felt that my forehead was shoulder to lift her face to mine. It was not very hard to bring the two together. And then all the other girls came up and kissed us, for they were decidedly happy, with something to think about for the rest of the night. That girl gave me a new idea of the duty of the young lady to military officers; and though I did not require others to kiss my sabre, I always insisted on their saluting myself during the remainder of the campaign.

"I had about forgotten the tall young man by the next afternoon, when a rather dashing-looking fellow, in a sort of cavalry undress uniform, mounted on a very good horse, and well armed and equipped, came riding up to headquarters. As soon as he came to where I was he drew rein and addressed me. I then saw that it was the same person who had involuntarily done me such a favor the night before.

"'Major,' he said, 'I ain't much of a soldier or a fine-spoken man, but I can't help coming to the same little piece that was so smart last night. She got so set up about you fighting fellows that I don't expect to have much peace in the house. And as offer at the secesh on my own hook. I suppose it won't hurt you much to let me go along and see what's going on, will it?' It's only another man dead or alive, you know.'

"It was a queer sort of a proposition, and I took a good look at the fellow to see whether he was a fool or an sensible earnest; for a man of the former kind would have been a perfect nuisance, of course. The man stood my scrutiny well. By daylight, and on horseback, he looked active, vigorous, and intelligent; and there was a sort of cool daring and perfect self-reliance in his eye which assured me that, though no soldier, he would not be behindhand in a fight. So I told him that I was close to act as an orderly to me, he might do so, though, of course, I could not put him in the ranks. I could see, as he assented, that he had a sort of notion that he might enter into a sort of rivalry with me in the next fight, and that he intended to do something heroic at the first opportunity. Naturally amused by the fancy, I turned round to take a fresh look at him as he rode in his citizen fashion beside my other orderly, and I could hardly keep from laughing at the expression with which he and the soldier were contemplating one another. Each had such a perfect conviction of his own superiority, and each was so afraid that the other would not admit it; and at the same time they were each conscious of certain weaknesses in their hasty mental estimates.

"If I wanted to, I could employ half an hour in detailing the amusing circumstances attending which made me for a moment a cavalry officer, but they would be merely episodes, and in no way connected with the main incident of my story. So I shall hurry on to the fight at Gettysburg.

"We got on to the field for the second day's fight, and lay behind the right of the line. The rebels at one time had driven our cavalry from the crest of the hill above us, and we were deployed as skirmishers, dismounted to assist in checking them. I never feel at home or satisfied on foot, and so I kept the saddle; and though Thompson wished to dismount, I saw from the look of decency from his saddle while I remained in mine. The lines were only about two hundred yards apart, and the fellows were very hot, but on men, snugly ensconced behind a fence, and lying down, were perfectly safe, and managed to inflict considerable damage upon us. Now was the first time that Dan had ever heard the peculiar noise of a Minié ball, and you know the sensation produced by that sound. Now she is apparently unmoved; I heard a laugh from my men, in which the grim chuckle of Thompson was particularly distinguishable; now, perhaps, I saw Thompson's head in the air, while his head was descending toward his horse's mane. Here he had managed to twist himself into such an extraordinary attitude I do not know, but no circus rider could have struck in more perfectly graceful lines. Once a bullet passed the hill a particularly vicious discharge was sent from the opposing skirmishers. The balls came humming on. Some went over, then a ledge forward on his horse's neck; then, suddenly thinking that that brought him in closer range, he rapidly reversed his position, and accompanied by a plunge of the horse, brought him helpless over the animal's tail, which he clutched frantically, and with one foot still in the stirrup, the other flung around the horse's neck, he writhed in shame and agony. Thompson released him from his predicament, led him to the corner of the fence, and proceeded to give him good counsel as to the evil of indiscriminate laughing, and the way to accomplish the same with prudence and good judgment. In the mean time both parties kept popping away vigorously, and presently Thompson got a shot at an enemy, who had made him appear ridiculous, was exulted, and he began to pop away at them as fast as he could. He took off his cap, and cheered over the fence on the applause of the men by a quick shot and fatal aim. So ultimately he came out of the engagement a little the wiser as to his future prospects, but still without the crushing humiliation attending his first appearance.

"That, however, was mere play for the cavalry. It was the next day that our serious work began. At the extreme right of our position, beyond the Gettysburg road, between a large stone house and a small line of wood, occurred one of the sharpest cavalry fights ever witnessed, and yet so fierce was the main engagement that the combats of some fifteen or twenty thousand mounted men has been scarcely noticed. I myself had the honor, or of opening the ball, most of us dismounted as skirmishers, while a squadron, under Hart, was held mounted in reserve. The earliest mentioning I was with the skirmish line, and this time Simpson and Thompson both attended me. The men went up boldly, through a wood, and over a stone wall; but on rising the crest of a little hill they were saluted by such a storm of balls that they could not go further. We were lying down in the stone barn with sharp-shooters, who were, of course, completely protected from our fire. A battery was immediately brought up, unlimbered in the hole behind us, and opened on the barn. As we counted afterward, we were hit with twenty-five times, and though there were plenty of wooden buildings around it, not one of them was touched. I call that pretty accurate gunnery. The artillerists must evacuate those premises rapidly, and then our boys went forward with a rush. It is curious, but the moment one gets a little excited one becomes a prominent insensible to danger in this sort of skirmishing. Right on we pushed, driving the enemy before us from every position until we had almost made a gap in their lines. The Third Pennsylvania worked with us as skirmishers, and kept pace with us well. About the whole word are known to General that our ammunition was running short, and some other regiments were sent to relieve us. I was a curious fact that we could not be got up to the point where our men were standing. Their efforts formed a line about two hundred and fifty yards in our rear, and then we were ordered to fall back behind them. This gave the enemy a chance to see what was going on behind our lines, and as pushing across it, they stopped and commenced firing with their repeating rifles. The enemy came on inspite of their fire. The Michigan men (6 was either the Fifth or the Seventh) held their ground until they had got through the wall, and then turned, the enemy pressing on them hotly. Just then the First Michigan (old troops) charged. They broke the enemy completely, and drove them back pell-mell, suffering severely from the rifles of the other regiments. I had remained in that part of the field, allowing the skirmishers to go back under charge of a captain; and I had been made very indignant by the reluctance of the relieving regiments to advance; so when the charge took place I joined in. My little sorrel mare took me right over a six-barred fence, upon the heels of the rebels, close to where their guidon was. A few bounds more and I could have had it; but I had only my two orderlies with me, and the rebels clustered thick around it; so I had to draw in with the head of the Michigan. Dan all tried who could be first. And now Simpson had another chance to distinguish himself. His horse was very fresh, and the first thing that I knew he was dealing past me with a hurrah. Some of the rebels were just beginning to rally as our men tailed off in the pursuit; and at a gap in the wall, three rebs rode, waving his sabre high in air. Making for the foremost of them, he drew rein and dealt him a tremendous blow. Unfortunately he had not been drilled in the manual, and consequently instead of cutting, he merely whacked his opponent. The next thing I saw was the fellow's horse coming down upon Dan's, and rolling him in the dust. I was making as much haste as I could; but the rebel's sabre would have put an end to poor Simpson before I got there, had not Thompson fortunately put a bullet through him. The other two fellows had hesitated whether to run or fight. Before they had quite made up their minds I came thundering up, with the point of one of them as a passport. My weapon slipped into his throat with a sound that I shall never forget, and he fell, bleeding like a slaughtered bullock. A few more moments Simpson regained his feet, and sprang at the other one. The fellow threw up his arms and surrendered, and Dan, triumphant, [illegible] proudly conducted him to the rear.

"By this time the Second Brigade of the rebels was coming down at the charge, and General Custer was gathering his men to meet them. They outnumbered us very much, but went boldly at them. It was curious to see the two bodies approach. First came the steady trot; then each took the gallop gradually quickening as they approached. Then, as we got nearer and nearer, I could feel how our men closed together, and how, almost involuntarily, there was a touch of bridling of the horses. Then there was an evident check and wavering among the rebels. Instantly our fellows let out their horses at them, and the yanks in front of us broke and turned. At the same moment Hart with his few men dashed at their flank, as I had a right to suppose from him) and then the whole field was covered with their flying fugitives. There was no more fighting. All that we could overtake we took as unwounded prisoners, and we drew off just in time to avoid a charge of the Fourth Virginia.

"As I went back to hunt for the regiment I came upon Dan quietly sitting on the fence, with his prisoners near him.

"'Hallo, Sir!' said I, 'why have you not taken that man to the rear and given him up?'

"'Well, Major,' answered the cavalryman, 'I was thinkin' of taking this chap back home to show to Amandy. You see, she'll think then that I really did something after all. I don't know how I'm going to show for it, why I might as well have staid back.'

"I could not help laughing at the cool way in which he had regarded a rebel trophy merely as his own private property; but, much to his indignation, obliged him to resign his prize to the proper authorities.

"Immediately on the retreat of the rebels we were pushed in pursuit, and Simpson prepared to march with the rest, though he was still lame from which he had acquired. The last that I saw of him was when he was sidling along to Thompson, who made room for him on the crupper of his horse. Good-by!

"You see, my friend, you're a very nice young man at home; but you made a little mistake. Don't speak of your natural qualities as a good tackle, and your slight disinclination to attend to your horse. Maybe if I lay aside my sabre for you finding the ground less comfortable than a featherbed. But you thought you could come and be a soldier right off without any training, and that it was easy to stand fire without being used to it; and that fighting came natural to a man. I know you thought I was a coward when I left my boys and got behind a fence the other day; but you yourself found it wasn't pleasant to be on horseback. I don't like my boys to be left by Major, for he's an officer, and as such has to take a few more risks than we for the good of the regiment; but what was the use of your putting yourself up as a mark first, and making a fool of yourself afterward?

"Now you go home to that nice young woman that you talks about, and get married, and talk big up on your farm about what you have seen and done, and don't you come out soldiering any more until the nature of things you gets tired of her, and takes to it as the way of pleasure.

"With these words they parted, and we saw Simpson's face no more.

"A few days ago, however, I got a letter very prettily written, but with rather questionable spelling. It was signed 'Amanda Simpson,' and told me to understand that she had rewarded Dandelo's valor with her hand. She was still uncommonly shocked to hear that because he was a cad he got him to make me tell you about it. And he says that he's going to make the same bargain about the other one; and I say that he shan't. Here there was a big blot, and after it the explanations: 'That cussed pen has been and been ink-ing them beforehand; but didn't I slap her over!' I think Mr. Dan is going to have some trouble in enrolling his name in the list of Benedicts. Don't you? I hope, at any rate, that we will have another invasion of the North, for then there is really something like campaigning."

Vitiaz. Alexander Nevski.

THE RUSSIAN FLEET, COMMANDED BY ADMIRAL LISOVSK

I, NOW IN THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK.—[See Page 661.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

COULD any one have known what was passing in different places, he would have counted Alfred's deliverance a certainty; for Sampson's placard was on Barkington walls, and inside the asylum Alfred was softening hearts and buying consciences, so related; so, in fact, he had two strings to his bow.

But mark how strangely things turn; these two strings are entangled, and spoil all. His father, alarmed by the placard, called at the pawnbroker's shop, and told him he must move Alfred directly. As London pawnbroker Baker raised objections; Mr. Hardie crushed them with his purse, i. e., with his son's and victim's sweetheart's fortune in money: so then, as Baker after all could not resist the project, but only postpone it for a day or two, he preferred to take a handsome present, and co-operate; he even connived at Mr. Hardie's signing the requisite name to the new estate. This the giddy world calls forgery; but, in these calm retreats, far from the public's inquisitive eye, it goes for nothing. Why, Mrs. Archbold had signed Baker's name, and Dr. Bailey's more than a hundred several times to orders, statements, and certificates, depriving Englishmen of their liberty and their property with a gesture of her taper fingers; and rewriting the conventional terms, "Aberration," "Occasional," "Depression," "Debility," "Paralysis," "Excitable," "Abnormal," as boldly and blindly as any man putting in the bulk.

On the very night then of Alfred's projected escape, two keepers came down from Dr. Wycherley's asylum to Silverton station: Baker met them, and drove them to Silverton House in his dog-cart. They were to take Alfred up by the night train—and, when he came into the kitchen with Brown, they suspected nothing, nor did Baker or Cooper, who presently emerged from the back kitchen. Brown was just recovered his wits partially. "Shall I go for his portmanteau, Sir?" stammered he, making a shrewd and fortunate guess at what was up. Baker assented; and soon after went out to get the horse harnessed. Mrs Archbold, pale, composed, dreadful, and silent hitherto, beckoned Alfred into the back kitchen, and there gave him his watch and his loose money. "Take care of them, sir, for you," said she; "for the like have often been stolen in this place. Put the money in your pocket; it is not full to you."

He thanked her somewhat sullenly; for his disappointment was so deep and bitter that small kindnesses made no dent in it.

She sighed. "It is cruel to be angry with me, she said: "I am not the cause of this; it is a heavier hand to us than to you. Sooner or later you will be free—and then you will not waste a thought on me, I fancy. I must remain in this odious prison without your eyes and your smile to lighten me, yet unable to forget you. Oh, Alfred, for mercy's sake whisper me one kind word at parting; give me one kind look to remember and dote upon."

She put both hands as eloquently as she spoke, and overpowered his prudence so far that he took her offered hands—they were as cold now as they were burning hot the last time—and pressed them, and said, "I shall be grateful to you while I live."

The pale woman snatched her hands away. "Gratitude is too cold for me," she cried; "I scorn even yours. Love me, or hate me."

He made no reply. And so they parted.

"What you have done for honor to make attempt at escape on the road?" asked the pawnbroker on his return.

"I'll see you d——d first," replied the prisoner. On this he was handcuffed, and helped into the dog-cart.

They went up to town by the midnight train but, to Alfred's astonishment and delight, did not take a carriage to themselves.

However, the station was passed, and nobody came into their carriage. At last they stopped at a larger station, and a good many people were on the platform. Alfred took the opportunity and appealed in gentle but moving terms to the fellow-feeling of intelligent face by side. "Sir," said he, "I implore your assistance.

"I am the victim of a conspiracy, Sir; they pretend I am mad: and are taking me by force to a mad-house, a living tomb."

"You certainly don't appear to be mad," said the gentleman.

The two keeper instantly showed him the order and a copy of the certificates.

"Don't look at them, Sir," cried Alfred, "they are signed by villains who are bribed to slay them. For God's sake, Sir, judge for yourself. Test my memory, my judgment, by any question you please. Use your own good sense; don't let those venal rogues judge for you."

The gentleman turned cold directly.

"I could not take on me to interfere," said he. The unworn affidavits had overpowered his senses. He retired with a frigid inclination. Alfred wrung his handcuffed hands, and the contracting chain rattled. The train moved on.

The man was complained of: his conduct was natural; and they knew their strength. At the next station he tested a snob's humanity instead of a gentleman's. He had heard they were more tender-hearted. The answer was a broad grin: repeated as intervals.

Being called mad was pretty much the same thing as being mad to a mind of this class: and Alfred had admitted he was called mad.

At the next station he implored a silvery haired old gentleman. Old age, he had heard, has known griefs, and learned pity.

The old gentleman received the petition very graciously. "Ah!" said Senex: "poor young man. Now don't agitate yourself. It is all for your good. Pray go quietly. Very painful, very painful." And he hobbled away as fast as he could. It is by striking the painful scene first to be silvery old.

Next he tried a policeman. Bobby listened to him erect as a dart.

The certificates were shown him.

He eyed them and said, sharply, "All right." Nor could Alfred's eloquence and appeals to common sense attract a word or even a look from him. Alfred cried, "Help! murder! If you are an Englishman, if you are Christians, help me."

The soon drew a crowd round him, listening to his fiery tale of wrong, and crying "Shame, Sam Let him go!" Some even pushed their heads, winked, and got out and showed the certificates; the crowd melted away like wax before the sun, and with evidence (unseen). The train moved on.

It was appalling. How could he ever get free? Between his mind and that of his fellows there lay a spiritual barrier more impassable than the walls of fortified cities.

Yet, at the next station, with characteristic tenacity of purpose, he tried again: for he saw a young sheuting man, a rough common woman of forty. Then he remembered that the Naked Eye was not yet an extinct institution among boys. He cried to the boy, and implored her to use her own eyes. She seemed struck, and did eye him far more closely than the men had; and told the keepers they ought to be ashamed of themselves; he was no madman, for she had seen madmen. They showed her the certificates.

"Oh, I am no scholar!" said she, contemptuously, "ye can't write my two eyes out of my head."

The keeper whipped off Alfred's cap and showed his shaven crown.

"Ah!" so he is," said she, lowering her tone. "dear heart, what a pity! And such a pretty young gentleman!" And after this she would not say only drew the dew of patient pity to her eyes.

The train went on, and left her standing there, a statue of compassion. Alfred saw her through. He felt how impotent he was. "I shall die in a mad-house," he said. He shivered in a corner, hiding man, and shaking fiend.

They reached Dr. Wycherley's early in the morning. Alfred was shown into a nice clean bedroom, and asked whether he would like a bathe or sleep. "Oh a bath," he said; and was allowed to bathe himself. He had not been long in the water when Dr. Wycherley himself made a distant tapped at the door, and then entered without further ceremony, and, approaching Alfred in a longish down on his chin, which, initiated early in the secrets of physiology, he was too knowing to shave off and so go backward, he proceeded to came in looking like a machine, with a notebook in his hand, and stood by the bath side looking notes to himself and jotting them down.

"Six contusions: two on the thorax, one on the abdomen, two on the right leg, one near the patella: turn, please." Alfred turned in the water. "A slight dorsal abrasion; also of the wrist; a severe excoriation of the ankle. Lock, lock, eh?"

"Yes."

"Iron leg-lock. Head shaved. Large blister. Good! Any other injuries external or internal under and system of bruising?"

"Yes, Sir, confined as a madman though sane, as you I am sure have the sense to see."

"Oh, never mind that. We are all sane here except the governor and I."

He whipped out and entered the condition of the sane patient's body with light, unprofessional ease in the case book. As for his mind, he made no inquiry into that; indeed he was little qualified for researches of the kind.

At breakfast Alfred sat with a number of mad ladies and gentlemen, who by firmness, kindness, and position, had acquired the excellent habits: the linen was clean and the food good. He made an excellent meal, and set about establishing with their new he could. Nobody interfered with him; but plenty of eyes watched him. This was a great many patients, and constant vigilance. Moreover, the doors were strong, the windows opened only eight inches, and that from the top; the bedsteads also were iron, painted like wood, etc. It was next to impossible to get into the yard at night; and then it should have companions to help further, for the house was encompassed by high walls.

He resigned all hope of escape without cominication. He sounded a keeper: the man fired at the first word. "Come, none of that, Sir; you should know better than tempt a poor man."

Alfred colored to the eyes; and sighed deeply. To have honor thrown in his face, and made the reason for imprisonment, was a fiendish subconscious conspiracy! But he took the reproof so sweetly, the man was touched, and, by-and-by, became his deeply devoted friend, and confidant.

"Don't be down on your luck, Sir. If you are really better, which you don't look to have much the matter now, why not write to the Commissioners and ask to be let out?"

"Because my letters will be intercepted."

"No, by your leave; but sent to the Commissioners of Lunacy. Not in this house, my boy."

"God bless you!" cried Alfred, impetuously. "You are my benefactor; you are an honest fellow; give me your hand."

"Well, why not? Only you mustn't excite yourself. Take it easy." (Formula.)

"Oh, no cant among friends!" said Alfred; "wouldn't you be excited at the hope of getting out of prison?"

"Well, I don't know but I might. Bound I am as sick of it as you are."

Alfred got paper and sketched the letter on which so much depended. It took him six hours. He tore up two; he cooled down the third, and condensed it severely: by this means, after much thought, he produced a close and telling composition: he also weeded it of every trait and every term he had observed in mad people's talk, or the letters they had shown him. There were no superlatives, no heat, no prolixity, no "spies," no "conspiracy," no italics. A simple, honest, earnest story, with bitter truth stamped on every line; a sober, strong appeal from a sore heart but hard head to the arbiters of his fate.

By the best of my belief no madman, however slightly touched, or however cunning, ever wrote a letter so gentle yet strong, so earnest yet calm, so telling and withal so lucid and clearly jointed as this was: and I am no contemptible judge: for I have accumulated during the last few years a large collection of letters from persons deranged in various degrees, and studied them profoundly, and curiously than most Psychologists study any thing but Pounds, Shillings, and Verbiage.

The letter was sent, and he hoped but scarcely expected an answer by return of post. It did not come. He said to his heart, "Be still;" and his heart obeyed him, and beat by, and another; it gnawed his heart, and waited: he pined, and waited on. The Secret Tribunal, which was all a mistake, deliberated, and left him, "took it easy." Secret Tribunals always do.

But, while the victim suitor longed and pined and languished for the word from the voice of Justice and Humanity, and while the Secret Tribunal, her ally, took its own time, and "took it easy," events occurred at Barkington that bade fair to throw open the prison doors, and bring father, son, wife, bride and bridegroom, together again under one roof.

But at what a price!

CHAPTER XL.

MR. HARDIE found his daughter lying asly pale on a little bed in the drawing-room of Albion Villa. She was now scarce conscious. The fatal blow had struck her, and looking very gravely and Julia kneeled over her beloved friend, pale as herself, with hands clasped convulsively, and a misery she had never felt.

That vivid young face, full of foreboding and woe, struck Mr. Hardie with the power it exerted; and knew his very heart: the strong man quivered and sunk slowly like a felled tree by the bedside; and when by the poor girl's, whose earthly happiness he had coldly destroyed, nearly met over his crushed daughter.

"Jane, my child," he gasped; "my poor little Jane!"

"Oh let me sleep," she moaned, feebly.

"Darling, it's your own papa," said Julia, softly.

"Poor papa," said she, turning rather to Julia than to him; "poor papa."

She was in a half lethargic state.

Mr. Hardie asked the doctor in an agitated whisper if she would ever be home. The doctor shook his head: "Not by my advice: her pulse is scarce perceptible. We must not move her, lest she die now; yet let her sink into lethargy. She is in great danger; very great."

As these words fell Mr. Hardie groaned aloud, and they all began to speak below the breath.

"Edward," murmured Mrs. Dodd, hurriedly, "run and tell him the station: put it off another: then go to the railway; nothing must come here to make a noise: and get straw put down directly. Quick, dear."

"You are kinder to me than I deserve," muttered Mr. Hardie, humbly, quite cowed by the blow that had fallen on him.

The words agitated Mrs. Dodd with many thoughts; but she whispered as calmly as she could, "Let us think of nothing now but this precious life."

Mr. Hardie begged to see the extent of the injury. The Dodd dissuaded him; but he persisted. Then the doctor showed her poor head.

At that the father uttered a scream and sat quivering. Julia buried her face in the bedclothes directly, and sobbed vehemently. It caused Isabel's pulse to be hounded and shuddering father, "How she loves my child; they all love her:" but the thought made little impression at the time: the mind was too full of terror and woe. The doctor now asked for brandy, in a whisper. Mrs. Dodd left the room with stealthy haste to get it. He asked for a quill. Julia went with swift, stealthy foot, and brought it. With adroit and tender hands they added the quill, forced trickled mixtures down her throat. Then sat like statues of grief about the bed; only every now and then eye met eye, and appealed to read what the other thought. Was there hope? Was there none? Alas! it was the style, so young is the mind, especially when the body is still, these statues began to thrill with thoughts of the past as well as the absorbing present.

Ay, here were met a strange party; a stranger, for its size, methinks never yet met on earth, to mingle their hearts together in one grief.

Just think! Of him who sat there with his face hidden in his hands, and his frame shuddering with deep-drawn sighs, the victim.

Yet the lady, whose husband he had robbed and plundered, pitied and sympathized with him, and he saw it: the lady, whom he had insulted at the altar and blighted her young heart and life, pitied and sympathized with him; the poor old doctor pitied and sympathized, and was more like an anxious father than a physician.

Even Jane was one of his victims; for she fell by the hand of a man he had dishonestly ruined and driven out of his senses.

Thinking of all he had done, and this the end of it, he was at once crushed and melted.

He saw with awe that a mightier hand than man's was upon him; it had tossed him and his daughter into the house and the scene of the injured Dodds, in defiance of all human calculation; and he felt himself a straw in that hand; so he was, and the great globe itself. Ah if Jane should die! the one creature he loved, the one creature, the sacred of whom he could get no joy even from riches.

What would he not give to recall the past, since all his schemes had but ended in this. Thus stricken by terror of the divine wrath, and touched by the goodness and kindness of those he had cruelly wronged, all the man was broken with remorse. Then he vowed to undo his own work as far as possible: he would do any thing, anything, if Heaven would spare him his child.

How it did so happen that these soulless, earnest and sincere but somewhat vague, were soon put to the test; and, as often occurs, what he was called on to do first was that which he would rather have done last. Thus it was: about five o'clock in the afternoon Jane Hardie opened her eyes and looked about her.

It was a moment of intense anxiety. They all made signals, but held their breath. She looked straight at Mr. Hardie, and said, "Papa! dear papa!"

There was great joy: silent on the part of Mrs. Dodd and Julia; but Mr. Hardie, who saw in this a good omen, Heaven recognizing his penitence, burst out: "She knows me; she knows me. Oh, my child! How good you are! Yes, my darling child, it is your own father. You will be brave and get well for my sake."

Jane did not seem to pay much heed to these words; she looked straight before her like one amazed with her own thoughts, and said, distinctly and solemnly, "Papa—send for Alfred."

It fell on all three like a clap of thunder, those gentle but decided tones, those simple natural words.

Mr. Hardie flushed into her mother's, and then sought the ground directly.

There was a dead silence.

Mr. Hardie was the one to speak. "Why for him, dear? Those who love you best are all here."

"For Heaven's sake don't thwart her, Sir," said the doctor, in alarm. "This is no time to refuse her any thing in your power. Sometimes the very expectation of a beloved person coming keeps them alive. Remember the powers."

Mr. Hardie was sore perplexed. He recoiled from the sudden exposure that might take place, if Alfred without any preparation or previous conciliatory measures were allowed to burst in upon them. And while his mind was whirling round upon him in doubt and perplexity, the doctor spoke again; but no longer calmly and connectedly: she was beginning to wander. Presently in her wandering she spoke of Edward; called him dear Edward. Mrs. Dodd rose hastily, and her first impulse was to ask both gentlemen to retire; so unbecoming did she feel a poor woman protect her own sex against the other. But, reflecting that this was the father, she made an excuse and retired herself followed by Julia. Julia, the doctor divined, and went to the window. The moment she left Mr. Hardie groaned, and his daughter loved Edward Dodd.

The time was gone by when this would have greatly pained him.

He sighed like one overmatched by fate; but said, "You shall have him, my darling; he is a good young man, he shall be your husband, you shall be happy. Only live for my sake, for all our sakes. She paid no attention and wandered on a little; but her mind gradually cleared, and by-and-by she asked quietly for a glass of water. Mr. Hardie gave it her. She sipped, and he took it from her. She looked at him close and said distinctly, "Have you sent for Alfred?"

"No, love, not yet?"

"Not yet! There is no time to lose," she said, gravely.

Mr. Hardie trembled. Then, being alone with her, the miserable man unable to say no, unwilling to say yes, tried to persuade her not to ask for Alfred. "My dear," he whispered, "I will not refuse you: but I have a secret to confide to you. Will you keep it?"

"Yes, papa, I will."

"Poor Alfred is not himself. He has delusions; he is partly insane. My brother Thomas has thought it best for us all to put him under gentle restraint for a time. It would retard his cure to have him down here and subject him to excitement."

"Papa," said Jane, as you receiving me, or not, to be depended upon? Answer truly. He is a falsehood. He came to me the night before the wedding that was to be. O my brother, my darling brother, how dare they put you in restraint! That letter you showed me then was a falsehood? O papa!"

"I fancy I do, Alfreden you," said Mr. Hardie, and hung his head.

"I see it all," she cried, "those wicked men with their dark words have imposed on you. Bring him to me that I may reconcile you all, and end all this misery ere I go hence and be no more seen."

"Oh, my child, don't talk so," cried Mr. Hardie, terrified at the thirst of your poor head.

"I do," she cried, "I do. Oh, papa, I lie here between two worlds, and see them both so clear. Trust to me: and, if you love me—"

"If I love you, Jane? better than all the world twice told."

"Then don't refuse me this one favor: the last, perhaps, I shall ever ask you. I want my brother here before it is too late. Tell him he must come to his little sister, who loves him dearly, and—is dying."

"Oh no! no! no!" cried the agonized father, casting every thing to the winds. "I will. He shall be here in twelve hours. Only promise me to bear up. Have a strong will; have courage. You shall have Alfred, you shall have any thing you like on earth, any thing that money can get you? What am I saying? I have no money; it is all gone. But I have a father's heart. Madam, Mrs. Dodd!" She came directly.

"Can you give me paper? No, I won't trust to a letter. I'll send off a special messenger this moment. It is for my son, madam. He will be here to-morrow morning. God knows how it will all end. But how can I refuse my dying child? Oh, madam, you are good, kind, forgiving; keep my poor girl alive for me: keep telling her Alfred is coming; she cares more for him than for her poor heart-broken father."

And the miserable man rushed out, leaving Mrs. Dodd in tears for him.

He was no sooner gone than Julia came in; and clasped her mother, and trembled on her bosom. Then Mrs. Dodd knew she had overheard Mr. Hardie's last words.

Jane Hardie, too, though much exhausted by the scene with her father, put out her hand to Julia, and took hers, and said feebly, but with a sweet smile, "He is coming, love; all shall be well." Then to herself as it were, and looking up with a gentle rapture in her pale face:

"Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the children of God."

On this thought she seemed to feed with innocent joy; but for a long time was too weak to speak again.

Mr. Hardie, rushing from the house, found Edward at work outside; he was crying undisguisedly, and with his coat off working harder at spreading the straw than both the two men together he had got to help him. Mr. Hardie took his hand and wrung it, but could not speak.

In half an hour a trusty agent he had often employed was at the station waiting for the up-train, nearly due.

He came back to Albion Villa. Julia met him on the stairs with her finger to her lips: "She is sleeping; the doctor has hopes. Oh, Sir, let us all pray for her day and night."

Mr. Hardie blessed her; it seemed the face of an angel, so earnest, so lovely, so pious. He went home: and at the door of his own house Peggy met him with anxious looks. He told her what he had done.

"Good Heavens!" said she: "have you forgotten? He says he will kill you the first day he gets out. You told me so yourself."

"Yes, Baker said so. I can't help it. I don't care what becomes of me; I care only for my child. Leave me, Peggy; there, go; go."

He was no sooner alone than he fell upon his knees, and offered the Great Author of life and death—a bargain. "O God," he cried, "I own my sins, and I repent them. Spare but my child, who never sinned against Thee, and I will undo all I have done amiss in Thy sight. I will refund that money on which Thy curse lies. I will throw myself on their mercy. I will set my son free. I will live on a pittance. I will part with Peggy. I will serve Mammon no more. I will attend Thine ordinances. I will live soberly, honestly, and godly all the remainder of my days; only do Thou spare my child. She is Thy servant, and does Thy work on earth, and there is nothing on earth I love but her."

And now the whistle sounded, the train moved, and his messenger was flying fast to London, with a note to Dr. Wycherley:

